This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

VOL. 32.—No. 1. SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1854. {PRICE 4d. STAMPED 5d.

NOTICE.

We have to inform our readers that the office for the publication and sale of THE MUSICAL WORLD is removed to MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS', No. 28, Holles Street, Cavendish Square. Subscriptions, Advertisements, Music for Review, Correspondence, and all communications whatever for this Journal, must be addressed, henceforward, to the EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD, care of MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, as above.

OUR THIRTY-SECOND VOLUME.

To our readers, one and all, a happy new year!

The Musical World is now two-and-thirty, in volumes. We have not lived so long without gathering some little experience. Of the experience we have gathered we hope to be able to make good use. For two-and-thirty volumes we have felt the pulse of the musical public. Ought we not, after so long an apprenticeship, to know tolerably well what that public requires?

In our first number for 1854 we have endeavoured to furnish as much variety as can be compassed in a journal of the pretensions which we assert. We may particularly call attention to a translation of a life of Mozart, by a Russian author (Alexander Oulibicheff), which has never previously appeared in this country; to a new and interesting memoir of Mendelssohn, equally unknown in England; to some extracts from the amusing German diary of Hector Berlioz, translated expressly for the Musical World; and last, not least, to the commencement of a series of papers, by Mr. Macfarren, on the music composed by Mendelssohn, at the instigation of the present King of Prussia, for the German version of Sophocles' tragedy of Œdipus in Colonos.

We trust that these may be accepted as a fair instalment of the debt we owe perennially to our friends and patrons, whose kind support we shall continue to use our best efforts to deserve.

Once more, to our readers, one and all, a happy new year!

MENDELSSOHN'S "ŒDIPUS IN COLONOS."

"ŒDIPUS IN COLONOS" is one of the seven tragedies of Sophocles, which alone have been preserved out of the hundred and twenty productions of that voluminous dramatic poet. It is the second in the order of events of the three plays which embody the history of the ill-fated hero, and its consequences. The first presents him as King of Thebes, discovering the awful mystery of his birth; the second, that in question, shows him in exile, fulfilling his unhappy destiny by a preternatural death; while the third completes the chain of Delphic predictions, with the death of Antigone, his devoted daughter.

Sophocles, the statesman, soldier, and dramatist, according to Valerius Maximus, composed this tragedy—which was no less admired by the ancients than it is esteemed by the moderns, for its freshness and vigour—in extreme old age. It is related by Tully, that as Sophocles neglected his family affairs, whilst wholly intent on his dramatic compositions, his sons instituted a suit against him before the Areopagites, praying, that as his understanding was impaired, he might be removed from the management of his estate. The octogenarian requested, in defence, to be allowed to read his Œdipus in Colonos, which had just been completed. This so fully established the healthy condition of his mind, that the court unanimously dismissed the petition of the complainants.

The political character which most strongly coloured the habits of the Athenians is powerfully illustrated in this play, where the prosperity, importance, and natural beauty of the country, and the valor and generosity of the people form the constant themes exemplified and enforced by the successive incidents. The element of the Chorus, which, in spite of the advocacy of Schiller, remains to the present appreciation an incongruity in the Greek drama, is here much more essential to the whole than in the tragedy of Antigone; since, besides the several odes, which carry on the progress of the action, eulogising the state, and moralising upon such conditions of humanity as the incidents present, this impersonal personality sustains a very considerable portion of the dialogue with the principal characters, and thus becomes a party in many of the most impassioned scenes of the play. If I am not misinformed, Mendelssohn composed the music for this tragedy, like that for Antigone, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Athalie, by command of the King of Prussia, for the purpose of its being executed in the Royal private theatre of Potsdam.

Much as we must rejoice in the genius that could elicit and so worthily obey such a command, we can no less extol the enlightened liberality of the monarch whose feeling for the beauty and necessity of art led him to conceive and to issue it. Prussia proved herself worthy of a great artist by the confidence reposed in Mendelssohn, and the homage paid to his talent. Of what is England worthy? To that spirit, which prevails not here, the world owes the existence of these four masterpieces, in which the great and various dramatic powers of the composer are so eminently displayed. Possibly we have no Mendelssohn,—certainly we have no King of Prussia. Had there been no Mecænas, Virgil would have had no opportunity to exercise his powers, and, his genius thus undeveloped, the world would have lost a poet. England has no Mecænas, and hence it may be that England has no Virgil, or at least is ignorant of his existence. So long as it is the policy of our government, personally and officially, to furnish themes for the writers of leading articles in newspapers, and inflammatory excitment to their readers, while it neglects that most important medium of moral discipline, intellectual cultivation—so long will politics be the amusement of the people, art their handiwork, their furniture, their hard livelihood in pursuit, and, at best, their paper-hanging in its attainment. So long as the beautiful is but a business, and the stimulant of genius but a shop account of loss and profit, and the inconsequent example of the great works that have been produced under other auspices, must we bear the stigma the rest of the world has placed upon us, of being an unmusical nation. In Prussia, it is otherwise; and of that state of things Mendelssohn's Œdipus is among the results of which we share the advantage.

The form of the Greek drama affords a novel and a very wide scope for the exercise of the musician's art; but, at the same time, the details of its construction fetter him with uncommon and embarrassing difficulties.

It was not new in the revival of the tragedies of Sophocles upon the German stage, to blend spoken declamation with instrumental accompaniment. The biographers of Mozart describe, as one of his first important dramatic successes, his music to Mithridates, which consisted entirely of orchestral accompaniments to the dialogue, in the style of recitative; and this, it seems, was a form of composition much esteemed at that period, The choral responses to the speeches of the characters constitute a new element, in the treatment of which Antigone has proved the greatness of Mendelssohn's power; and the present work, as it contains more of such scenes, and of a more complicated and extensive character, has more severely tested this power, and thus still more successfully established it. The difficulty of execution presented by the intermixture of speaking and singing, and by the reduction of spoken declamation to the restrictions of musical rhythm, while impeding the realization of the composer's effects, detracts nothing from his merit in producing it; and the feeling of every one who has witnessed the competent performance of Antigone is, that the effect thus attained is of the most powerfully exciting character that the dramatic musical art can attain.

The first difficulty, I may say, danger, of this class of writing exists in the necessity of reaching the pinnacle which lies between dulness on its more cautious and gradual ascent, and absurdity on the precipitous and sunny side of its declivity, and thus to elevate without exaggerating the dramatic situation. This demands the profoundest artistry, and the highest natural qualifications in the composer. The next difficulty or danger belongs to the fascination of continuous action, which impels the embodiment of line after line, phrase after phrase, in fresh ideas; in which uninterrupted succession, so attractive to the musician, he is liable to abandon that unity which is indispensable to the gratification of the hearer.

It is especially to be admired in the work under consideration, that in these declamatory scenes, while the expression of the general sentiment and the enunciation of particular words form the chief purport of the musician, and the chief medium of his impression upon an audience, the principles of musical construction are so ingeniously, and so successfully brought to bear upon the treatment, even of the most impetuous, broken and seemingly irregular passages, as to render each scene a model of symmetry. Thus we have all the excitement of an unpremeditated passionate impulse, refined and beautified by the agency of artistic design. Such a handling of the subject is especially appropriate in a composition illustrative of a work of Greek art, the elements of which in all its branches of manifestation were artificial, refinement being the necessity, and nature the germ from which her inventions had to be ripened. It is eminently to the purpose that the unities of our own art should be scrupulously maintained, when it is brought into connection with another in which the laws of unity were despotic.

We must now consider another department of the work, and the difficulties that beset its treatment—viz: the adaptation of music to the Odes. The obvious purpose of this important feature in the design of the Greek drama was to afford intervals of repose during the progress of the action, which would else have been too violent and exciting to come within the rule of gradual undulation, which, as the principle of ideal beauty, was imperative in ancient art. The sanguine Greeks, softened by the influence of their sunny shores, ignored the awful majesty of the granite mountain-range—the precipitous abruptness, the rugged and barren irregularity of which present a stern sublimity, not less true to nature, and even more solemn in the impression it produces, than the unfailing curvature of spontaneous fertility which constitutes the luxurious indulgence of nature in her seasons of repose. To them the Alps were only visible through the subtle medium of distance,—suggesting, by analogy, the turbulence of human passion, through the no less subtle medium of art, which they interposed as a softening atmosphere between what was displayed and those who witnessed it. While this atmosphere—a southern one, transparent as truth—could not but reveal the roughness of the transvening forms, it presented coincidently a mirage, built of the sunbeams and peopled with the unseen voices of daylight and imagination, which at least divide the attention, and, dazzling the sight, made it the involuntary act of the beholders to invest all they gazed upon with the brilliant colours thus imprinted on their retina. Further; the absence of metaphor is a studied characteristic of the dialogue of the Greek drama; and the employment of this graceful figure of rhetoric, and charming poetical medium, was confined to the Odes, which, by contrast no less than by sympathy, were made to soften while they heightened the effect, and promoted the development of the action. As, then, the musical treatment of the dialogue is intended to enforce the excitement of the dramatic action, so the musical rendering of the episodes is designed to soften the relief of the points of repose with which it is interspersed. Again, as in the accompanied dialogue there is little or no scope for rhythmical regularity, so in the Odes we have the contrast of continuous movement and unbroken melody, which is the metaphor of music. The composer's obstacle in treating these has been the enormous number of words, and the necessity of comprising them within such limits as the exigencies of the stage and the impatience, most natural to their situation, of a theatrical audience impose. Each Ode has words enough to form the text of an oratorio; and yet the minutes, the seconds, of the duration of each must be counted. The difficulty of constructing rhythmical melodies and symmetrical compositions, without repeating words and recurring to passages, may be easily conceived; and it is obvious that such repetitions and recurrences would lengthen the music far beyond all practical availability. This difficulty having been mastered completely and successfully by Mendelssohn betokens the most consummate judgment and the greatest fluency; and a musical interest is produced which eminently fulfils the requirements of the situation.

Let us proceed to trace the course of the action of the tragedy, and to examine, scene by scene, its musical illustration.

MOZART'S DON JUAN IN BERLIN SINCE 1790.

On the 20th December, 1790, Don Juan was represented in Berlin for the first time, and on the 20th December, 1853, for the three hundredth time. On the first night the opera was cast as follows: Don Juan—Lippert; Ottavio—Benda: The Commandant — Kazelitz; Leporello — Unzelmann; Masetto — Brandel; Anna — Madame Unzelmann-Bethmann: Elvira—Müller; Zerlina—Baranius-Rietz (who died only last year). We extract the following particulars, as the most interesting, from the statistical notice of L. Rellstab, in the Bossische Zeitung:

Lippert played Don Juan thirty times; Beschort (from 1796-1815) fifty-six times; Blume (1812-1830) one hundred and one times; Joseph Fischer eleven times; Bötticher sixty-one times; and Salomon thirteen times. Five artists, among whom was Wild, appeared as "stars" in the part.

After Benda, Ambrosch sang Ottavio (up to 1804); Eunicke fifty-five times (up to 1819); Stümer fifty times (up to 1830); Bader twenty-three times; Mantius (1832 to 1853) eighty-two times; and Pfister eleven times.

Zschiesche has sung the Commandant ninety-eight times.

Unzelmann sang Leporello eighty times; then Gern (the father); Joseph Fischer; Wauer, ninety-nine times; and Krause, forty-seven times.

Masetto was first sung by Brandel; then by Franz, Seidel, etc.; Wauer, thirty-three times; Rebenstein, Ed. Devrient, seventy-one times; and Mickler, forty-five times.

Donna Anna was first sung by Madame Unzelmann-Bethmann, twenty-two times; and then by Margaretha Schick (1794 to 1808), forty-nine times; Madame Müller, sixteen times; Schmalz, twenty-eight times (1810 to 1819); Schulz, forty-three times (1820 to 1829); Von Fassmann, twenty-seven times; Köster, nineteen times; and Johanna Wagner seven times. Altogether there have appeared in this part eighteen ladies engaged at the Hof-Theater (Theatre Royal), and eight-and-thirty from other theatres. Among the latter, the following are more particularly worthy of notice: Fräulein Grünbaum (called the German Catalani), four times (1817 and 1824); Henrietta Sontag, three times (1827 and 1830); Wilhelmina Schröder-Devrient, six times (1831 and 1834); Carl, Lutzer, Schodel, Fischer-Achten, Schoberlechner, Hasselt-Barth, Jenny Lind, five times (1845 and 1846); Viardot Garcia, five times (1847 and 1848); Behrend-Brand, Küchenmeister-Rudersdorf, and Bochkolz-Falconi, four times (1853).

Elvira was first played by Madame Müller (as Fräulein Hellmuth) sixty-five times (up to 1808); and then by Fräulein Lanz, fifteen times; Schulz, twenty-five times; Leist, ten times; Madame Milder-Hauptmann, forty-three times (1820 to 1829); Carl, eight times; Von Schützel, three times; Seidler, eleven times; Fräulein Hedwig Schulz, fourteen times; Von Fassmann, six times; Marx, fourteen times; and Fräulein Berxendorf, now Madame Bötticher, thirty-seven times. Among the ladies from other theatres, we may mention Nanette Schechner, twice (1827 and 1829); Clara Heinefetter, three times; Fräulein Spatzer (Palm), seven times; and Augusta Löwe.

Zerlina was first sung by the celebrated Baranius (afterwards Madame Rietz) twenty-seven times; then by Madame Eunicke, forty-nine times (up to 1815); by her daughter Johanna (afterwards Madame Krüger) thirty-nine times; Madame Seidler thirteen times; Fräulein von Schätzel thirteen times; Fräulein Grünbaum (afterwards Madame Bercht) thirty-seven times; and Fräulein Tuczeck, fifty-one times. It is a remarkable circumstance that only four ladies from other theatres have sung the part of Zerlina at Berlin; among these were Madame Neumann-Haitzinger, and Fräulein Lina Roser, the present Madame Balfe.

What a brilliant list of singers, especially ladies, to have appeared in Don Juan, in one German theatre, in the course of sixty-three years!

MENDELSSOHN AND BERLIOZ.*

(From Berlioz' "Musical Tour in Germany," 1843.)

To Stephen Heller.

On quitting Weimar, the musical city which I could most easily visit was Leipsic. Yet I hesitated about going, in spite of the dictatorship with which Mendelssohn was invested, and of the friendly relations that united us at Rome, in 1831. We had followed since that epoch such diverging lines in Art, that I confess I feared I should not find very lively sympathy in him. Chélard, however, who knew him, made me blush at my own doubts, and I wrote to Mendelssohn. I had not to wait long for an answer; here it is:—

"My Dear Berlioz—I thank you heartily for your good letter, and for your still cherishing the memory of our Roman friendship! As for me, I never shall forget it, and I rejoice that I shall soon be able to tell you so vivâ voce. All that I can do to render your sojourn at Leipsic happy and agreeable, I shall regard as a pleasure and a duty. I think I can assure you that you will be contented with the city, that is to say, with the musicians and the public. I was not willing to write you without consulting several persons who knew Leipsic better than I do, and they have all confirmed me in the opinion that you will have an excellent concert. The expenses for orchestra, hall, advertisements, etc., will be about 110 crowns: the receipts may amount to from 600 to 800. You ought to be here to arrange the programme, and whatever else is necessary, at least ten days beforehand. Furthermore, the directors of the Society of Subscription Concerts charge me to ask you if you are willing to have one of your works performed in the concert to be given on the 22nd of February, for the benefit of the poor of the city. I hope you will accept their proposition after the concert which you will give on your own account. I beg you, then, to come here as soon as you can leave Weimar. I rejoice that I shall be able to clasp you by the hand and bid you welcome to Germany. Do not laugh at my bad French, as you did at Rome, but continue to be my good friend, as you were then, and I shall ever be your devoted "FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY."

How could I resist an invitation couched in such terms?

I set out for Leipsic, not without regretting Weimar and the new friends I left there.

My connection with Mendelssohn began at Rome in rather a singular manner. At our first interview he spoke to me of my cantata, Sardanapalus, which had been crowned at the Institute of Paris, and of which my co-laureate,* Montfort, had let him hear some portions. When I expressed to him my aversion to the first Allegro of the said Cantata: "Yes, yes," he exclaimed, joyfully, "I congratulate you upon your taste. I was sure you would not be satisfied with that Allegro; frankly, it is miserable! We were nearly quarrelling the next day because I spoke with enthusiasm of Gluck. He replied to me in a tone of raillery and surprise—"Ah! you like Gluck?"—as though he meant: "How can a musician, such as you seem to me, have enough elevation of ideas, or an appreciation of grandeur of style and truth of expression sufficient to enable you to like Gluck?" I had an opportunity, however, to avenge myself for this taunt. I had brought with me from Paris the air of Asteria, from the Italian opera Telemaco, which is very little known. A manuscript copy of this, without the name of the author, was placed on Montfort's pianoforte, one day when we expected a visit from Mendelssohn. He came. Seeing the music, which he took to be a fragment from some modern Italian opera, he set to work, as a matter of duty, to execute it; and the four last bars, on the words, "O giorno! O dolce sguardi! O rimembranza! O amor!" where the musical accent is truly sublime, he parodied in a grotesque fashion, counterfeiting the voice and manner of Rubini. I stopped him, and with an air of affected surprise, said:

"Ah! you don't like Gluck!"

"What! Gluck!"

"Alas! yes, my dear friend, this piece is Gluck's, and not Bellini's, as you thought. You see I am of your opinion . . more so even than yourself!"

He never pronounced the name of Sebastian Bach without ironically adding—"your little pupil!" In short, he was a very porcupine whenever there was talk of music; one knew not on which side to take him, to avoid getting wounded. Endowed with an excellent temper, a sweet and charming humour, he easily bore contradiction upon any other subject; and I, in my turn, abused his tolerance in our philosophical and religious discussions.

One evening we were exploring the baths of Caracalla, discussing the merits and demerits of human actions, and their remuneration during life. As I replied with some irreverence, I knew not what, to his religious and orthodox opinions, Mendelssohn's foot slipped, and down he rolled among the ruins of a declivitous staircase. "Admire divine justice," said I, helping him to rise—"It is I who scoff, and you who fall!" This, accompanied with unrestrained laughter, was more than he could bear; and from that time religious discussions were avoided between us.

It was at Rome that, for the first time, I appreciated that fine and delicate musical tissue, variegated with such rich colours, which bears the name of Overture to Fingal's Cave. Mendelssohn had just finished it, and gave me a pretty exact idea of it; such was his prodigious skill in reproducing on the piano the most complicated scores. Often, on days that weighed us down with the sirocco, I would interrupt him in his labours (for he was an indefatigable producer). He would lay down his pen with a good grace, and seeing me overcome with spleen, he would try to solace me, by playing whatever I asked for from the works of the great masters whom we both loved. How many times, lazily stretched upon his sofa, have I sung the air from Iphigenia in Tauris—"D'une image, helas! trop chérie"—which he accompanied upon the piano. "That is beautiful—beautiful!" he would exclaim. "I could hear it from morning to night—always—always!" And we recommenced. He was very fond also of making me hum in a low voice, and in that same horizontal position, some melodies I had written to verses of Moore, which pleased him. Mendelssohn has always had a great esteem for my . . . . . little songs. After a month of this intercourse, which finished by becoming so full of interest for me, Mendelssohn disappeared without bidding me adieu, and I did not see him again. His letter, which I have just quoted, caused me, on that account, a very agreeable surprise. It revealed a kindness of heart and an amenity of manner which I had not believed him to possess. I soon found, however, on arriving at Leipsic, that these excellent qualities were actually his. He has lost none of the inflexible rigour of his opinions on Art; but he does not attempt to impose them upon others; and limits himself rather, in the exercise of his functions of chapel-master, to the production of what he considers beautiful, and the neglect of that which seems to him bad, or of a pernicious example. His partiality, nevertheless, is too uniformly shewn for the dead.

The Society of Subscription Concerts, of which he had spoken to me, is numerous and admirably conducted. It possesses a magnificent Academy of Singing, an excellent orchestra, and a hall, that of the Gewandhaus, of perfect sonority. It was in this large and beautiful building that I was to give my concert. I went there as soon as I got out of the carriage; and I arrived in the midst of a general rehearsal of a new work of Mendelssohn—The Walpurgis Night. I was marvellously struck at the outset, with the timbre of the voices, the intelligence of the singers, the precision and verve of the orchestra, and, above all, with the splendour of the composition. I am strongly inclined to regard this secular oratorio as the most finished composition that Mendelssohn has produced up to this day.* The poem, which is Goethe's, has nothing in common with the Sabbath of the Witches in Faust; it is founded on a legend of the early Christians, relating to the nocturnal assemblies on the mountains of a religious sect, who remained faithful to Druidical customs at a time when sacrificing in high places had been interdicted. It was their habit, on nights destined to their holy ceremonies, to station in the mountain passes a great number of armed sentinels, in strange and terrible disguises; when the priest, ascending to the altar, began to intone the sacred hymn, the troop of feigned devils, brandishing pitchforks and torches, began to utter all sorts of hideous cries and noises in order to hide the voices of the choir and frighten away the Christian soldiers and other profane intruders whose purpose it might be to interrupt the proceedings. From this, no doubt, sprang the French use of the word "Sabbath" (Sabbat) as a synonyme for a great uproar at night. To form any notion of the varied opportunities which Goethe's poem presents to a composer of imagination, the music of Mendelssohn should be heard; he has, indeed, turned the subject to admirable account; his score, in spite of its intricacy and elaboration, is perfectly clear and intelligible; and the vocal and instrumental effects, which seem to cross, counteract, and jostle against each other in every conceivable way, present an order out of disorder which realises the highest perfection of art. I must especially cite, as magnificent things in opposite styles, that mysterious piece, where the posting of the sentinels is accomplished, and the final chorus, where the voice of the priest at intervals raises itself, calm and religious, above the infernal fracas of pretended sorcerers and demons. I know not what to praise most in this finale—the orchestra, the chorus, or the whirlwind impetuosity of the whole. It is a masterpiece. At the instant when Mendelssohn, full of joy at having written it, descended from the orchestra, I advanced to meet him, in raptures at having heard it. The moment for our interview could not have been happier, yet, after exchanging the first few words, the same sad thought came to us simultaneously.

"Why," exclaimed Mendelssohn, "it is twelve years!—twelve years since we dreamed together in the Campagna at Rome!"

"And," I retorted, "in the baths of Caracalla."

"Ah!" said he, "still a scoffer—always ready to mock!"

"No, no," I answered, "I have given up railing. I wished to test your memory, and find out if you had pardoned me. So little am I disposed to mockery, that now, at our first interview, I am going to entreat you with great earnestness to make me a bequest, to which I attach the utmost value."

"What may that be?"

"The baton with which you have just conducted the rehearsal of your new work."

"Willingly, on condition that you send me yours."

"I shall be giving brass for gold; no matter, I consent."

And the musical sceptre of Mendelssohn was mine. The next day I sent him my heavy oak stick, with the following note, which I trust the Last of the Mohicans would not have disowned:—

"To Chief Mendelssohn!

"Great Chief! We have promised to exchange tomahawks! Here is mine! Mine is larger—thine is simpler! But only squaws and pale faces love ornamented weapons. Be my brother!

"When the Great Spirit shall have sent us to hunt in the land of spirits, may the warriors hang up our tomahawks together in the Hall of Council!"

Such, in all simplicity, was the occurrence, which innocent malice has attempted to render melo dramatic. Mendelssohn, when we came to the organisation of my concert a few days after, really acted like a brother in my behalf. The first artist whom he presented to me as his Fidus Achates was concert master David, an eminent musician, a composer of merit, and a distinguished violinist. David, who speaks French perfectly, was of great service to me.

[To be concluded in our next.]

Wednesday Evening Concerts.—Owing to the extreme inclemency of the weather, the concert announced for last Wednesday was put off. On the same night, a line of carriages extended from the Princess's Theatre to Regent Street one way, and to New Oxford Street the other. The attraction was Mr. Charles Kean's Hamlet.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER I.

1756-1762.

John Chrysostom Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was born on the 27th January, 1756, in Salzburg, the capital of the Archbishop's See, which was named after it. He was the youngest of seven children, of whom he and his sister, who was his senior by five years, were the only ones who lived to grow up. Before proceeding any further with our subject, however, we may be allowed to say a few words concerning Mozart's father, who is well worthy of being noticed, and who, besides, plays an important part in this biography. Leopold Mozart, who was Vice-Capellmeister of the then Archbishop of Salzburg, was so remarkable both as a man and an artist, that from his disposition, his mind, his religious feeling, and his manifold and, in my opinion, his rare store of knowledge for a musician of those days, he would have been an ornament to any profession or position whatever. He was fond of literature, and understood Latin, as well as several living languages. His method for the violin, by which almost all the German virtuosi of the last century formed themselves, several compositions for the church, which are, with reason, highly esteemed, and a great mastery over his principal instrument—the violin—sufficiently testify the wide scope and profundity of his musical talents. His chief merit, however, consisted in his excellent method of tuition, for his son never had any other teacher of the pianoforte or of composition than him.

From the correspondence which Leopold Mozart kept up with his family, it is an easy task to form a perfect estimate of his character. He was a German to the backbone—serious, deliberative, methodical, industrious, and exceedingly economical—fond of order, and accustomed to hold the reins of his domestic affairs with a tight hand; a man of untiring perseverance and upright feeling. In the presence of the great personages with whom his avocations brought him in contact during a period of so many years, he invariably observed a respectful demeanour, without however in the least forgetting what was due to himself; while towards persons in his own station he was reserved, and, although always polite, cold. No one entertained a loftier idea of art and the high mission of an artist than he; but in spite of this, he set a greater value upon the outward demonstrations of applause on the part of the public than on any other kind of acknowledgment by which they are accustomed to manifest their satisfaction. The positive and the present touched him more nearly than the feeling of uncertainty as to how posterity would judge. Among the qualities which were natural to him, we must not forget to mention great penetration and sharpness. In all matters in which his interest was concerned, Leopold Mozart displayed a remarkable degree of skill in penetrating the motives by which others were actuated; and we frequently find him disposed to imagine some hidden purpose at work in cases where none such existed. In everything that he undertook he invariably manifested the most anxious caution. For instance, in the letters which he wrote to his wife during his stay in Italy, he always avoided informing her what the amount of his receipts was; because a woman can never be silent about things of this description, and because, as he said, the good people of Salzburg, who were not in a position to form a correct idea of his travelling and other expenses, would, if they knew the amount of his income, look upon him as richer than he really was. Although in his correspondence he always avoided touching upon political subjects, he possessed a system of ciphers of his own invention, which was very difficult to be understood, and which he employed whenever he had occasion to speak of his relations with people of high rank. Without this diplomatic precaution he would never have ventured to inform a friend, that: his archbishop had treated him badly and paid him worse.

My readers will be convinced by what I have here stated, if they were not previously acquainted with the fact, that the composer of Don Juan could not much resemble so perfect a specimen of a thorough-going respectable citizen. They will, on the other hand, observe the individuality of the son develope itself in a spirit of the most strongly marked contrast to that of the father; for the two had nothing in common save that frankness and probity for which both were so honourably distinguished. But these contrasts, both in disposition and feeling, between two beings whose capabilities were so different, while a mutual and closer connection was absolutely necessary to both, proved, after all, nothing more than the most perfect accord between the means and the end. The sum of the capabilities of the one represented unalloyed Genius, the incarnation of the Musical Art, the rich stores of transcendental ideas become flesh and blood. The sum of the capabilities of the other represented, as the reader will eventually perceive, all that was absolutely requisite to raise this Genius to the highest pinnacle of the most perfect power of accomplishment, rendering the transformation of these transcendental ideas into a multitude of chefs-d'œuvre practicable. The son could not have had a father more suited to the peculiar bent of his mind.

The position filled by Leopold Mozart in the Archbishop's orchestra occupied a large portion of his time, although the pay was barely sufficient to defray the expenses of his household. Musical tuition and the sale of his works made up what was wanting, and enabled him to provide for his own support and that of his family. As a natural consequence, this kind of life left him but few leisure moments; but scholars and music publishers were forgotten from the moment that little Wolfgang began to stammer forth the heavenly language which no mortal was ever destined to speak as he did. His father would willingly have forgotten his official duties as well as all his others, had he been able to watch over the progress of his boy without being necessitated to provide for his support. We must not forget that Leopold Mozart was a Roman Catholic with his whole soul; he was, therefore, immediately decided as to whom he should ascribe the wonder which he beheld; he instantly recognized in the child what we acknowledge at the present day; and, being perfectly convinced that Providence had chosen him as the means of bringing forward an extraordinary phenomenon, he devoted his whole being to the fostering of the wonderful flower which the grace of Heaven had suffered thus to bloom for him.

As we have already said, Wolfgang had an elder sister, and her talent, which was as precocious as his own, would have excited far more astonishment in the world had it not been eclipsed by that of her brother. Anna Maria, called by her family Nannerl, was seven years old when her father began to teach her the piano. Wolfgang was then three years old. Up to that period nothing particular had been remarked in him, save a certain impetuous liveliness of disposition, and a great love for all kinds of games, which far outbalanced the desire for dainties common to children of his age; he had likewise always displayed great sensitiveness; every moment he would ask the inmates and friends of the house whether they loved him, and, if they said they did not, he would instantly begin to cry. But from the day on which Nannerl took her first lesson the boy became a totally different being. Excited and attentive to what was going on, he would wait until there was no one at the piano and then sit down and practise. If he were not disturbed, he would pass whole hours in finding out thirds, and his countenance would beam with delight if he succeeded in producing an harmonious chord. His father observed all this without knowing whether to attach any value to it or no, but he resolved to make a trial. A very short minuet was placed before the boy, and in half-an-hour he played it so roundly and in such perfect time as to fulfil every expectation. For rather longer pieces of music he required an hour, and scarcely had a year elapsed ere Wolfgang dictated to his teacher pieces which he himself had imagined: he composed before he could write a note.* Two years later the boy might have been numbered among the good piano-forte players of the day.

His teacher, who was in the highest degree astounded and almost alarmed at such progress, endeavoured rather to keep him back than urge him forward: he did not dare to make him acquainted at so early an age with the rules of composition. Vain caution! Already did the plan of a piano-forte concerto busy the young head, which, at a subsequent period, was destined to perfect and fix the true rules of the art, as well as to reject so many principles which had previously obtained, and for so long a time been supported by the authority of the most celebrated theorists. Wolfgang began, therefore, writing his concerto, but an unexpected obstacle arose and threatened to prevent his carrying out his project. As he was always in the habit of dipping his pen to the very bottom of the inkstand, instead of notes he produced nothing but so many large blots. This troubled him exceedingly; he cried; but still would not allow it to stop him; he wiped away the blots with his open hand, and, entirely absorbed with the idea in his head, continued writing. What sort of an appearance the music paper presented we leave the reader to imagine. His father, who knew nothing of Wolfgang's purpose, stepped at this moment, accompanied by a friend, into the room.

"What are you doing there?" he asked.

"I am writing a piano-forte concerto; the first part is almost finished," replied Wolfgang.

"Let me look at it; it is a pretty piece of work, I have no doubt," said his father.

"No, no! it is not finished," answered the boy.

His father took it away from him, however, and at the first sight of such a piece of scribbling burst into a loud fit of laughter. But when he came to examine the composition more attentively, his countenance assumed a totally different expression; tears of joy and astonishment trickled down his cheeks.

"See," he said to his friend; "see here; everything is rightly planned and according to rule, but it is of no use, because it is so exceedingly difficult."

* All these particulars are authentic. Herr Von Nissen has noted down in chronological order all the pieces of music which Leopold Mozart taught his son, as well as those which, at a later period, the scholar dictated to his master.

"What of that—it is a concerto," cried the little composer, who believed that playing a concerto and working miracles signified one and the same thing. "It must be practised until it is mastered. Look, this is it."

He now commenced playing, and although he was not, of course, perfectly successful, managed at any rate to play sufficient to give his audience an idea of what he intended. The concerto was in reality impracticable, but quite correct, and written for a full orchestra with trumpets and drums.*

Not only in music, however, but in everything that he was taught, did little Wolfgang distinguish himself, displaying particular aptitude for mathematics, a science so nearly allied to musical genius; he subsequently, in fact, calculated with great facility, and worked out the most intricate arithmetical questions in his head. His memory, of which he gave some exceedingly remarkable proofs, was, indeed, as marvellous as his genius.

Our hero was entering upon his sixth year when Leopold Mozart thought that both his scholars were sufficiently advanced in the art for him to appear with them before the public, and a far more brilliant public than that of the town and court of Salzburg.

FOREIGN.

PARIS, January 1.—The Académie Impériale de Musique was honoured by the presence of the Emperor and Empress on the occasion of the benefit of M. Lepeintre, on Tuesday last. In the third act of the Bénéficiaire, Battaille, who played the part of the singer, gave the air from the Châlet with remarkable effect. Gueymard has met with a disagreeable accident. His hairdresser, who was about to curl his hair, finding the irons too hot, while waving them to and fro in the air to cool them, accidentally struck him on the forehead and narrowly escaped injuring his eyes.—At the Théâtre Italien, on Thursday last, Ernani was revived for the rentrée of Madame Nissen, in the part of Elvira, a bold effort, considering the éclat which Sophie Cruvelli had given to the character. Madame Nissen, who was excessively nervous, was very much applauded in the cabaletta of the aria d'intrata, "Ernani involami." She has a mezzo soprano voice, stronger in the higher than in the lower register, the medium notes being good. She is a sensible actress, and manages her voice with skill. Gardoni came out as Ernani with great force. His voice was so sympathetic and pure, and his style so graceful, that he could not fail to engage the interest of his audience. Graziani, who possesses a baritone voice of power and quality, obtained a decided success. The finale of the third act was encored and repeated.—At the Théâtre Lyrique, yesterday evening, the first representation of Donizetti's opera of Elisabeth took place. A new fairy opera, in three acts, written by M. Clairville, the music by J. B. Wekerlin, will shortly be put into rehearsal. Nearly all the best artists will appear in it.—Louis Lacombe, the composer, has gone to Leipzic, where he has been invited by the Society of the Gewandhaus. He will shortly return to Paris.—Mons. N. Louis, a dramatic composer, has lately married Madlle. Jenny Leroy.

* Mr. Holmes, whose biography of Mozart, a work written with great care, appeared in 1840, remarks, in connection with this passage, that a score for a full orchestra with trumpets and kettle-drums, is only a little biographical flourish on the part of Nissen, who had no need to invent a wonder of this description. All the scores which were written by Wolfgang before he attained his tenth year, and which have come down to us, are calculated for practical use, and in no way bear the stamp of ostentation. As a general rule, he seldom employed any wind instruments save oboes, bassoons, and horns, with which indeed the orchestras of that day were better provided than with any other instruments of a similar description.

BERLIN, 22nd December.—The day before yesterday a great event came off at the Theatre of the Grand Opera. The Don Juan of Mozart was performed for the 300th time. It was exactly the same day, 63 years before, that the first representation of this chef-d'œuvre took place in Berlin. The evening began with a prologue, preceded by the overture to Idomeneo, by Mozart. The stage represented a magnificent salle, the extremity of which was hidden by rich curtains. The principal régisseur, M. Stawinski, delivered a discourse. The curtains were then drawn aside, and a garden was seen, in which were placed tableaux vivants, representing groups from the seven principal operas of Mozart.—Idomeneo (1780), L'Enlèvement du Sérail (1782), The Marriage of Figaro (1787), Don Juan (1787), Cosi fan tutte (1790), Die Zauberflöte (1791), and La Clemenza di Tito (1791). The groups were arranged so that that of Don Juan formed the centre. During this exhibition the chorus of Isis and Osiris, from Die Zauberflöte, was sung behind the scenes. At the end of this chorus, the heavens appeared to open, and the statue of Mozart was displayed in radiant glory. The statue was an imitation of that by Schwanthaler, at Salzburg—the birthplace of the immortal composer. At the foot of the statue was a cradle, surrounded by the muses, in allusion to the extraordinary precocity of Mozart's genius. This apotheosis was received with unanimous applause, and, after the fall of the curtain, the audience redemanded it. The curtain was then raised, and showers of bouquets were immediately thrown from all parts of the house, and fell on the stage amidst thunders of applause. The Don Juan, in which every part was played by a first-rate artist, was given with a spirit and ensemble that enchanted the audience. Madlle. Johanna Wagner, who played the part of Donna Anna, was recalled at the end no less than six times.—At Kroll's, Auber's Fra Diavolo has been well performed.—At a concert in the Royal Theatre, the clarionettist, Cavallini, shewed himself worthy of the reputation that preceded him.—Joachim, the violinist, will play at one of the next concerts of the Society of Gustavus Adolphus, and Madlle. Lind (Goldschmidt) is expected to sing on the same evening.

COLOGNE.—The fourth Gesellschafts-Concert took place in Cologne on Tuesday, the 20th December last. It commenced with Haydn's Symphony in D major. This was followed by the 24th Psalm of Schneider, in memory of the deceased composer, who breathed his last on the 23rd November. The first part was brought to a conclusion by Joseph Joachim, who played his Concertstück for the violin in the most masterly manner. The second part opened with a new overture to Phædra, composed by Ferdinand Hiller, and played on this occasion for the first time. It was highly successful, and greatly applauded. After the overture came two "Christmas Songs," by Leonhart Schrüter, composed in the year 1587; they found great favour with the audience, and were followed by Beethoven's grand violin-concerto, which Joachim played in his very finest style, and held the hearts of all present completely entranced by the wonderful skill of his execution. Whenever a pause in the composition gave the audience an opportunity of applauding, they did so most enthusiastically. The concert terminated with Spontini's overture to Olympia, excellently played.

IBID.—A Soirée for the benefit of Herr Clef, formerly stage-manager of the Vaudeville-Theater, took place on the 22nd December last. Messrs. Joachim, Hillier, and Koch kindly volunteered their services upon the occasion. Joachim first played a Romance of his own composition, followed by some Variations by Paganini, and then, with Ferdinand Hiller, a Sonata by J. S. Bach (E major), three Studies by Hiller, for the piano and violin, and Beethoven's grand Sonata in A minor. Koch sang some songs by F. Schubert, Nicolai, and R. Schumann (Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn), and likewise Beethoven's Adelaide.

LILLE.—The Association Lilloise gave a vocal and instrumental concert, on Wednesday, the 21st ult. The music of the 6th regiment executed La chasse espagnole, a military fantasia, by M. Elwart. M. M. Lefebvre and Arnold sang several melodies by this composer; among others, a romance, entitled "The Three Fine Days in the Life of a Soldier," was especially admired.

MILAN, 7th and 8th Dec.—At the Teatro Carcano, Rigoletto was performed before a crowded audience. Between the acts, Madame Lemaire sang the rondo finale from Cenerentola, and obtained an encore. The succeeding evening, a repetition of the performance merited a renewal of the same success. Madame Lemaire was twice called forward at the conclusion. In Nabucco, given on the 13th, Madame Lemaire took the part of Fenena, and acquitted herself with much honour: she sang the romance with purity of style and sweetness of expression, and was warmly applauded. She is a pupil of the well-known Maestro Celli.

PARMA.—The Prophète was produced here on the 28th Dec., with great success.

NICE.—Alexandre Batta, the violoncellist, is here, after narrowly escaping shipwreck on his passage from Marseilles, which he left on the 18th December during fine weather. A hurricane arose during the night, and left the vessel for two days in a most perilous position. The cargo being thrown overboard, the ship righted and arrived at Nice after a four days' passage. The passage from Marseilles to Nice is generally made in twelve hours.

ANTWERP.—Madame Doria appeared for the first time at the Grand Opera, on Friday, the 30th ult., in Lucrezia Borgia. Apathetic and severe as the good Flemish burghers are known to be, they were roused on this occasion, not only by Madame Doria's singing, but by Madame Doria's acting. No success could have been more decided than that of Madame Doria.

NEW YORK.—The last news from the states informs us that the second series of Jullien's concerts are going on triumphantly. A new German Opera Company has been formed with a view to give performances at 25 cents. in the chief cities of America.

Meyerbeer's Prophète continues to draw large audiences at Niblo's.

BOSTON.—Madame Sontag has announced three concerts, at 50 cents., being desirous that an opportunity should be given to the public at large of hearing her, previous to her retirement. She will be assisted by Signor Rocco, Paul Jullien, and Alfred Jaell.—The announcement of the sudden death by apoplexy of Jonas Chickering, Esq., the well-known pianoforte manufacturer, has been received with deep sorrow throughout the entire community. He was one of our most industrious, enterprising, and benevolent citizens, and at the head of his profession. His name is probably more widely known than any other mechanic in the country. When his extensive warerooms were destroyed by fire, there was a general expression of sympathy on the part of the public, which attested the affectionate estimation in which he was held. At the time of his decease he was more extensively engaged in business than at any former period; but death has arrested him in the midst of his plans and labours, and he now lives only in the records and memorials of his noble example and generous deeds. Mr. Chickering was buried from Trinity Church, and a large concourse, from all trades and professions, was present at the service.

Madame Sontag gave a concert last week at the Music Hall, to the children and teachers of the public schools of the city. The hall was filled. Madame Sontag was assisted by Paul Jullien, Alfred Jaell, and Signor Rocco. At the close the children sang a tribute to Madame Sontag and dispersed.

LOUISVILLE.—Ole Bull gave a concert in Louisville on Thursday evening, December 8th, at Mozart Hall.

BALTIMORE AND PITSBURG are the next destinations of the eccentric violinist.

LIMA.—Catherine Hayes has met with great success in operatic performances.

MRS. ALEXANDER NEWTON.—This fair lady and excellent songstress, having lately been led to the hymeneal altar, as we have already announced, is about to appear in the musical world in the name of her caro sposo. Mrs. Alexander Newton will cede to Madame Newton Frodsham. It is the intention of Madame Newton Frodsham to visit Germany in the autumn, professionally, for a short time. The lady will appear for the first time as Madame Newton Frodsham, in Birmingham, on the 19th inst., at Mr. H. Poole's Concerts.

MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Music, in England, I make bold to assert is, at the present time, in a riper state of progress than in any other country. Grant we have no genius—that is, genius for composition—to boast of. What other country has? Italy? No. The last "genius" was the artistically effete, though still living, Rossini. France? Auber is seventy years of age; and the rest are, at the best, his myrmidons. Germany? Worse than all. Mendelssohn is dead; Spohr is a septuagenarian; and their places are boldly usurped by men like Richard Wagner and Robert Schumann, who are to music something less than were Paracelsus to medicine, Aquinas to theology, and Vanini to philosophy. In the matter of genius—in other words, of original invention—England is no worse off than the rest of the great musical countries of the civilised world.

But that is not exactly the question. The question is: in what are we superior to our contemporaries? At a mere glance we shall appear to have considerably the worst of it. Italy possesses a national opera, good, bad, or indifferent, in almost every town—two, and even three, indeed, in some. France can boast of three great and efficient lyrical establishments in its metropolis, and of one of more or less resources wherever there is a population large enough to support a theatre; while, in several instances, they are complete and powerful—as in Marseilles, Lyons, Bordeaux, etc. Germany is even more to be envied, since it possesses lyrical theatres throughout the length and breadth of the land, the majority of them first-rate. At all these Italian, French, and German theatres, although foreign compositions are not interdicted, the staple commodity is derived from the national talent, past and present, born and nourished in the respective countries. In France, and still more in Germany, besides these operatic theatres, there are a vast number of institutions—of which the Société des Concerts, in Paris, and the Gewandhaus Subscription Concerts, at Leipsic, may be cited as examples—established chiefly for the purpose of presenting, with as much effect as possible, the orchestral and other instrumental works of the great masters. Where, then, can England be considered musically superior to the rest of Europe? In what, next to inventive genius, is of the very first importance—in taste and judgment.

How, it will be asked, have the taste and judgment of this country been created and developed?

The English musicians, up to this moment, have been imitators—with some exceptions scarcely worth mentioning, since their influence on the progress and development of the art has been insignificant. We cannot assert, with any show of reason, that Purcell and Bishop, with all their undoubted originality, have had any hand in the various stages by which music has reached its maturity. It would, indeed, be absurd to pretend to such a distinction in favour of our English composers, and impossible to establish it by proof. Let us be satisfied with our destiny. England, originally composed of many peoples, has come to be the greatest and most powerful nation of the globe. English music, formed out of similarly heterogeneous elements, must inevitably attain a like supremacy.

We have not yet been blessed with one great genius in the musical art. We have had many masters, and have some now, who know more of their art, in all probability, than any of the continental musicians; but we have not had one great genius—one who, like Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, or Mendelssohn, could say with confidence, "I am the actual representative of the art!" Not one. We have not even possessed a man who, like Rossini, Weber, Meyerbeer, or Auber, could say with confidence, "I represent what is at present the popular feeling of the art!" Not one.

But of one thing be assured. The next phenomenon of music will be of English birth. I do not say this lightly. I am intimately convinced of it. We have had more than one "promise." Of these the most remarkable have been Pinto, Bennett, and Macfarren. But fate interposed. Our time had not yet come. It will come, though, and shortly.

I repeat, that, in what ranks next to inventive genius—in taste and judgment—we have, and long have had, the pre-eminence. A success abroad is no guarantee whatever of a success in England. How often and how clearly has this been shown. The greatest of masters have been among us, and we have profited by their lessons. Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn—Weber even—were not here in vain. And why were they here so much? Because they were better understood in London than at home.

But in another letter, with your permission, I will endeavour to support my argument—that music in England is in a riper state of progress than in any other country.

I am, Sir,

Jan. 6, 1854. AN ENGLISH MUSICIAN.

MENDELSSOHN.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, the son of Abraham Mendelssohn, a banker of some consequence at Hamburgh, in Germany, and grandson of the great philosopher and Hebraist, Moses Mendelssohn, was born at Hamburgh, on the 3rd of February, 1809. The house in which he was born is close adjoining the Church of St. Michael. Hamburgh is remarkable as the native place of another musician, Ferdinand David, for many years the friend and brother artist of the subject of this memoir. Felix was the second in age of a family of four children. He had an elder sister, Fanny (the late Madame Henselt), a younger brother, Paul, and a second sister, Rebecca. His mother, whose maiden name was Bartholdy, watched with anxious affection the development of the boy's mind, and in after years he repaid this motherly care with a love and tenderness which the caresses of the world never once weakened or abated.

When the boy had completed his third year, his parents changed their place of residence, and moved to Berlin. Here, under that favourable star, which from the hour of his birth had never suffered him to come in contact with anything common-place or ordinary, his wonderful talents unfolded, and early promised a brilliant future. When only eight years old he played the piano with great facility and execution, and at this tender age he acquired a fine sense of musical criticism, an intuitive power which Zelter called Mendelssohn's "Luchsauge." He discovered, (said that artist) six pure fifths, consecutively, in a movement of Sebastian Bach's, which I should never have found. His ear for music was extraordinary. He detected in a moment, the dissonance of an instrument, or the false intonation of a voice, at a time when the music was loudest, and the great body of sound most likely to drown the discordant part. All these qualities proved him to be in possession of powers quite uncommon to youths of his age, and he was placed under the care of Zelter and Berger, two plain German artists, to be taught his first lessons in composition and pianoforte playing. Zelter called him his best and most promising pupil, when only twelve years old, and his correspondence with Goethe on the boy's progress bears honourable testimony to the warm interest he took in the education of Felix, though it tells of a rather strict and uncompromising management of a very sensitive disposition. The consequence of these letters was a fortunate one for Felix, who was brought to Goethe's especial notice. An introduction to this great man was invaluable, and we cannot doubt that this circumstance contributed in no small degree to strengthen Mendelssohn's love for all that is great, solid, and classical, and his contempt for anything weak or second-rate. It may here be remarked that the publication of Mendelssohn's correspondence with Goethe would be of deep interest to the admirers of musician and poet; at present we must be content to quote short extracts from Zelter's and Goethe's letters, which allude to the mutual interest which the writers took in the boy's progress. Zelter's letters are full of such expressions as, "the youngster plays the piano like the deuce," or, "Felix is still the head man here," and we find him writing to Goethe in the autumn of 1821, announcing his intention of a visit, and a wish to introduce his pupil to the poet—"Before I leave the world I should like to show your face to my Doris, and my best pupil." Accordingly, in the November of the same year, he actually introduced his young favourite to the poet. On the 5th of February, Goethe writes, "Say a good word to Felix, and to his parents. Since you left me my piano is speechless; one solitary attempt to restore it again would be a failure." A friendship once started was destined to be yet more and more influential over Mendelssohn; for from this time Zelter constantly related to Goethe stories of the boy's wonderful powers and application, and the poet's interest in the young musician became daily more intense. On the 8th of February, Zelter writes, "Yesterday evening, Felix completed his fourth opera, with the dialogues, and it was performed in our presence. I must confess my own weakness in attempting to restrain wonder at the amazing progress made by a boy only fifteen years old. There are three acts, which, with two ballets, occupy some two hours and a half in the performance. The work has fairly met with its meed of applause. Original ideas, beautifully expressed, are to be found throughout; there is no want of rhythm, dramatic power, and flow of harmony; it is scored apparently by experienced hands; the orchestral parts are not overloaded, so as to fatigue; nor, on the other hand, can I complain of a mere accompaniment and poverty of instrumentation; the band play it con amore, and yet it is not music to be trifled with. Nothing is omitted, out of place, disjointed, or fragmentary; passion, tenderness, love, and joy, are all in their turn expressed. The overture is a strange production. You would fancy a painter, who, after dashing a quantity of colour indiscriminately on the canvass, and gradually clearing it away from the surface, with finger and brush, produces at last a defined and distinct picture; so that one is the more astonished that anything truthful should appear, after being subjected to such a process." Such is the eulogy of Zelter, and it must be said to his praise, that he seems to have appreciated, from the very first, that variety of thought and expression, so splendidly concentrated, in after years, in such poetical overtures, as that to the Hebrides and others of equal excellence.

"Certainly," continues Zelter, "I speak as a grandfather, who sports his pet grandchild, still I know what I say, and will not expatiate on ideal excellency which I cannot prove. Applause, liberally given by the orchestral and vocal performers, is a sure criterion; and it is easy to see if an indifference and coldness, or a real earnest satisfaction carries the executants through their work; where the composer gives the members of an orchestra something worth interpreting, both parties mutually succeed, and each helps to enjoy the laurels." How entirely have the words of Zelter been realized in the subsequent career of Mendelssohn! It is impossible to forget the enthusiasm shared by the vocal and orchestral members of the Leipzic Society, at the rehearsals of St. Paul, and the Hymn of Praise; or the patience shewn in conquering the extreme difficulties of his overtures, and the music adapted to the Midsummer Night's Dream of Shakspere. There never lived Mendelssohn's rival, as a conductor; at times he praised sincerely, at others blamed, but, whether he smiled or frowned, the orchestra invariably acted in accordance with his suggestion, and the results were sure to justify the wisdom of his choice, and their good sense in adopting it.

In the year 1823, Abraham Mendelssohn travelled, with his son, to Paris, for the express purpose of introducing him to Cherubini. This step showed an honourable distrust in popular praise, the object being to inquire, of an undoubted authority, if the son possessed so decided a genius for the art, as to make it worth while to cultivate these powers to a still greater extent. Cherubini encouraged the father to future sacrifices and efforts for the advancement of his son's welfare, and acknowledged unhesitatingly the youth's great ability. On their journey back, the travellers paid Goethe a visit. He writes to Zelter, on the 25th May, 1825, "Felix brought out his first quartet; everybody was thunderstruck; to hear the first performance of a work dedicated to me enhances the pleasure I feel at the compliment; it has done me much good too." In the month of June, he wrote to Mendelssohn himself a "Schönes Liebeschreiben," as Zelter called it, and, in return, Felix presented Goethe with a translation of the Andria of Terence, which he had written under the guidance of his private tutor, Heyse. On the 11th of October, 1826, Goethe writes to Zelter, "Thank the excellent active Felix for his example of earnest practical study; his production, I expect, will be a source of amusement and usefulness to the artists of Weimar, in the long winter evenings before us." In the April of 1829, Moscheles induced Mendelssohn to take a tour through parts of England and Scotland. He had the misfortune, in London, to meet with a trifling accident scarcely worthy note, except as proving how deep an interest was taken in his welfare by one of the greatest men of those days. He happened to be driving through the streets of London with a friend; the gig upset and Mendelssohn, who was thrown out, received a contusion of the knee. Zelter wrote an account of the accident to Goethe, who answered in a letter full of sympathy, "I should like to hear if favourable reports can be given of the worthy Felix; the interest I take in him is great; it is painful to see a man, who has already done so much, endangered, or at least prevented from active work, by an untoward accident, such as you tell me of. Let me hear a more comforting account."

It was now determined that Mendelssohn should journey to Italy; but, before starting, he was honoured by Goethe's hospitality, who entertained him for a whole fortnight. Golden moments those few days must have been to the youthful guest, who was sent on his way rejoicing by the bard himself, who sang of "The land where the citrons bloom." From a letter of Goethe's to Zelter, we see what enjoyment he had derived from Mendelssohn's visit. It is dated June 3rd, 1830. "At half-past five o'clock this morning, with a cloudless sky, and in the most lovely sunshine, the excellent Felix left my house. Ottilia (Goethe's wife), Ulrika (Madame Von Poggwisch), and the children (Walter Goethe, the present composer, etc.) were with him. Felix charmed us here a whole fortnight, and played delightfully. He is now on his way to Jena, there to bind his friends by the same delicious spell. His name, I assure you, will be always remembered with honour amongst us. His society has been of great advantage to me, for my interest and better feelings are always excited when I am listening to music. All historical associations connected with the art are valuable in my judgment; and Felix deserves great praise for his thorough knowledge of the gradations, and several periods in music. From the fact of his possessing a retentive memory, he can perform the chefs-d'œuvre of all the different schools at his own time and pleasure. He first gave me specimens from the Bach epoch, and then brought me back again to Haydn, Mozart, and Gluck, finishing with the great composers of the present day, including his own productions, which make me feel and meditate. He leaves me under the auspices of my best wishes and blessings. Present my respects and congratulations to the worthy parents of this extraordinary young artist." From this time both poet and musician kept up a correspondence, until the death of the former. Goethe constantly alludes to the delightfully-interesting letters of Felix. 4th January, 1831—"You announce to me Felix's visit to Rome, and his prosperous sojourn in that city. Wherever he goes, he must of course meet with the same favourable reception, he unites great powers with such an amiable nature." And on the 31st of March, in the same year: "My chief news is that I have just received a delightful letter from Felix, dated from Rome, 5th of March. It gives me a lively picture of that remarkable young man. I feel quite sure of the success of his coming years: his genius will serve him as a "swimming jacket," to carry him safely over the breakers and stormy seas that always threaten rising greatness." The prophecy of the old king of poets was verified: for at a time when art was on the decline, and weeds growing luxuriously over the ruins, with what an inspired energy did Felix restore what had fallen, and raise a pure classical style on the base of his own original erections. I have laid great stress in the early part of my memoir on Goethe's friendship with Mendelssohn, for it was, as we before stated, a most important period in his career; and (strange to say) most of those who have sketched outlines of his life have neglected the mention of it. Felix was the last scion of an age when German artists of any pretensions acquired excellence, in partially modelling from antiquity, without sacrificing their original power. Goethe, in whom the Grecian element so happily blended with the native German, influenced his friend in this direction by precept and example. The details of Mendelssohn's career will prove the truth of our statement. Let us look at the development of his genius, and return to that period when we left him as a boy under the care of Zelter and Ludwig Berger.

THE JENNY LIND MANIA.—At Boston, a man solemnly announced a tea-kettle, which he christened "The Jenny Lind," from the fact that, the moment it was filled with water and put on the fire it began to sing! The coachman who drove the warbler from the railway to the River House, mounted the steps of the hotel, and, extending his hand, said: "Here's the hand that lifted Jenny Lind out of the coach, gentlemen. You can kiss it, any of you who choose, for five dollars—children half-price!"—Bunn's New England and Old England.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

This society gave the last of three soirées, at Erat's Harp Saloon, on Monday evening. A stringed quartet, by Dr. Steggall, a sonata for piano and violin, by Mr. H. Graves, and a pianoforte quartet in B minor by Mr. C. E. Stephens, were the features. The performers were Messrs. Dorrell, Holmes, Mellish, and Stephens (pianoforte); Watson, Zerbini, and Colchester (violins); Weslake (viola); Guest (violoncello); and Trust (harp). A trio of Ries, for harp and two pianos, was also played; and a selection of vocal pieces was entrusted to Miss Messent, Mrs. Noble, Messrs. Ferrari and Redfearn. Mr. J. T. Cooper was the accompanyist; Mr. H. Graves, the "director."

The Society of British Musicians was instituted in 1834, "for the advancement of native art and artists." It made a brilliant début in the Hanover Square Rooms, with orchestral concerts, on a large scale. A year or two afterwards it settled down in a corner near the Middlesex Hospital, whence it has never since removed.

If the Society of British Musicians can do no better than this, it had better do nothing; since nothing is more incongruous than a sounding title to represent a trifling matter.

ORCHESTRA OF M. SAX.

The following list of the members of M. Adolph Sax's celebrated orchestra is given from Le Menestrel:—

"M. Mohr, chef-d'orchestre and composer. Flute—Brunot, solo; octave flute—Léon Magnier, solo. Oboe—Barthélemy; solo, J. Boulu. Small clarinet—Weber, solo; Lépine, solo. Clarinets—Mimart, solo; Rouillon, Fabre, Parès, Lerouge, Limberger, Barbu, Boutmy, Leudé. Saxophones—Auroux, soprano, solo; Printz, alto solo; Lépine, tenor solo; Delisle, baryton solo; Rose, basso solo. New bass-clarinet—Dupres. Small sax-horns in E flat—Trien, solo, Cahen. Sax-horns contralto in B flat—Schlotmann, solo, Brick. Sax-trombas in E flat—V. Bonnefoy, solo; P. Bonnefoy, F. Bonnefoy, A. Massart. Sax-horns baryton in B flat—Bruneau, Cerclier, jun. MR. G. V. BROOKE'S CHARITY.—We have much pleasure in recording an incident, which illustrates in an eminent degree, the practical benevolence of G. V. Brooke, the comedian. Mr. Brooke is in the habit of dispensing his charity every Christmas to the poor of the locality in which he may happen to be sojourning, and in Belfast he has not forgotten this practice. On Wednesday last, from twelve o'clock until two in the afternoon, he distributed among the poor, at the Donegal Arms, one hundred blankets, with gifts of money, &c. Nor did any sectarian feeling influence him. He divided upwards of one hundred tickets amongst four clergyman, namely, the Right Rev. Dr. Denvir, Rev. Dr. Edgar, Rev. Dr. Cooke, and the Rev. T. F. Millar, vicar of Belfast; and these gentlemen distributed the tickets again to the poor and needy of their respective flocks, and each individual, on presenting a ticket to Mr. Brooke, received a blanket.—Belfast Mercury, Dec. 23.

THE BEALE TOURS.—On the 21st a new and attractive "Beale Party," consisting of Miss Arabella Goddard, Madame Amedei, Mr. Weiss, and M. Sainton, principals, leave London for the provinces. In the following towns concerts will be given, and in something like the following order:—Devizes, Taunton, Torquay, Plymouth, Exeter, Bath, Worcester, Shrewsbury, Ludlow, Hereford, Wolverhampton, Birmingham, Leamington, Henley, Liverpool, Preston, Lancaster, Huddersfield, Bradford, Wakefield, Sheffield, Derby, Cheltenham, Oxford, Cambridge, Norwich, Ipswich, Canterbury, Dover, Maidstone, etc.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Weston's Saturday Evening Concerts continue to attract. A Miss Wood, pupil of Mr. Weston, has debuted there. The young lady has a good voice, but she must study. At the Athenæum, on Tuesday week, a concert was given in the Library Hall, the principal artists being Mrs. Alexander Newton, Miss E. T. Greenfield, the "Black Swan," Mr. Augustus Braham, Mr. Charles Cotton, Miss Ward, piano, and Mr. Distin, senior, trumpet.

IBID.—On Wednesday evening, 28th ult., Mendelssohn's St. Paul was performed at the Concert Hall, under the direction of Mr. Charles Hallé. The principal singers were Miss Birch, Mr. and Mrs. Lockey, and Mr. Weiss. It was what was called "a Choral Dress Concert." The band, as usual, was led by Mr. Seymour, and Mr. W. Barlow presided at the organ. The Manchester Courier, speaking of this performance, says:—"The last performance of this oratorio in this room took place January 11, 1850, when Mr. Benedict officinated as conductor, and Miss Birch, the Misses Williams, Mr. Benson, and Mr. Robinson were the principal singers. The present performance was as successful as circumstances, over which the performers had no control, could allow it to be, but the contracted dimensions of the orchestra never will admit a satisfactory arrangement of the band and chorus. The latter seemed to form an impenetrable barrier to sound, for the first and second violins were scarcely audible, so that other portions of the orchestra, more advantageously placed by being raised above the singers, appeared to have undue prominence. The chorus was very satisfactory, particularly the basses, which came out with great force. The organ, too, appeared, after the alterations, to greater advantage; the pipes, having been allowed more wind, tell out much better, and the rise in the pitch and the equal temperament were quite necessary improvements on account of the band, particularly the wind instruments. That, however, the organ is totally unfit for the position it fills, will be quite evident when we state that it does not contain a single double diapason, the number of stops being eight through stops and two half stops in the great organ, five half stops in the swell, and that one open diapason forms an apology for a pedal organ." The writer bestows some measured praise on the solo singers, and speaks highly of Mr. Lidell in the violoncello accompaniment to one of the songs. He concludes with the following remarks:—"On the whole it is well—the choruses and chorales forming so important a portion of St. Paul, there being twenty of the former and four of the latter—that they were effectively given, for this they certainly were, in spite of the awkward position of the singers. The subscribers to the Concert Hall do not appear to have a great relish for sacred music. On ordinary occasions the hall, as we have frequently stated, is full an hour before the performances commence; on this occasion, on the contrary, at six o'clock very few had indeed arrived. Nor did the room fill afterwards, for, in spite of the accession of children, which always takes place at the Christmas concert, there were vacant places here and there dotted over the body of the hall, and in the gallery some entire benches found no occupants. The oratorio was very properly uninterrupted by expressions of applause, and terminated at ten o'clock. It would have been advisable to have made an interval of five minutes towards the end, perhaps after the chorus "This is Jehovah's temple," for the purpose of affording the numerous parties, who seem to think it unfashionable to remain to the close, an opportunity of retiring without disturbing those who wish to hear the oratorio throughout. The commencement of the last recitative "And though He be offered upon the sacrifice of our faith," seemed a signal for a very general move on the part of the audience, which was not only annoying to those who, like ourselves, desired to listen to the whole of the music, but must have been not at all agreeable to the feelings of Miss Birch."

DEVONPORT INSTITUTE.—The committee of this Institutien have secured the services of Madame Amedei, Madame Weiss, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Land, Miss Arabella Goddard, and M. Sainton, for the only evening open to an engagement in this part of the country. Such a combination of talent will no doubt add to the funds of the Institution.

LIVERPOOL.—On Monday next Mr. Thomas commences his series of nightly Shilling Concerts at the Philharmonic Hall. Mr. Thomas will be assisted, among others, by Messrs. Lazarus, Harper, Blagrove, Streather, &c., as solo performers. There will be overtures, marches, quadrilles, waltzes, and the favourite selection from Robert le Diable—all for one shilling. The concerts will be strictly limited to one month.

MAIDSTONE.—Mr. Ireson's annual entertainment took place on Thursday evening week, and attracted a full audience. The band was excellent. The singing of Miss Thirlwall was greatly admired, and obtained two or three encores. Miss Felton sang one or two pieces prettily. Mr. Suchet Champion was placed at his ease by the reception accorded to his first song. The glees and quartets afforded great pleasure, while a solo on the violin by Mr. Streather, the leader, and another on the contra-basso by Mr. A. C. Rowland, were loudly applauded, the former being encored. A fantasia for violin and pianoforte, by Mr. Streather and Mr. J. Paine, was played in good style. On the whole, the concert reflected credit on Mr. Ireson, both as conductor and as musician.—Maidstone Gazette.

NORTHAMPTON.—The Choral Society in this town gave a performance of Handel's Messiah on the Tuesday in Christmas week; Madame Weiss, Miss Louisa M'Korkell, and Mr. Donald King, being the professional vocalists. Madame Weiss was the soprano, and Miss Louisa M'Korkell the contralto. Mr. Donald King was suffering from a severe hoarseness. Mr. G. J. Hopkins (of the Temple church) presided at the German organ. This instrument told with effect. The power and freshness of its tone, combined with so much depth and singularity, rank this instrument as one of the loudest in England. Founded on an entirely new theory, it presents such new features as to constitute an immense crotchet in the science of organ building, to which few parallel cases are found in this country. Mr. C. M'Korkell was the conductor. The large Music Hall was densely filled.

BATH.—It has been arranged that the gentlemen amateurs of this city shall meet their friends on Wednesday, the 11th of January, at the Theatre Royal. The pieces selected are the comedy of Married Life, the interlude Did you ever send your Wife to Camberwell, and the farce of No. The following, we understand is the "cast" of the characters in the first piece:—Mr. Coddle, Capt. Price; Mr. Dove. H. de Cardonnel Lawson, Esq.; Mr. Lynx, Mr. Akerman; Mr. Younghusband, Howard Fenwick, Esq.; Mr. Dismal, Townley Woodman, Esq.: Mrs. Coddle, Mrs. Woolridge; Mrs. Lynx, Miss Fanny Bennett; Mrs. Younghusband, Miss Fanny Young; Mrs. Dove, Mrs. John Rouse; Mrs. Dismal, Mrs. Stevenson. In Did you ever send your Wife to Camberwell the characters will be thus represented:—Chesterfield Honeybun, H. de Cardonnel Lawson, Esq.; Crank, Capt. Price. The farce No has been thus cast:—Sir George Doubtful, Townley Woodman, Esq.; Commodore Hurricane, Mr. Herring; Frederick, G. A. Muttlebury, Esq.; David, G. Jebb, Esq.; Smart, F. Thompson, Esq. The new play of Gold has been announced by the management.

DEVONPORT.—The members of the Mechanics' Institute gave two concerts on the evenings of Tuesday and Thursday during the past week. The artistes engaged were Miss Dolby, Miss E. Birch, Mr. Francis, Mr. Land, and Mr. Frank Bodda, members of the English Glee and Madrigal Union. The programme for each evening comprised madrigals, glees, songs, &c. Excepting Miss E. Birch and Mr. F. Bodda, the whole of the vocalists have previously appeared before Devonport audiences, with whom they are especial favourites. In alluding to the first concert, we must pass a deservedly high commendation on Miss Dolby for the taste she displayed in the song by Sir Walter Raleigh, of "Repentance," or not to mention in the second concert the scena "Joan of Arc in Prison," which afforded full scope for the qualities and capabilities of her voice; Miss E. Birch was very effective in the various pieces allotted to her, especially in Land's new ballad, "Why art thou sad," her style of singing is purely English, and her efforts were followed by flattering marks of approval. Mr. Frank Bodda gave a capital rendering of "Largo al factotum" first in Italian and in the encore in English. "The anchor's weighed," by Mr. Francis, was given with great expression and feeling. Mr. Land sang two of Samuel Lover's Irish ballads, "Sally, Sally," and "Mother, he's going away," in a manner that did full justice to the compositions. The madrigals and glees cannot fail to have left an impression on the crowded audiences which filled the hall on each night that will be long remembered. The concerts were eminently successful, and though the engagements were attended with considerable expense, we believe the funds of the Institute have in no respect suffered, notwithstanding the very moderate rate at which tickets were issued to the members.—Devonport Independent, Dec. 31st.

NEWCASTLE.—The Sacred Harmonic and Choral Society concluded their second year on Thursday evening, December 22, with a performance of Israel in Eygpt, and a miscellaneous selection from the works of Haydn, Beethoven, etc. Mr. Ashton sang the recitatives and the air, "Thou didst blow," in his usual style. Mr. Hadock, in "Their land brought forth frogs," acquitted himself well; also in the air, "Thou shalt bring them in." The duett, "The Lord is a man of war," was sung by Messrs. K. Greener and Hemingway, and was highly effective. The choruses were creditably sustained: some of them rendered in a very spirited manner, for instance, "The hailstone," "But as for his people," "He smote the first-born," and the concluding great chorus, "I will sing unto the Lord." The second part opened with Beethoven's "Hallelujah," from the Mount of Olives, and was finely sung. Mr. Hemingway gave "He layeth the beams," in style. Himmel's dramatic chorus "The Judgment," produced a great effect, after which "Angels ever bright and fair" was sung by Miss Leybourne, who made her début on this occasion, and, allowing for timidity, acquitted herself well. Mr. Hemingway sang "How willing my paternal love," and Mr. Ashton, "Lord remember David." The choruses "The dead shall live," and "Father, we adore thee," were well given, as was also, "The arm of the Lord;" the beautiful and subdued passage, "The Lord he will have mercy," by the way was sung much too loudly, and the effect materially diminished. Handel's coronation anthem closed the selection. The attendance was numerous, and the performance gave the utmost gratification. The band was excellent, particularly the stringed instruments, which we thought more steady than on preceding occasions. Mr. Redshaw presided at the organ with his usual ability, and the whole was conducted by Mr. Ions, to whom praise must be awarded for the zeal and ability which he manifests in his position.—Newcastle Guardian.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Fidelio was played on Monday night to a crowded audience. Madame Caradori, Herr Formes, and Herr Reichardt were called for before the curtain at the end of each act. Last night Norma was repeated. Additional seats were placed in the stall part of the house, and boxes, pit, and gallery were crowded. In the part of the heroine, Madame Caradori was eminently successful; her acting at times elicited a perfect storm of applause. A greater triumph has not often been witnessed in Edinburgh. Formes, in Oroveso, surpasses himself. His performance of the Druid high priest is certainly one of the finest ever seen, while his singing is remarkable for its intensity of feeling and purity of style. Herr Reichardt's Pollio was a spirited and energetic performance. His voice possesses great sweetness, and he acts with feeling and dramatic power. Madlle. Zimmerman performed Adalgisa with much success. Added to a voice of good quality, she is a thorough musician, and was deservedly applauded. The band and chorus were steady and in good training.

At the Amphitheatre, an excellent Pantomime has been produced, under the superintendence of Mr. Wyndham, and proves highly attractive, the house being full every night. It is beautifully put upon the stage, and is remarkable for having the best Harlequin and Columbine I ever saw, in Mr. Forrest and Miss Sanger. The dancing of the lady elicits loud and constant marks of approbation.

RYDE, ISLE OF WIGHT.—The first concert of the Ryde Philharmonic Society took place under distinguished patronage, at the Town Hall, on Monday evening last. The vocalists were Miss Stabbach and Herr Brandt; instrumentalists—pianoforte, Mrs. M. A. Jones; cornopean, Master Jones; harpist and flautist, Mr. Jones. The concert opened with "The Gypsies' Chorus," ably sung by the members of the Society. Miss Stabbach sang Webers's "Softly sighs," with great effect, and was unanimously encored in "Take back the ring." The cornopean solo of Master Jones was extremely well played; taking into consideration his youth, he bids fair to be one of our best cornopeanists. In a duett with his father for two cornopeans, he was equally successful. The songs of Herr Brandt were sung in a very artistic manner. The duett for pianoforte and harp was capitally performed by Mrs. and Mr. Jones. The concerted pieces sung by the Society, and also the remaining portion of the instrumental pieces, were very effectively rendered.

HARROW.—A concert was given at the Rooms of the Literary Institution, on last Thursday evening. The programme offered the audience, a very fashionable one, a well-arranged selection of vocal music, conducted by Messrs. Haskins and Tillyard. The Misses Stabbach, E. and J. Brougham, sang exceedingly well. The former lady was encored in a duet with Mr. Tillyard, and also in a pretty song, charmingly given, "From sorrow's dream awake." The Misses Brougham were encored in a trio with Miss Stabbach. Mr. Tillyard is a good singer. Mr. George Tedder sang extremely well, and the concert terminated, considering the season and the weather, to the satisfaction of a numerous assembly.

BELFAST.—MR. G. V. BROOKE concluded his engagement at the Theatre Royal on the 24th ult.

SADLERS' WELLS.—This theatre, the proper home of pantomime, where poor Joe Grimaldi delighted our fathers and ourselves in boyhood, presented a right merrie English and legitimate pantomine entitled, Harlequin Tom Thumb; or Gog and Magog, and Mother Goose's Golden Goslings. This pantomine is one of Mr. Greenwood's best efforts, and amply sustains his well earned character and the prestige of Sadlers' Wells. The fairy tale, which delighted us in the nursery, was produced in its minutest details; the rapidity of the changes and the startling contrast in the scenes took the audience by surprise, prepared as they were for being both pleased and astonished. Clown, Pantaloon, and Columbine, the immemorial and indisputable pantomimists, were excellently put forward. Nicola Deulin, the Clown, is a fellow of infinite fun and surprising elasticity of limb; Miss Caroline Parkes, as Columbine, is a pleasing and smart danseuse; and Mr. Waylon, as Pantaloon, left little to be desired. An unflagging fire of pointed jokes, social and political, is kept up throughout; among the most telling—"The City Testimonial to Prince Albert" turning into a bar. of "soft soap"—"A box of Homœpathic Medicine" into the "Aztec Children" to be taken with "scruples." This is another evidence that Mr. Phelps is resolved to present nothing but the legitimate article in every department of his creditable, and we are happy to add, successful management. The house at Sadlers' Wells is a proof of the undiminished appreciation which the public have for the English Drama, and the perseverance in upholding its interests ever evinced by the managers.

THE CITY OF LONDON.—Hurrah for the city and its pantomime. It was with the absolute certainty of being pleased that we seated ourselves in this theatre last Monday evening. We hold Nelson Lee to be one of the most practical and telling, as well as by far the most amusing, of the "popular preachers" of the day. He gives us no dull details, no reiteration of common places, which, dull in themselves, duller grow as the changes are mercilessly rung upon them, pointed joke and sparkling epigram scarcely give us time to breathe during one of Nelson Lee's pantomimes; and the only drawback is, that one cannot secure room enough to laugh at ease. The Ocean Queen, or Harlequin and the Mystic Branch, we do not hesitate to pronounce one of the very best of the many pantomimes produced by the enterprising, and thoroughly-alive to the popular taste, proprietors of the City of London Theatre, of which house we may say—

> Jocus and Comus drive tandem with Momus,
> Lighting the road with gibe, banter and bam.

When we have said so much for the pantomime, we almost fear that our praise will be considered indiscriminate when we allude to the Company as the best acting pantomimists brought together at this house. Let us, however, remind our readers that Paul Herring is clown—Morelli "a contemporary of Grimaldi, and who has played pantaloon to him," pantaloon—Mrs. Harvey, columbine—Vedoni, harlequin—and Herr Deani Sprite.

The Soldiering mania was well hit off at Chobam Camp—as were the table-turning nuisance and the ludicrous Cochin fowl humbug. The political sympathies of the holiday audience were exemplified in the original cry of "Bravo, Palmerston," elicited by some telling play on Turkey and the Russian Bear. One of the happiest bits was where clown gets into debt as fast and as gloriously as an Irish lord or squire—squanders, passes through the Court of Bankruptcy, and diddles his creditors, as the court for the sale of encumbered estates will not allow the Irish lords and squires (pretty justice this to Ireland!) to do. The pantomime, in fact, has turned out a turn-up card, and well deserves the success it has met.

GRECIAN SALOON.—The opening piece was on Monday followed by the looked-for Christmas annual, Harlequin Charity Brat; or, The Magic Christmas Piece. The frequenters of the Grecian are connoisseurs in pantomines, as all unsophisticated Englishmen who are not ashamed to laugh are. The pantomime is a great social teacher, and many a wholesome lesson and cutting gibe is conveyed in merrie tone by time-hallowed Clown and witless Pantaloon. Coming at the end of the year, it allows a running commentary on all the absurdities and follies, the well-doings and short-comings of the twelvemonths that are gone. Harlequin Charity Brat does great credit to the writer, Mr. Webb, and the producer, Mr. Phillips. The piece contains the usual proportion of fun and morals, and proceeds in the approved course till the transformation. Views of Constantinople and the Dublin Exhibition were presented during the performance, and the whole terminated with an allegorical tableau of Neptune and Britannia testifying to England's monarchy of the ocean. The scenery is well painted, and the incidental music is well performed by a band under Messrs. Berry and Edroff. Mr. Conquest is an indefatigable caterer. Of him it may be said, as of a famous Dublin manager,

> "Conquest, who rules with equal skill,
> The playh.ouse bill and bill of fare," and well merits the success which he merits.

THE YANKEE AND MONT BLANC.

How de du, Mont Blanc? I vow I'm glad to meet ye;
A thund'rin' grist o' miles I've come to greet ye;
I'm from America, where we've got a fountain,
Niagara it's called, where you might lave
Your mighty phiz; then you could shirt and shave
In old Kentucky—in our Mammoth Cave;
Or take a snooze, when you're in want of rest,
On our big prairies in the "Far West;"
Or, when you're dry, might cool your heated liver
By sipping up the Mississippi river.
As for my companions, should you wish for any,
Why, we've got the Katskill and the Alleghany;
You may accept them with impunity,
They both stand high in our community.
Give us a call. You'd almost step from hence;
Our folks all long to see Your Eminence.
Come over, Blanc!—don't make the least ado;
Bring Madame Juda with you, and the little glaciers too!

SOPHIE CRUVELLI.—The début of this celebrated Cantatrice, at the Grand Opera in Paris, was anticipated to take place on the 6th (yesterday)—or, at the latest, to-morrow, the 8th. Valentine, in the Huguenots, as we have already stated, is the part in which Sophie will first appeal to an intrinsically French (or Parisian) audience.

M. VISCONTI, the famous architect, member of the French Institute, died on Friday the 30th ult. at five o'clock, of apoplexy. M. Visconti was entrusted with the direction of the important works that have been for some time going on at the Louvre. His death is a real loss to the arts. The funeral servive of the Imperial Architect was performed on Tuesday with great pomp and ceremony in the church of St. Philippe du Roule.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

(From the original of Alexander Oulibicheff.)*

CHAPTER II.

No particulars concerning this first journey of Mozart have come down to us, nor do we derive any information about it from his father's letters. All that we know on the subject is: that, in the beginning of the year 1762, Leopold Mozart went with his two children to Munich; that the two young virtuosi reaped a most brilliant harvest of success; that the privilege of playing before the Elector was granted them; and that, after a sojourn of three weeks, they left this capital.

In the month of September of the same year, the whole family proceeded to Vienna, where a number of influential patrons procured them an admission to Court. The Emperor, Francis I., a friend and lover of the art, entered, on several occasions, into conversation with little Wolfgang, whom he loaded with marks of his favour, presenting him, among other gifts, with a grand gala dress in the Parisian style, which had been made for the Archduke Maximilian. The reader cannot imagine anything more funny than the portrait of our little hero in this brilliant costume, which consisted of a coat trimmed with lace, and having skirts that stuck out a great deal behind, a waistcoat, also laced, that reached down to his knees, powdered hair, confined in a bag, ornaments upon the coatsleeves, larger than the head of the wearer, a little three cornered hat, and a sword at his side.†

One day, the Emperor said to the boy; "It requires no great skill for a person to play with all his fingers, but if he could play with only one finger on a piano that was covered over, he would indeed be worthy of our admiration." Instead of making any answer, the boy played several very difficult passages with only one finger; he then caused the keys to be covered over, and played so ably that those present might well have believed that he had prepared himself by long practice for this kind of ordeal. It was the first time, however, that he had attempted such a feat. But the following anecdote, which is no less well authenticated, strikes me as still more remarkable, since it proves the existence, even at that early period, of one of the prominent features of Mozart's character. He was seated at the piano, with the Emperor at his side, and a number of noblemen connected with the court, whom he did not look upon as the best judges of music, standing in a circle around him. Whenever he was obliged to play to people who understood nothing of music (and it was impossible to deceive him on this head), he used to play only country dances, minuets, and other trifles, which, proceeding from the fingers of a virtuoso, must strike those who wish to hear him as the bitterest irony. On this occasion, however, he did not dare to follow his usual custom, and therefore said to the Emperor:

"Is not Herr Wagenseil* here? He must come, for he understands the subject."

The Emperor granted the boy's request, and allowed Wagenseil to come and take his place by the piano.

"I am very glad that you are here," said the boy to Herr Wagenseil, "I will play one of your concertos, and you shall turn over the leaves for me."

Wolfgang's talent and original humour soon made him the favourite of the Archduchess, Maria Theresa's daughter. Two of the princesses were one day conducting him, for his amusement, through the apartments of the palace, and, as he was not accustomed to walk upon the smooth wood flooring, he fell down. The elder of the two princesses took no notice of the accident; the other, however, who was of about the same age as our hero, assisted him in the kindest manner to get up again.

"You are a brave girl," he said to her; "I will marry you."

The princess, as in duty bound, informed her august mother of this declaration, on which the Empress summoned Mozart to her presence, and enquired what had induced him to take a resolution so flattering to her daughter.

"Gratitude," answered the boy, without the least hesitation; "she was kind to me, while her sister did not trouble her head in the least about me."

The young Archduchess, whom Mozart wished to marry, was Marie Antoinette, afterwards Queen of France.

When our young pianoforte virtuoso returned home, he formed the idea of learning another instrument. Some one in Vienna had made him a present of a small fiddle, on which he commenced practising, unknown to his father.* At this period, Leopold Mozart used to give lessons in composition to a violinist of the name of Wenzl, who, one day, brought his master six trios, which he had composed during the latter's absence. Schlachtner, another musician, from whom we have this anecdote, was also present. The three wanted to try the trios; Wenzl was to play the first violin, Schlachtner the second, and Leopold Mozart the bass, on the viol. Suddenly, Wolferl (as his name of Wolfgang was abbreviated), came into the room with his little fiddle, and requested permission to play Schlachtner's part. Wolferl's father, who saw nothing in his request save an ill-timed childish demand, told him that it was a piece of folly to wish to play with the others, without having first learnt the instrument. Wolfgang replied, that, in order to be able to play the second violin, it was not necessary to have learnt it previously; upon which his father ordered him, in an angry manner, to leave the room. The boy went away crying; but the two musicians interceded for him, and his request was at last granted.

"As far as I am concerned," said his father, "you may play with Herr Schlachtner, but so gently that no one shall be able to hear you; otherwise you will immediately be sent out of the room."

The four began, and Schlachtner soon perceived, to his great astonishment, that he was quite superfluous. He silently laid down his instrument, and looked towards the boy's father, who was weeping for joy at this fresh surprise, exactly as when he had examined the pianoforte concerto. The six trios were played right through, without the second violin's missing even a single note. The signs of approbation manifested by those present so encouraged the young beginner that he declared he could also play the first part, which was naturally much more difficult. For the sake of the joke, he was allowed to make the attempt, and all present were unable to refrain from laughing heartily as he played the part, without breaking down in any portion of it, although, indeed, his fingering was all wrong and completely contrary to rule.

Up to his tenth year, Mozart evinced an almost invincible repugnance for the trumpet; the very sight of this instrument was hateful to him. In order to overcome this aversion on his part, his father once sent for a trumpeter, who was told to blow with all his strength into the boy's ear. On this occasion Leopold Mozart behaved without his usual prudence. At the very first notes the boy turned pale and fell to the ground; and, in all probability, the experiment would have been attended with the most injurious consequences, had it been persevered in. At a later period, Mozart succeeded in overcoming a weakness that was the result of his delicate constitution, and no one understood better than he, how to introduce trumpets at the fitting moment, or with more satisfactory results.

The older our hero became, the more plainly, more imperiously, and more exclusively, did his future vocation manifest itself. The most usual affections of childhood, as well as other less important propensities, which under different circumstances might have ripened and borne fruit, disappeared one after the other, or rather were merged in his ruling passion for music, which swallowed up every other feeling. It soon became necessary to limit the time he should pass at the piano. The general order of things was in his case completely reversed, for, while other children must be compelled to work, it was requisite to remind him that he should allow himself a little rest. At a later period of his life he indemnified himself for this constraint. When there was no longer any one to compel him to go to bed, he pushed matters so far as to look upon sleep itself as a completely idle restorative.

From the state of affairs at that period, Germany was a far too narrow stage for such extraordinary talent as that of our hero. Leopold Mozart felt this, and was also aware that no one is a prophet in his own country. He thought, therefore, that the time was arrived for him to take his children to Paris, where people's heads become more easily excited, and their purses are more speedily opened than in any part of calm, reflective, and economical Germany. He did not, however, choose the shortest route, but travelled by way of Munich, Augsburg, Stuttgart, Mayence, Frankfort, Coblentz, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Brussels. During this journey, Leopold Mozart was assiduous in writing home a number of letters which he directed to a tradesman of the name of Hagenauer, the proprietor of the house in which he lived at Salzburg. With the exception of a list of princely and aristocratic names, and a catalogue of the valuable presents with which the two virtuosi were loaded upon the road, these letters contain scarcely anything save particulars relating to the financial condition of the travellers, which might, perhaps, interest Herr Hagenauer, but cannot posses the least attraction in our eyes; and for this reason I shall not trouble the reader with them, but at once suppose the family to have arrived safely in Paris, in the autumn of 1763.

* On the subject of this anecdote, Mr. Holmes remarks: "Herr von Nissen and others, who have written biographies of Mozart, assert that he brought this instrument back with him from Vienna towards the end of the year 1762, and first began playing upon it in secret. Although this assertion is of itself sufficiently improbable, it is moreover distinctly refuted by a letter of Leopold Mozart, written during his journey to Vienna, in which he says: 'that the boy had moved the heart of a custom-house official by a minuet.' This passage completely overthrows the anecdote, and, therefore, in order not to reject it altogether, we must adopt a middle course if we would discover the truth, which was, most probably, that Leopold Mozart did not wish his son, who had already earned himself a reputation upon the piano, to appear in the character of a bungler upon an instrument which he had certainly not learnt long enough for his father to expect him to play at sight anything entirely new without a fault. Leopold Mozart's emotion and joy we may, therefore, believe, were quite unfeigned, when, to his astonishment, he perceived that he had been mistaken, and that in this instance, again, his son had far exceeded the expectations which he had formed of him."—A. Schraishuon.

La Nonne Sanglante.—This opera, two acts of which were finished by Berlioz, some years ago, has been consigned—in consequence of Meyerbeer's refusing to complete it—to M. Gounod, the composer of Sappho, a work that may be remembered by the subscribers to the Royal Italian Opera. Meyerbeer declined to undertake The Bleeding Nun, from motives of delicacy, which every true artist must appreciate. M. Gounod, it appears, waived such considerations. At all events the opera is finished, and in rehearsal. Viardot, Alboni, Bosio, Tedesco, and last not least, Cruvelli, having, I am told, successively avoided the responsibility attaching to the principal "rôle," M. Gounod is compelled to rest satisfied with the assistance of Mademoiselle Poinsot, who will do her best to make his "Nun" palatable to the easy and good-tempered Parisian public—who, judging from antecedents, may possibly be not disinclined to accept her. The story is from the modest romance of Monk Lewis, Esq., who corrected Walter Scott's first attempt at verse.—(From a letter.)

Besides these operas, Donizetti composed twelve Scenas or Cantatas, for royal festivals, the opening of various theatres, etc.; chamber compositions, under the following titles—Arie e duetti—Les Nuits d'Eté au Pausilippe—Les Soirées de Paris, etc;—Il Conte Ugolino—thirty-third canto of Dante's Inferno; masses, requiems, vespers, and psalms; a Miserere, and detached church music; besides quartets for stringed instruments, sonatas and variations for the piano, and various concert overtures for full orchestra and for military bands.

Donizetti was born at Bergamo in 1798, and died in the same town in April, 1848, during the progress of the Italian insurrection against the Austrian oppressors. His first opera was produced at Venice in 1818, when he was twenty years of age; his last at Naples in 1844, when he was forty-six. He died in his fiftieth year.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.—A new association of orchestral performers, with Mr. Frank Mori as conductor, has been formed under the above title. There are already ten members, among whom are Barret, Lazarus, Baumann, Lovell Phillips, Prospère, Rowland, etc., etc.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH ARTISTS.

NO. I.

SIMS REEVES.

THE subject of this Memoir is the son of Mr. John Sims Reeves, professor of music and singing. He was born in the year 1821, at Woolwich, a place not previously distinguished, we believe, as the birth-place of any musical celebrity. From a very tender age young Sims gave evidence of decided talent for music. His father expended much time and pains on his tuition, and, under his instructions, the boy made rapid advances in his studies.

Singers are not always indebted to the advantages derived from an early musical education. Many of the most eminent dramatic vocalists have owed little or nothing to early instruction, their talents having been exercised and developed later in life, when the discovery of a fine voice, or a latent genius for the art induced them to turn their attention to music, as a profession. Donzelli, one of the most gifted and accomplished singers of his day, never contemplated appearing on the stage until he was nearly thirty years of age, and then only from necessity. But for circumstances over which he had no control, and the entreaties of friends who knew the value of his powers, and pointed out to him the road to fame, Mario would equally have been lost to the public.

Whatever amount of musical knowledge Sims Reeves acquired from his father, he learned still more through his own perseverance and industry. By a continuous course of instruction and assiduous study, he soon became acquainted with the theory of music, made considerable progress as a performer on several instruments—including the violin, violoncello, and piano—and evidenced, moreover, a taste for composition. At thirteen years of age, he had become such a proficient on the organ and made such progress in his vocal studies, that he was appointed organist and conductor of the choir in the church at North Cray, in Kent. During his stay there, he composed several chants and psalms, which elicited the admiration of the Reverend Edgell Wyatt Edgell, rector of the church.

At fourteen, Sims Reeves was placed by his father under the care of Mr. W. H. Callcott, for instruction in harmony and counterpoint, and under the well known John Cramer for the pianoforte. About this time his voice began to develope itself as a treble of the finest quality. Added to this, his taste and musical feeling plainly indicated the true direction of his talents. He was strongly counselled to forego harmony and counterpoint, and to choose another branch of the art for which nature had more evidently intended him. Accordingly we find him soon after taking lessons from Mr. J. W. Hobbs, from Mr. George Stansbury, and last, not least, from Tom Cooke.

Sims Reeves made his first appearance on the stage at Newcastle, in the year 1839. He selected the part of Count Rodolpho in the Sonnambula, for his début, and subsequently played Dandini, in Cinderella. These are barytone parts, and it is difficult to say why a singer with a high tenor voice should have attempted them. Perhaps the music being comparatively easy, and lying within the middle register, demanded less exertion, and was therefore better suited to a beginner. Under such considerations it was doubtless good policy to commence thus; although the young artist could hardly have anticipated a great success from singing music not perfectly suited to his voice. Those who heard Sims Reeves in these barytone parts might possibly have imagined they were listening to a Tamburini in embryo, but scarcely to one who, at a period not far off, would be recognised as the Mario of the English stage.

From Newcastle Sims Reeves proceeded to the principal provincial theatres in Ireland and Scotland; and after a tournée of no remarkable success, returned to England, where he obtained engagements at Liverpool, Manchester, etc.—as yet barely making his way with the public. The quality of his voice and his good taste were generally allowed; but extreme timidity and nervousness—which even in the zenith of his powers and reputation, have not entirely left him—frequently marred his best efforts, and for years prevented him from displaying his great natural capacities to advantage.

Sims Reeves, however, feeling that there was more within him than the world gave him credit for, was resolved that his endowments should receive every benefit to be derived from the best instruction and the most persevering application. He accordingly visited Paris, took lessons from several professors in the art of singing, and, returning to England, made another tour of the provinces. Although much improved in style and manner, he was still wanting in self-possession and finish, and his success was by no means tantamount to his expectation. He now began to think that either his studies in the French capital had not been sufficiently prolonged, or that Parisian masters were not as competent to teach as he had been led to imagine. Revolving this in his mind, he came to the conclusion that in Italy alone could he hope to obtain the knowledge and experience which would place him on the true road to eminence as a dramatic singer—the goal of all his aspirations. To Italy, therefore, he decided on going, with the intention of studying under the best masters, and not re-appearing on the stage until he should have conquered every difficulty.

Before departing for the continent, however, he paid flying visits to some of the principal cities of Ireland and England, and playing Fra Diavolo at the Theatre-Royal, Dublin, had the ill luck to break his leg, when leaping from the rocks, in the last scene. An incident connected with this mishap is characteristic of Sims Reeves's energy, and of his determination to please the public, even at no small risk to himself. As the last scene of Fra Diavolo could not be performed without his appearing, despite the intense agony he suffered and the danger he incurred from over exertion and the postponement of medical treatment, he allowed himself to be led on by the carpenters, and sang the remainder of the music. Sims Reeves has changed the "business" in the last scene of Fra Diavolo, and, we think, judiciously; but, according to the original version, Fra Diavolo need not have re-entered after jumping from the rocks, and, indeed, need not have jumped from the rocks at all. When, therefore, Fra Diavolo came on supported by the carpenters, the audience of the Dublin theatre considered it a part of the performance, and, knowing nothing of the accident, called loudly for the performer after the curtain had descended. Sims Reeves, betraying no disposition to respond to the invitation, under the circumstances, the pit and galleries grew riotous, and after some time, the manager came forward and explained the nature of the accident and the impossibility of Mr. Reeves's appearing. Nothing, however, but ocular demonstration would satisfy the sturdy Eblanians, that Sims Reeves's leg was really broken, and he was compelled to show himself on the back of one of the actors. The Dublin lads are sometimes dangerous boys!

As soon as he had recovered, Sims Reeves repaired to London. Thence, rejecting all engagements, he started for Milan, and at once entered upon his studies with zeal and resolution. His first master was Mazzucato, principal professor of singing at the Conservatory; and, subsequently, he took lessons from Bejetti Maestro, the pianoforte accompanist at the theatre La Scala. In a few months Sims Reeves made such progress that both his masters advised him to appear on the stage; and through their united influence he obtained an engagement at the Scala as primo tenore. He made his debut as Edgardo, in Lucia di Lammermoor—a part to which he is indebted for no small share of the reputation he at present enjoys. His success was so great, that he established himself at once as a special favorite with the Milanese, and concluded a lucrative engagement with the impresario, Morelli, for two years.

The Scala at Milan has been the school of many of the great Italian singers who have appeared in this country; and there is little doubt but that during his engagement there Sims Reeves gradually acquired that perfect command of voice, vigorous style, and pure method of vocalisation, which now proclaim him one of the most accomplished tenors of the day.

After leaving Milan, Sims Reeves appeared in succession at several of the chief Italian theatres; and his fame having reached the ears of Mr. Frederick Beale, of the firm of Cramer, Beale, and Co., that gentleman offered him an engagement, and he returned to England in 1847. For some cause unknown to us, Mr. Beale's engagement with Sims Reeves was broken off, and it remained for Jullien to introduce the young and almost unknown tenor to the English public.

Jullien's bold but ill-fated endeavour to elevate Drury Lane into a grand national opera at the close of the year 1847, is too well remembered to need description here. What spirit and enterprise could suggest and carry out Jullien accomplished; but the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. Had Jullien, however, done nothing else in the course of his great undertaking than present Sims Reeves to the English public, he would be entitled to enduring respect.

Mr. Aguilar's first soirée of "Classical and modern pianoforte music" (at his residence) takes place this evening.

Signor Marras has returned from Naples.

Signor Calzolari has arrived in London from St. Petersburg, in company with Signor Li Calsi.

M. Armand Bertin, principal editor and proprietor of the great French newspaper, the Journal des Debats, died on Thursday morning, at his residence in Paris.

Continental Theatres.—From Le Ménestrel we extract the following statistics relative to some of the Theatres of Europe, "The Grand Opera at Paris has accommodation for 1800 spectators; the Théâtre Français for 1186; the Opéra Comique, 1500; the Odéon, 1550: the Italian Opera, 1300; the Karntner-Thor Theater in Vienna, 1800; the Burg-Theater in the same city, 1670; the Königlich-Hof-Theater in Berlin, 2078; the Hof-Theater in Dresden, 2000; the Hof-Theater at Munich, 2500; the Hof-Theater at Hanover, 2000; the Hof-Theater at Stuttgard, 2000; the Hof-Theater at Darmstadt, 2000; the Stadt-Theater at Hamburg, 2300; and the San Carlo at Naples, 4000." Some notice of the capabilities of the Scala, the Argentina at Rome, the Operas at Venice, Turin, Parma, Madrid, Barcelona, Marseilles, Bordeaux, Lyons, and Hamburg, to say nothing of the Theatres at New York, the vast Opera-Houses of Havannah and New Orleans, and last, not least, the three great London Theatres—Her Majesty's Theatre, the Royal Italian Opera, and Drury Lane—would have rendered this catalogue more complete and more instructive. As it stands it was scarcely worth publishing, and we have reprinted it from the columns of our French contemporary, chiefly with the view of stating this much.

MENDELSSOHN AND BERLIOZ.*

(From Berlioz' "Musical Tour in Germany," 1843.)

(Concluded.)

The Leipsic orchestra is not more numerous than the orchestra at Francfort, or that at Stuttgart. In the town, however, there are plenty of instrumental performers, and, as I expressed a desire to have the band augmented, the number of violins was raised to twenty-four. This step, as I was afterwards made to feel, excited the indignation of certain critics, who had already determined on the course they should pursue. Sixteen violins had hitherto sufficed for the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven. To demand eight more was, in the opinion of those gentlemen, little better than insolent affectation.

We in vain endeavoured to obtain three particular instruments, which, in some of my compositions, are indispensable, and the employment of which constituted another heinous offence in the eyes of the critics in question. These were the corno inglese, the ophicleide, and the harp. The only instrument to be found as representative of the first of the three, was so old, worn, and consequently out of tune, that, notwithstanding the talent of the artist who played upon it, we were obliged to renounce it, and to give the first solo to the clarionet. The ophicleide, or rather the wretched brass tube presented to me as one, did not resemble the French instrument which bears that name. It had scarcely any tone, and, moreover, was in B flat, which compelled the performer to play in almost impracticable keys—as for instance in G flat when the orchestra was in F, and in C flat when the orchestra was in B flat. The ophicleide was therefore abandoned, like the corno inglese, and, for better or for worse, a fourth trombone was made to stand as substitute. The harp it was almost useless to think of, since, six months previously, Mendelssohn, desiring to produce at Leipsic some pieces from his Antigone, had been compelled to send for harps to Berlin. As he assured me that he had been but indifferently pleased with them, I wrote to Dresden, and Lipinski,† a worthy artist of whom I shall have to speak elsewhere, sent me the harpist of the theatre. A harp was now all that was wanted. After much fruitless hunting about the shops of instrument makers and music sellers, Mendelssohn at last found an amateur who was in possession of the instrument so called, and who willingly placed it at my service for a few days. But, alas! I was no luckier with the harp than with the ophicleide and the corno inglese. No sooner was it brought to me, furnished with new strings and in first-rate order, than it turned out that M. Richter (who had so obligingly come from Dresden, at the request of Lipinski) was a clever pianist and a good player on the violin, but knew very little of the harp, which he had only studied about a year and a half, in order to enable himself to play the simple arpeggios that occasionally form part of the accompaniments in Italian vocal music. At the sight of the diatonic passages and cantabile phrases which occur so often in my symphony his courage failed him altogether, and at the concert in the evening Mendelssohn was obliged to play the harp solos and indicate the entrées on the piano. What embarrassment about things of such small consequence!

My course once adopted, however, with regard to these inconveniences, the rehearsals commenced. The arrangement of the orchestra, in this fine hall, is so excellent; the relations of the performers with the conductor are so easy; and the artists, who are all good musicians, have been accustomed by Mendelssohn and David to pay such attention to their studies, that two rehearsals sufficed for the programme—a very long one—in which figured, among other difficult compositions, the overtures to King Lear, and Les Francs-Juges, the Symphonie Fantastique, &c. David, moreover, consented to play the violin solo (Rêverie et Caprice) which I had written two years previously for Artôt, and of which the orchestration is very complicated. He executed it in a superior manner, amidst the warm applause of the audience.

To say that the orchestra was irreproachable, after two rehearsals only, in the performance of every one of the pieces, is to bestow immense praise on it. The musicians of Paris and elsewhere will, I am sure, agree with me.

This concert troubled the musical consciences of the inhabitants of Leipsic, and, so far as I could judge from the newspaper polemics, discussions ensued, as violent as those of which the same works have been the subject in Paris. While they were debating the morality of my harmonic attempts, some treating them as very praiseworthy achievements, others as premeditated crimes, I made the trip to Dresden, which I shall have to describe later. But, not to divide the history of my experiences at Leipsic, I proceed to tell you, my dear Heller, what occurred, on my return, at the concert for the benefit of the poor, of which Mendelssohn had spoken to me in his letter, and in which I had promised to take part.

The soirée being organized entirely by the Society of Concerts, I had at my disposal the numerous and powerful Academy of Singing, of which I have already expressed myself in such high terms of praise. You may imagine I was anxious to profit by this fine body of voices; and I proposed to the directors of the Society the finale, for three choirs, to Romeo and Juliet, of which the German translation had been made in Paris by the learned professor, Duisberg. It was only necessary to fit this translation to the notes of the vocal parts. This was, however, a long and painful labor. The German prosody not having been observed by the copyists in their distribution of the long and short syllables, the singers met with difficulties, and Mendelssohn was obliged to lose his time in revising the text and correcting such faults as were most troublesome. He was obliged, moreover, to practice the chorus during nearly eight successive days. (Eight rehearsals of so large a chorus would cost in Paris 4,800 francs. And yet I am asked why I do not give Romeo and Juliet at my concerts!) The Academy, in which there are, it is true, some artists from the theatre, and the pupils of the Thomas Schule, is nevertheless composed almost entirely of amateurs, belonging to the cultivated classes of the city of Leipsic. This is why, when a work of importance is to be learned, it is so easy to obtain a great number of rehearsals. When I returned from Dresden, the chorus was far from being perfect; the male voices especially left much to be desired. It pained me to see a great composer and a great virtuoso, like Mendelssohn, charged with the subaltern task of singing-master; but he accomplished it, I must say, with indomitable patience. His observations were made with a gentleness and thorough politeness, which I should have enjoyed the more in him, had he but known how rare these qualities are in others. I have often myself been accused of ungallantry by the ladies of the Opera. My reputation in that respect is undeniable. I deserve it, I confess. No sooner is a grand chorus to be rehearsed than a sort of choler sticks in my throat; bad humor, by anticipation, manifests itself, without reason; and my looks remind the choristers of that Gascon who, having kicked an unoffensive boy, replied, when the latter remarked that he had done nothing to him: "Then you may guess what you would get if you had."

Meanwhile, after two more rehearsals, the three choruses were mastered, and the finale, with the support of the orchestra, would undoubtedly have gone to perfection, had not a singer from the theatre, who complained of the difficulties of the part of Friar Lawrence, with which he was entrusted, demolished the noble edifice of harmony which we had raised with so much pain.

I had already noticed, at the piano rehearsals, that this gentleman (I forget his name) belonged to a numerous class of musicians, who know nothing of music; he did not count his rests, he never came in at the right time, he was uncertain in his intonation, &c. But said I to myself:—"Perhaps he has not had time to study his part; he learns very difficult music at the theatre, why should he not get through with this?" Meanwhile I thought of Alizard, who sang this scene so well, and regretted he was at Brussels and did not know German. But at the general rehearsal, the night before the concert, as the gentleman had made no farther progress, and, what was worse, muttered between his teeth I knew not what Teutonic imprecations, every time we were obliged to stop the orchestra on his account, and Mendelssohn or I sang the phrases to him, my patience finally forsook me, and I thanked the chorus, begging them no longer to trouble themselves with my work, seeing that its execution was impossible on account of the bass part.

Thus two composers who had devoted for years whatever intellect and imagination nature had given them to the study of their art, and two hundred musicians, singers and instrumentalists, attentive and capable, had fatigued themselves for eight days, to no other purpose than to renounce the production of the work they had undertaken, and merely on account of the insufficiency of one man! The reflection was a sad one. O singers who do not sing—ye too are gods! . . . The Society was greatly embarrassed what to substitute in the programme for this finale, which is half an hour in length. By means of an extra rehearsal, however, which the orchestra and chorus were willing to undergo, on the morning of the concert, we got through the difficulty. The overture to King Lear, which the orchestra were masters of, and the offertory in my Requiem, in which the chorus has but few notes to sing, were substituted for the fragment of Romeo, and executed in the evening in the most satisfactory manner. I may add that the piece from the Requiem produced an effect which I had not anticipated, and won me the inestimable suffrages of Robert Schumann, one of the most justly renowned composer-critics of Germany. Some days after, the same offertory called forth an eulogium of another sort, on which I could not have counted. It was this. I had been taken ill at Leipsic, and, as I was about departing, I asked what I was indebted to the physician who attended me. "Write for me, on this sheet of paper," he replied, "the theme of your offertory, with your signature, and I shall be beholden to you for ever; never has a piece of music struck me so much!" I hesitated a little about remunerating a doctor in this fashion, but he insisted, and chance offered me an occasion of responding to his compliment by another, better merited, which, would you believe, I had the simplicity not to seize? I wrote at the top of the page: "A M. le docteur Clarus."

"Carus," said he, "you give my name an l too much."

"Patientibus carus, sed clarus inter doctos," thought I, directly, but did not dare write it. . . At times I am positively stupid.

A composer-virtuoso like yourself, my dear Heller, must have a lively interest in everything relating to his Art. It was therefore natural in you to address me so many questions on the subject of music in Leipsic. I will reply laconically to some of them. You ask me if the great pianist, Madame Clara Schumann, has any rival in Germany, who can be decently opposed to her?

I think not.

You wish me to tell you if the musical feeling of the great heads at Leipsic is good, or at least directed towards what you and I call the Beautiful?

I will not.

If it is true that the confession of faith of every one who pretends to love high and serious Art is, "There is no god but Bach, and Mendelssohn is his prophet?"

I must not.

If the theatre is well composed, and if the public is to blame for amusing itself with the little operas of Lortzing, which are so often represented?

I cannot.

If I have read or heard some of those old masses for five voices, with continuous bass, which are praised so much at Leipsic?

I know not.

Adieu, dear Heller! Continue to write beautiful caprices, like your two last, and may Heaven preserve you from fugues with four subjects on a choral!

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

BENEDICT AT MUNICH.

(From a German Paper of January 7.)

YESTERDAY evening, Benedict's opera of *Der Alte vom Berge, oder Die Kreutzfahrer was produced at the Theatre Royal for the first time. To criticise so important and elaborate a work (in five acts,) after a single hearing, is a task which the most experienced musical critic is not capable of achieving, and therefore the writer of the present article, who lays no claim to the above title, will confine himself to simply recording the fact that the opera was most successful, and the composer, who conducted his work in person, twice called for. Even on the first hearing we remarked a great many beautiful and melodious passages and original ideas, as well as many a charming motivo, so that we cordially joined in the applause bestowed upon several particular pieces. Herren Härtinger, Kindermann, Brandes, Diez, and Hefner were greeted with tumultuous applause. The book, translated from the original by St. Georges and Bunn, is not interesting, and we shall shortly speak of it more at length, as well as of the musical merit of the work, which was put upon the stage in a manner worthy of our grand theatre. Among the new scenes there was one—namely, a distant view of Jerusalem, painted by Herr Quaglio—which more particularly took the audience by surprise. The new costumes were mostly extremely rich. The ballet arrangements, on the contrary, afforded ground for a great many remarks of dissatisfaction, particularly in the course of the first act, in which the Crusaders are made to dance Styrian national pas.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The concert on Wednesday was on the whole not very brilliant, nor was Exeter Hall inconveniently crowded on the occasion; there were, nevertheless, some good points. A young pianist, Miss Rosina Bentley (pupil, we believe, of Mrs. Thompson, late Miss Kate Loder), performed, from memory, a beautiful, but not very well known composition of Mendelssohn, for piano and orchestra—the Serenade e Rondo Giojoso, in B. She plays with spirit, and has a neat and clear execution. Miss Rosina Bentley, however, will do well, on a future occasion, to refrain from using the loud pedal so much. She scarcely ever abandoned it on Wednesday; and this greatly marred the effect of her performance, and made it appear obscure, which it decidedly was not. She also wants a little more tranquillity. Style will come as she grows older. In other respects she showed herself worthy of her instructress, and well deserved the applause she obtained.

A harp solo by Mdlle. Louise Christine—La Danse des Fées, of Parish Alvars—did not elicit much attention. Vieuxtemps, Fantasie et Caprice (Op. 11), admirably performed on the violin by Mr. Alfred Holmes, another very young performer, was, on the other hand, loudly applauded, and the compliment well earned.

The vocal features were the elaborate aria, "Pensa alla patria," from Rossini's Italiana in Algeri, in which—although (as in Mendelssohn's pianoforte piece) the orchestral accompaniments were very slovenly—the fine contralto voice and glowing style of Mad. Amedei were advantageously exhibited. This lady, who is becoming a universal favourite, won great applause. Mr. Augustus Braham, too, was equally successful in the difficult air from Oberon, "Oh, 'twas a glorious sight," which he sang with energy and feeling. The difficult Cabaletta, "Caro nome," from Verdi's Rigoletto, is rather too much, at present, for the promising Miss Thirlwall, whose youthful manner and fresh voice, however, extorted unanimous suffrages. The aria of Alphonso, from Lucrezia Borgia, is not at all in the style of Mr. Lawler, whose sphere is by no means the Italian Opera. The Misses Brougham sang the touching and beautiful duet of Mendelssohn, "Oh, wert thou in the cauld blast?" with true and appropriate simplicity. We could have heard it again with pleasure.

The overture to Cherubini's Anacreon, which began the first part, and the march from Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, which terminated it, were both played very carelessly. The band seems to have greatly deteriorated since the departure of Mr. Benedict. The second part began with Balfe's spirited overture to Falstaff. After which Miss Harriet Chipp, another young and promising singer (daughter of one of our oldest members of the orchestra), sang a very nice song, called "The Dove," by a French composer, M. Membrée, who enjoys much repute in Paris as a writer of vocal chamber music. Miss Chipp sang it well, and was accompanied on the violoncello obligato by Mr. Lovell Phillips, with that gentleman's accustomed ability. For the rest of the concert—a collection of shreds and patches of the most flagrant "Wednesday" calibre—we did not remain. Herr Lutz was the conductor.

AN UNFLEDGED NIGHTINGALE.

"Jenny Lind's baby, according to the Musical World," (according to the Carlisle Journal), "begins to manifest signs of musical capacity."

We are obliged to our cotemporary of the Lakes for his information, as we were not aware of having originally circulated any such news. With regard to the fact itself we may express our own opinion in an old quotation slightly modified:—

Rara avis in terris—certeque simillima balænæ—wherein the evident point must stand as apology for the inevitable contempt of prosody.

The theatre arranged and the scenery painted by Mr. Thomas Grieve.

At eight o'clock Her Majesty and Prince Albert entered the Rubens room, and the performance commenced. Refreshments were served in the Throne room. The Queen's private band was in attendance in a room close to the theatre.

MARIE CRUVELLI.

[Extract from a private letter.]

MARIE CRUVELLI is at Leipsic, studying with perseverance and assiduity. She has placed herself under one of the most eminent masters, and intends shortly to re-appear on the stage. Her fine contralto voice, her excellent musical knowledge, her good taste, and interesting appearance will, I am sure, render her a decided acquisition to any operatic establishment. When Marie Cruvelli made her début, as you may remember, at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 1851, in Thalberg's Florinda, with her sister Sophie, her voice and physique were both much admired; but a certain timidity of manner, arising from want of practice on the stage, and an over-delicacy of expression, did not permit her to bring her real talents into play. With practice and experience will come self-dependence and courage; and then, with Marie Cruvelli's natural capacities, her sound judgment and good taste, her fine person and handsome countenance, I do not entertain the slightest doubt of her ultimate success.

PARADISE LOST.—We understand that Dr. Wylde has entirely finished his musical illustration of Milton's great poem, the first part of which was so successful last season at the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society. The second part, we are informed, will be introduced in the course of the present—the third—season.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(Jan. 9) The Académie Impériale de Musique did not open, as is its annual custom, on New Year's Day. On Monday the Prophète brought, with Madame Tedesco and Roger, a crowded house. On Wednesday Le Comte Ory and the ballet of Ælia et Mysis comprised the entertainments, Rossini's exquisite opera being mutilated, as usual, for the convenience of Madlle. Priora and the Terpsichoreans. Where was Count Tisckiewistz? On Friday La Favorite, with Madame Tedesco and Roger, and La Fille mal gardée. (Jan. 12) Sophie Cruvelli was positively to appear in the Huguenots, as Valentine on the 11th, (Wednesday). Not a place was to be had for love or money. Fanny Cerito made her rentrée on Monday the 9th, in the ballet of Orpha.

At the Opéra Comique on Friday, Les Noces de Jeannette was performed for the début of Mademoiselle Boulart, a young singer lately engaged from the Conservatoire, pupil of Madame Damoreau for singing, and of Moreau-Sainti for declamation. At the last concours she gained the first prize in the character of Jeannette. The débutante acted with ease, and sang with taste. Her voice is flexible and well trained. Her success was undoubted, and at the end she was recalled. Couderc in the part of Jean was, as usual, excellent. Le Nabab was given on Tuesday, and continues to attract. At the Théâtre Italien on Tuesday, Ernani. The part of Elvira was filled by Mademoiselle Albini, who made her début in London last season at Covent Garden. For her début in Paris she would have been wiser to have selected a less difficult part. The Emperor and Empress were present. Mario has returned to Paris, and reappeared in Lucrezia on Thursday.* On Saturday, the Barbiere was revived, with Mademoiselle Alboni in the part of Rosina; Mario in Almaviva, and Rossi in Bartholo. The singing of the two former was prodigious. M. le Comte de Niewerkerque has recommenced his artistic receptions. M.M. Alard and Franchomme will shortly recommence their séances of instrumental chamber music. H. Marx, conductor of the Bals Valentino, has resigned the appointment. M. Antony Lamotte succeeds him.

A little comedy in one act, entitled, Souvent Femme Varie, by Mons. Amédée Achard, has been produced at the Odéon.—At the Théâtre du Vaudeville, Théaulon's piece of the Bénéficiaire, which was revived a short time since for Lepeintre's benefit, has been played every evening.—A new vaudeville, entitled, Un Cerveau Fêlé, has just been produced at the Théâtre du Palais Royal; Ravel sustains the principal character. The other pieces now played at this Theatre are L'Esprit Frappeur and Le Père Bonhomme.—The interior of the Ambigu-Comique has undergone a complete renovation. The theatre re-opened with La Prière des Naufragés (produced in this country at the Adelphi Theatre under the title of The Thirst of Gold) preceded by a short prologue.—The attraction at the Délassements-Comiques consists of a grand fairy spectacle by Messieurs Charles Potier, Albert Monnier, and Edouard Martin.

MARSEILLES.—At the church of Saint-Ferréol, a Mass by M. I. B. Croze has been performed. Among the pieces that produced the most effect were the "Kyrie," the "Gloria," the "Credo" and "Sanctus," and "Agnus Dei."

VIENNA.—On the 27th of December the British Minister, the Earl of Westmoreland, gave a grand musical Soirée, on which occasion several of his lordship's compositions—viz., two symphonies, overtures and vocal pieces were executed by an excellent band, under the direction of M. Krispin. The vocal department was sustained by Mesdames La Grua and Wildhauer, and Messieurs Ander and Staudigl. Leopold de Meyer and Vieuxtemps were invited as guests.—Leopold de Meyer has announced his first concert for the 5th of February.—The violoncellist Kellermann has arrived here with the intention of giving concerts.—Rudolph Willmers, the pianist, announces a second "cycle" of concerts—to adopt his own very absurd and affected expression.—Vieuxtemps, at his last concert, played his famous American piece on "Yankee Doodle," with great effect. The harpist, Mons. Dubetz, in one of Charles Oberthür's effective harp solos, was also favourably received. At his fourth concert, Vieuxtemps intends to play Ernst's Andante Spianato and Carnaval de Vénise.—At the Court Theatre Fidelio has met with great success. Madlle. La Grua played the principal part. In Donna Anna (Don Juan) the young artiste also shewed considerable progress: she succeeded in it better than in Fidelio. The opera was altogether well played.

BRUSSELS.—Rosa Kastner, the pianist, is here. She is to give a concert at Brussels, and play at the concerts of the Ghent Philharmonic Society.

LYONS, January 2.—The event of the last month at the Grand Theatre was the representation of the Juif Errant before an immense audience. Nothing had been spared in the mise-en-scène, and in the necessary rehearsals. The success was decided. The chief singers were Madame Rey-Sainton, Madlle. Van-Denhaute, and M. Wicart—all much applauded. The dancing was not inferior to the singing. Georges Hainl was the conductor.

VERCELLI.—January 2 (From a Correspondent).—Mr. Charles Braham made his début last week in Poliuto, as the Italian version of Donizetti's Les Martyrs is called. The Royal Italian Opera version, as your readers know, is entitled I Martiri. Mr. Charles Braham played Tamberlik's part and was very successful. The preghiera in the first act was received with much applause and obtained a recal for the singer. In the second act, the scena "I folgaro divino raggio" was also received with great favor, and Mr. Charles Braham had to come forward several times amid "bravos" and "benes." The solo in the quartet was not less successful. The finale, "Lascia mi in pace," wound up the act with éclat, and all the artistes were recalled. But the duet in the third act, "Il suon dell' arpa," was the most admired performance of the evening; nothing but a repetition would satisfy the audience, and this they obtained, despite the express wishes of the manager, who objects to encores on the reasonable pretext of their unnecessarily fatiguing his singers. Mr. Charles Braham is much improved, he studies hard, and has placed himself under a good master. Rocca Allessandri, the chief lady, sings well but is rather on the wane. The opera has been repeated, and with continued success. I hear that the theatres of Brescia, Bergamo, Cremona, and Turin have all been closed in consequence of the failure of the new operas.

PARMA, 28th Dec.—The Prophète has produced a great sensation. The music, so new to the Italian public, has been understood and admired. Octave, as Jean of Leyden, Sanchioli and Bendazzi as the two women, were highly efficient. The opera has been brought out with great splendour.

NICE, 24th December.—Our Italian troupe has made two fiascos, in the same opera, with two different prime-donne. One of them, Madame Boldrini, has experience but little or no voice; the other, Mdlle. Pecis, has voice but no experience. The fiasco of Marino Faliero was therefore complete, and has led to the replacement of Madame Boldrini by Madame Sannazzana, who made her début with success in Nina pazza per amore. This new vocalist is a good actress. She has not a great voice, but sings with taste. She was well seconded by the tenor Danielé, and the bass Antonnuccio, our two best singers. The directors gave the other week a benefit for M. Léa, solo violoncellist for forty years in the orchestra. The theatre was crammed. The bénéficiare, who appeared for the last time, was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled by the audience. A concert was given at the Hotel d'York by M. Alexandre Batta, the violoncellist, who played a vast quantity of his own music, which is not remarkably good. He won applause, however, by his execution. The young pianist, M. Lestoquoy, and other talented artists, assisted M. Batta.

TURIN.—A new ballet has been produced at the Reggio Theatre without success, although the well-known Carolina Rosati was greatly applauded. Madame Stoltz has signed an engagement with the impresario for the whole of the year 1854.

MADRID.—Mademoiselle Gazzaniga has met with great success in Verdi's Luisa Miller. When are London and Paris to hear this much talked of cantatrice?

* With Ernesta Grisi (vice Alboni) as Maffeo Orsini.

MILAN.—The carnival season has not opened brilliantly. The new opera, Il Convito di Baldassare, was but partially successful, while the ballet, Uriella, was hooted.

ANTWERP.—Sig. Paltoni, well known in England as a buffo singer, is engaged here for the winter. He has already appeared in Don Pasquale and the Barber of Seville, with success.

BERLIN.—The King has presented a valuable bracelet to Mademoiselle Marie Geiseler for her assistance at the Court Concert, under the direction of Dr. Kullak, pianist to his Majesty. Mr. Mitchell, from London, is here; he has made offers to the Royal Dom-Chorus for the purpose of giving concerts in London.

BRUNN.—Flotow's opera, Indra, has been produced, with indifferent results.

FRANKFORT.—Winter's opera of The Interrupted Sacrifice, has been revived with great succes. The Senate has voted a subvention of 15,000 florins to the Director of the Town Theatre. Teresa Milanollo is to give another concert.

HAMBURG.—Madlle. Babnigg, our prima donna, has fallen ill of the measles. In consequence, the opera of Marco Spada and the popular comic opera Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, by Halévy, had to be postponed. This was a fortunate circumstance for Wagner's Tannhaüser (which filled up the chasm), as this work was supposed to have been entirely put aside. Apropos, several witty squibs have issued from the pens of our literati, amongst which that by Dr. Schiff causes a good deal of merriment at the cost of poor Wagner, the gist being that having heard this composer's works (Wagner's) enabled us to value those of other composers.

LINZ.—At the fourth "Société Concert" were given, Beethoven's overture "Fidelio," an air from the Prophète, a trio by Fesca (piano, violin, and cello), and Ernst's Pirata fantasia (violin).

PRAGUE.—Jules Schulhoff is going to Paris at the end of February. Before his departure he intends to give a farewell concert.

WEIMAR.—In January it is the intention of Liszt, who has resumed his duties as kapellmeister, to give Dorn's opera Die Nieberlungen.

NEW YORK.—From a file of papers just received we learn that Jullien's Concerts at the Metropolitan Hall are still going on prosperously. One of the latest was given for the benefit of the Widows and Ophans of the Fire Department, the result of which may be gathered from the following correspondence, which appeared in the New York Herald of the 23rd ult.:—

The Widows and Orphans of the Fire Department.

Metropolitan Hall, Dec. 21, 1853.

To James Pryer, Esq., Chairman of the Committee:—Dear Sir, We beg to hand you, by the request of M. Jullien, the gross receipts of the concert given on Saturday last, for tickets and cash at doors, in aid of the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of the New York Fire Department. We regret exceedingly that the great inclemency of the weather prevented many parties from assisting M. Jullien in his endeavours to support your excellent institution. We are, dear sir, yours, very truly,

A. CHAPPELL and J. JOY.

Messrs. Chappel and Joy,—Gentlemen, Accept our most grateful thanks, as also those of the New York Fire Department, for the liberal benefit given to us on Saturday evening last, being the whole proceeds of same, amounting to over $1,400, it being the only one ever offered to us in so noble and liberal a manner, and which will, no doubt, produce more than any previous one. We remain, your obedient servants,

JAMES PRYER, Chairman Donation Committee.

New York, Dec. 22, 1853.

The Courier and Enquirer of the 20th devotes a long article to one of the recent concerts, the new feature of which was the well-known quadrille entitled "The Great Exhibition Quadrille," which seems to have made a great hit, and of which the critic in the same paper speaks in the following glowing terms:—

"It is the most peculiar, the most effective, the most thoroughly Jullienesque composition which the great conductor has yet produced here. Who has not heard it has not heard Jullien. For richness and variety it is unequalled by any pot pourri that we remember. The mastery of the orchestra and the power to combine musical sounds effectively with sounds which are mere noise, displayed in it, indicate a genius for instrumentation, an intuitive knowledge of the capacities and relations of all vibrating bodies, from sticks, stones, and brass kettles to violins, which truly borders on the marvellous. One of the most pleasing and original effects in the composition was produced by the use of the fagotto in the cadences of the Spanish Zapateado. It was indescribably quaint and grotesque and yet seemed so germane to the theme that the idea of its remarkable originality did not obtrude itself upon the mind until after a moment's reflection. The finale of this Quadrille shows Monsieur Jullien in his glory. It is introduced by a terrible clangor of an army of drums, which gradually diminishes, and finally dies away into an almost inaudible pulsation—in which, however, every parchment vibrates. After this, a few bars from the cornet and the stringed instruments are interrupted or rather overwhelmed by the roar of voices which finally break into a cheer and God save the Queen bursts from the whole band. It is played in the midst of a din which passes description. Bells ringing, apparently out of time and out of tune, cannon booming, and an inexplicable confused clash and roar made by one knows not what, and coming one knows not whence, convey the impression of a vast metropolis thronged with a jubilant multitude, and, in the midst of this and towering over it, is heard the English National Anthem. Were all London agog, its chimes ringing, salutes firing, and all its musicians uniting with all their hearts in God save the Queen, an audience suspended in mid-air over the city would hear very much such a combination of sounds as becomes harmonious under the baton of Monsieur Jullien in the splendid finale to this Great Exhibition Quadrille."

The Tribune of the 24th ult. speaks of the first performance of another work of Jullien's of a more serious character, namely, The Destruction of Pompeii.

"The subject," says the reporter of that journal, "is dramatically treated for the orchestra, with all the consummate skill of instrumentation which belongs to the author. As far as music can be descriptive it was so. We heard the old Greek hymn—the voluptuous dances—the quasi thunder—the mountain labour—the shrieks of the victims, fancy assisting the scene. This work, written some twenty years ago, was prophetic of orchestral effects which have been repeated by others."

On Christmas Eve, Jullien introduced a new symphony by an American composer. The name of the composer is Fry, the name of the symphony Santa Claus. It is a descriptive work, comprising an illustration of winter, the merrymaking of a juvenile party on Christmas Eve, Christmas morning celebrated by the hymn "Hither, ye Faithful," and the whole concluding with a Hallelujah chorus. The orchestra was increased for the occasion. Jullien took the utmost pains with the performance. The symphony was very favourably received, especially the solos allotted to Kœnig, Bottesini, Wuille, Lavigne, and Reichart. Fry has written other symphonies, and enjoys considerable reputation in the States as a composer, and Jullien was perfectly justified in encouraging native talent.

Jullien has also given, durlng the week, a "Mozart Night," when the Zauberflöte overture and the Jupiter symphony were finely performed; a "Shakspere Night," on which occasion Matthew Locke's Macbeth music was introduced, for the first time, to the Americans; and an "Irish Night." On the last occasion, Vincent Wallace's overture to Maritana, a romance by the same composer, performed by Kœnig, a set of quadrilles on subjects from Balfe's operas, and another called the "Hibernian," in which the great feature, "St. Patrick's Day," accompanied by the chorus, made as great an effect as "Hail Columbia," in the American quadrille. Jullien was cheered by the whole audience. Madame Anna Zerr sang "The Last Rose of Summer" and "The Minstrel Boy."

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Want of space prevents our noticing, as fully as we could wish, the new piece entitled Paula Lazaro, or the Ladrone's Daughter, that was produced for the first time at this theatre on Monday last. It is from the pen of Mr. Mark Lemon, and was favourably received. The scenery and costumes are good, while the incidental music by Mr. Alfred Mellon is written with the usual skill of that rising musician, and is dramatic and melodious. We are sorry to say, however, that the orchestra did but small justice to it.

THE AMERICAN BROADWOOD.

[We transcribe the following about the late eminent American piano-forte manufacturer, whose death was announced in our Boston correspondence last week, from The New York Musical Review and Choral Advocate.—Ed.]

"Death of Jonas Chickering.

"It is our sad duty to announce the death of Mr. Jonas Chickering, the well-known piano-forte manufacturer of Boston. It occurred suddenly, at 11 o'clock, P.M., on Thursday, December 9th, from a stroke of apoplexy, which overtook him at a friend's house, where he was visiting, apparently in good health.

"His funeral was very numerously attended on Monday, 12th; all the music-stores, piano-forte warehouses, etc., being closed during its progress.

"We yield the pen to one of our seniors, who has enjoyed an intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Chickering for a quarter of a century."

"JONAS CHICKERING.

"Before this can come under the notice of the subscribers to the Review, notwithstanding they are widely scattered through the country, they will have heard of the death of one who is well known not only by name, but by his works, to all the lovers of music in the land. It may be safely said, without in the slightest degree undervaluing the important labours of others, that no man has done as much (here) towards perfecting the instrument which has now become indispensable in almost every dwelling, as he whose deeply-lamented and sudden death has recently been announced. The piano-forte has grown up and come to maturity, in this country, under the care and direction of Mr. Jonas Chickering, late of Boston. The very great change which he has made in the capacity of the instrument cannot be realized by any but by those who have actually on hand one manufactured a quarter of a century ago, and who have thus the means of an actual comparison of the old with the new. The improvements in travelling by rail and by steam are hardly greater, than has been the growth and development of the instrument under the administration—as we believe the piano-forte manufacturers will permit it to be called—of Mr. Chickering. But it is not to the great progress which he has made in his peculiar business that we would now call the attention of our readers. Mr. Chickering did indeed excel in the business he had chosen, but his excellence as a mechanic was not greater than his excellence as a man. Who so strictly honest? On whose word could one rely with such implicit confidence? Who so perfectly upright, transparent, and free from guile in all his dealings with his fellow men? Who so far removed from pride, assumption, and arrogance! Who so free from all that men call mean or overreaching in his dealings with his fellow-men? Who so universally kind and ready at all times to attend to the calls of others? Whose heart more liberal? Whose hand more open? Who so universally pleasant in looks, in words, and in actions towards both friends and foes? Who so ready to listen to the sad tale of others' woes? To sympathize with the oppressed and to relieve the suffering? We have known him, aye, known him intimately, for at least twenty five years, and we can hardly find words to express our admiration of the undeviating constancy of his goodness. But he needs not the feeble tribute of our praise; his memory is deeply engraven on the hearts of many who have been partakers of his benefaction; yet we felt a strong desire to say a passing word, bearing testimony to that which we have seen and known. Truly, "an honest man is the noblest work of God.

"PUPILS OF MENDELSSOHN."

We extract the following from the New York Musical Review and Choral Advocate:—

"A recent number of Dwight's Journal has an excellent communication, showing up the humbug of those artists who, coming to us from Germany, delight to announce themselves as 'pupils of Mendelssohn, Liszt, Thalberg,' etc., when they have no real claim to such title. In most cases these pretenders have been merely members of classes which have received a few lessons from these distinguished men. 'Neither Mendelssohn nor Liszt,' says Dwight's correspondent, 'ever gave private lessons on the piano, as professors generally do.' This remark is, perhaps, literally true, and yet may be misunderstood. Liszt does not, perhaps, give lessons 'as other professors do;' but it is a mistake to suppose that he in no cases gives private piano lessons. He does not give such lessons merely from pecuniary reasons, however; and it is extremely difficult to obtain such instruction from him, as he only gives it where he takes a fancy (from perception of extraordinary talent, or other reasons) to the person desiring it. At least we know of a young American who, during much of the past year, has enjoyed the advantage of some hours' private instruction per week from Liszt, and who is still with him."

Liszt may give lessons; we have no doubt he does. Thalberg gives lessons; we know he does, and gets well paid for them. But Mendelssohn never gave lessons. "A pupil of Mendelssohn" is, therefore, no better than a puffing advertisement.

MUSICAL NECROLOGY FOR 1853.

The year 1853 has been remarkable for the death of celebrated men, and the musical art has contributed its share to the list. The following are some of the principal musicians who have been snatched away from us. Jadin, father of French composers and professors (his wife followed him to the grave eight days afterwards); Dabadie; Filippo Galli; Georges Onslow; Orfila, a celebrated French dilettante; Joseph Guillou, a French flautist, who died at St. Petersburgh; Louis Duport, ballet master and theatrical manager; Zimmermann; Planard; Amédée de Beauplan; Madames Launer and Launer Manera; Madame veuve Boïeldieu; Matteo Carcassi; Ricordi, the music publisher; Aloïs Fuchs; J. P. Schmidt; Frederich Schneider; Pietro Raimondi; Madame Ronzi de Begnis, an Italian singer; Lise Christiani, violoncellist; Lichtenthal, author of a musical dictionary; Andrévi; Schornstein; Henschkel.—Ménestrel.

JENNY LIND AND HER BABY.

"The noble Swede lately sang again at a charity concert in Dresden. A musical critic remarks that her voice is no longer what it was; the middle register having suffered perceptibly. Her physician remonstrated with her as to her performing the office of nurse to her child, warning her that her voice would be sure to suffer thereby. She replied that, happen what might, she would perform a mother's duty to her boy."

[We reprint the above from the New York Musical World and Times, merely for the purpose of arraigning it as a miserable canard.—Ed. M. W.]

MUSIC IN RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg possesses two theatres—the Little and the Great. A third was provisionally constructed for an Italian company, but destroyed by fire shortly after the opening. The Little Theatre, devoted to Thalia, is occupied alternately by the Russian comedians and the French company, who represent vaudevilles, comedies of Molière, and sometimes even dramas. The second, or the Great Opera, is destined to the performance of Russian tragedies, operas, ballets, and to the German company, which some years ago gave Weber's chef-d'œuvre there. The decorations are beautiful, and the costumes rich; but the orchestra is bad and incomplete, and vainly would you look for a distinguished singer in the company. Hence the theatre is generally deserted, and the higher classes, who alone frequent plays, go only to the vaudevilles of M. Scribe, whose success is as certain at Petersburg as at Paris. Many causes are opposed to the formation of good musicians at Petersburg. If even there were an academy of music, or any similar institution, they would be useless, for the title of artist is too exalted for the people to indulge any hope of attaining it; the nobility will not descend to it; and a middle class, which might have it, does not exist.

These two theatres are under the imperial direction, which obliges them to close during the six weeks of Lent and Easter. Then begins the era of Musique de Salon, which terminates on Maunday Thursday. This ephemeral existence is marked by daily concerts, given in the Philharmonic Rooms, a magnificent building. Some distinguished artists are heard at these concerts, but all foreigners. Never is a Russian name found among them. The vocal department is very weak as to the solos, but the choruses are perfectly executed by the singers of the court. The orchestra is not numerous; it performs with tolerable precision, but without expression, and it would probably be much embarrassed if required to execute one of Beethoven's symphonies in its true character.

The church music, all in plain chant, shows the happy results which might be expected under another government, from the astonishing musical dispositions of the Russian people. It is impossible to describe the effect produced by three hundred infantine voices singing, without accompaniment of any kind, the soft and simple melodies of the Greek rite.

Military music is generally very good in Russia—the intonation of the horns and trumpets is peculiarly remarkable. A sort of music, peculiar to Russia, remains to be mentioned. It is produced by a kind of tubes, which give but one note each. Such an orchestra, to be effective, must, of course, be very numerous; but the effect is admirable. The sound, better supplied than that of any other wind instrument, may be swelled and diminished at pleasure, and thus joins force to expression. This music, which is sufficiently rare in Russia, is in great requisition at the fêtes; it is generally played in a garden, and the effect produced at a great distance, on a delightful Russian night, is wonderful.

The Russians possess a great number of national songs, which, at first hearing, are not without a certain charm; but they have the fault of being all formed on the same model, which gives them a monotonous tinge, by which one is soon fatigued. But a more complicated kind of music could not be executed on the balalaika, the only instrument by which the Russian moujik is accompanied. A piece of wood, rudely shaped, narrower, and more flat than the guitar, furnished with three strings, has neither great resources, nor very attractive charms. As to the words of these songs, they are for the most part but little honourable to the poetic spirit of the Russian troubadour.

A CRY FOR NATIVE TALENT.

(From the New York Musical Review.)

"In the course of some very just remarks in the article in Dwight's Journal, to which we have alluded, we find the following:

'As the good is always more scarce than the bad, Germany numbers also many more bad than good musicians: and, unfortunately, she likes to send her worst ones to America, and keep the best herself!'

"This we heartily endorse. American art and artists have suffered much from the men here alluded to. They are that class of foreigners who, coming among us because they had not the ability or knowledge to sustain themselves at home, delight in sneering at everything musical which is American. American composers, or teachers, or singers, they are in the habit of abusing on all possible occasions. These are they who are fond of deriding the "Yankee Psalm-singers," and 'Down-east Singing-masters,' as they term American musicians.

"It is unfortunate that we in America have great musical reverence for a mustache and a foreign accent. Having been accustomed (very justly) to regard Germany as that country which has made the highest musical progress, and given to the world the greatest masters of this science, we have made the foolish mistake of thinking every German must be a good musician! As if a diet of sour krout and German sausages must necessarily result in musical proficiency!

"A brighter day is dawning, however. We are beginning to discover, that the mere fact that a man is a German does not necessarily make him a musician. American teachers, who add to a sufficient musical knowledge, that common sense which enables them to impart it to others, are beginning to be appreciated, and to rank in the estimation of the people more nearly as they should, while, as a consequence, those foreigners whose chief qualifications have been high pretensions and impudence, are beginning to be properly appreciated also.

"Now, let us not be misunderstood (misrepresented we expect to be), as taking ground against German music and musicians. Germany has given us the great masters, who stand far above all others. Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and John Sebastian Bach, are names in reverence of which we yield to none. Their works are those which we would counsel all to study and look up to, as the great models of musical excellence. We have also many German musicians among us, gentlemen of real ability and knowledge, who are exerting a most beneficial influence, and accomplishing a great work, and whom we delight to honor. It is these others who are mere pretenders, and by whom we have been so much imposed upon, that we take exceptions to; and it is these who are loudest in their sneers and abuse of American music."

[Would not the above—Mutato Nomine—read just as well in Paris and London?—Ed.]

A Fact for Theatrical Statists.—No less than four metropolitan managers appeared together in one piece, Money, at Windsor Castle on Thursday evening. They were Mr. C. Kean, Mr. Buckstone, Mr. Webster, and Mr. A. Wigan.

A CONTEMPORARY OF MOZART.

At the three hundredth representation of Don Juan in Berlin, there was one person present who also assisted at its first performance in Berlin in 1790. The name of that veteran, now eighty-three years of age, is Semler. A desk of honour was set apart for him in the orchestra, and he played the tenor as a volunteer, fancying all the while, no doubt, that he had suddenly become younger again by sixty-three years.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH.—The latest novelty at the Pump-Room Concerts is the Organophonic Band. Messrs. Green and Sims, by their judicious management, continue to make these concerts highly attractive.

LEAMINGTON.—Mr Thomas gave a concert at the Music Hall yesterday se'nnight. He was assisted by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Signor Piatti, Miss Birch, and Mr. Frank Bodda. One of the two sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello, by Mendelssohn, was played by Sterndale Bennett and Piatti. The performance was received with the loudest acclamations. "The superb playing of the great English pianist," says the Leamington Courier, "was listened to with profound attention and delight, and his execution of Mendelssohn's sonata, with Signor Piatti, elicited the unmistakeable admiration and applause of the company. Great as was the expectation formed of him, no one could have looked forward to so splendid a treat as that supplied by the classical music of Mendelssohn interpreted with such perfect execution and expression of the purest kind. The instrument upon which Mr. Bennett played—the finest ever sent out of London—was forwarded expressly to Mr. Thomas's concert by Messrs. Broadwood." Messrs. Sterndale Bennett and Thomas played a duet by Mozart for two pianos; Miss Bird sang "Casta Diva" and a new song, "Whither," by Mr. Thomas; and Mr. Frank Bodda gave two of his popular ballads. Mr. E. Sharp, R.A.M., was accompanyist.

LEICESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The annnounce- of Haydn's Creation at Nicholson's Concerts for the People, drew together the largest audience yet assembled in our Music Hall. Nearly 1200 persons availed themselves of the treat provided for them by our townsman, Mr. Henry Nicholson. Such attempts to elevate the musical taste of the masses deserve to be encouraged. The solo vocalists on Monday were Madame Weiss, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Oldershaw; Miss Deacon, the Misses Ireland, and Miss Wagstaff; Messrs. Royce, Bloxham, Branston, Toon, &c. were among the chorus, which was even more effective than at the last meeting. The band, which included the Messrs. Nicholson, Henry Farmer, Ridgway, Weston, Selby, Day, Sansome, etc., with Mr. Lohr at the Harmonium, was equally efficient. Madame Weiss sang "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," and the duetts "By thee with bliss" and "Graceful Consort," exceedingly well. Mr. Weiss was heard to great advantage in the recitative describing the creation of the beasts, and in the air immediately succeeding, "Now heaven in fullest glory shone." Our townsman, Mr. Oldershaw, by his correct reading of the concerted music, rendered good service, and in the songs, "Now banish" and "In native worth," but for a misplaced cadenza, where Haydn certainly never intended one, would have been unexceptionable. As a whole the performance of the oratorio was one of the best we have heard, and we believe was the first ever given at such low prices with so strong a force of vocalists and instrumentalists. It was, however, proved on Monday evening that good music well performed may be made remunerative, even though the main support comes from the labouring classes. Mr. Nicholson is making arrangements for a similar performance of the Messiah.

THORNEY, PETERBOROUGH.—Mr. A. Thacker (a pianist of Peterborough) gave a vocal and instrumental concert at Thorney on Tuesday, January 10th. Financially the affair was not encouraging; but artistically, the concert was good. Messrs. Strickland and Harley (of the Peterborough Cathedral) were the singers. The solo violinist was Mr. F. Bray (of Lynn), who was encored in one of his pieces; and Mr. Farmer (of Lynn) performed upon the cornet-à-piston.

BELFAST.—On Thursday evening, the Classical Harmonists' Society's concert took place at the mansion of the president, Lord Dufferin and Clandeboye. A distinguished party partook of his lordship's hospitality; and the performances gave great satisfaction. A spacious orchestra was erected in the picture gallery; the singers numbered sixty; Mr. W. V. Barry was conductor. The programme was varied and select. Mr. Barry's Lalla Rookh solo, for piano, obtained compliments from the Hon. Mrs. Norton, who was present. Another pianoforte piece, "L'Abbandone," by the late lamented Earl of Belfast, was received with much favour. After supper, Mr. W. Speakman proposed the health of Lord Dufferin. The toast was received with acclamations. Mr. Barry proposed Lady Dufferin, which was honoured with enthusiasm. Mr. Barry again rose, and gave the health of the Hon. Mrs. Norton, which was drunk with all the honours. Mr. Barry's health was also given, and honoured in a bumper, after which the proceedings terminated, the members departing impressed with the courtesy and hospitality in which they had just participated.—Abridged from the Northern Whig, Dec. 31.

DEWSBURY (From a Correspondent).—The Committee of the Mechanics' Institute gave their Christmas concert in the room of the Institution on Tuesday evening, December 27th. The vocalists were Miss Hopworth, Mrs. Paget (late Miss Clarke), R.A.M., Mr. Newsome, Leeds, and Mr. Paget. Miss Hopworth, a soprano, sang Balfe's "I'm a merry Zingara" and "Kate O' Shane" (Lindley); the latter was encored. She also sang Horn's duet, "I know a bank" with Mrs. Paget, "Crudel Perchè" (Mozart), and the "Sol fa" duet (Barnett), with Mr. Paget, all of which were applauded. Mr. Newsome sang "There is a flower that bloometh," (Wallace), "When other lips" (Balfe), and "The Death of Nelson;" the last being deservedly encored. Mr. and Mrs. Paget made their first appearance here. Mrs. Paget, who possesses a contralto voice, gave several ballads in an expressive manner. She was encored in "Bonnie Dundee." Mr. Paget won the favor of the audience by the style in which he gave some favorite bass songs; he was encored in Glover's ballad "The Stolen Child." He also gave with Mrs. Paget, Donizetti's "Senza tanti complimenti," and Parry's duet "Old and Young," which was also encored, as was also "The Gipsies laughing trio" (Glover) sung by the two ladies and Mr. Paget. Mr. Broughton, the pianist, accompanied the vocal pieces, and played a piece of his own on the Sonnambula. The National Anthem terminated the concert, which afforded gratification to a large audience.

BENEDICT—This eminent composer, who, at a very tender age, created a sensation in Dresden and Leipsic by his pianoforte playing, was, on Weber's recommendation, appointed musical director at the Imperial Opera House in Vienna, and, three years later, filled the same post in the Grand Theatre of San Carlo, at Naples, where his operas, The Portuguese in Goa and A Year and a Day, were favourably received. After this he became conductor of the Opera Buffa in London, and composed The Gipsy's Warning, which ran for thirty-six successive nights at Drury Lane Theatre. In the autumn of 1850, he accompanied Jenny Lind on her triumphal journey through the United States of America.—Munich paper.

THE FIRST AMERICAN OPERA.—The first opera composed by an American was, to quote the original advertisement of the publishers, "The Saw-Mill; or, a Yankee Trick, a comic opera, in two acts, as performed at the theatre, Chatham Garden, with distinguished success. Written and composed by Micah Hawkins, N.Y. Printed by J. and J. Harper, 1824." Mr. Hawkins was born Jan. 1st, 1777, and died July 29th, 1825.

FREDERICH SCHNEIDER.—Schneider was born at Waltersdorff, Jan. 3rd, 1786. In 1803, his first pianoforte composition was published by Breitkopf and Haertel, at Leipzic. His works are very numerous. He filled the post of Capellmeister to the Prince of Anhalt Dessau, since 1821. He died at Derran, Germany, Nov. 23, 1853.

PAY NOT PLAY.—"An extraordinary theatrical novelty," says the Field, "was exhibited in Drury Lane Theatre on Thursday last, in the form of a receipt for £4000, being the amount paid by Mr. Smith for one year's rent of that establishment. Mr. Dunn, the treasurer of the Drury Lane Committee, states that such an event had not occurred for five and twenty years."—[Perhaps Mr. Smith will favour the committee with a theatrical novelty still more extraordinary on the boards of old Drury, viz., a good actor.]

THEATRICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.—The Theatre of War. (From Punch.) We are enabled to state that the appearance of MR. BULL, so long underlined, will positively take place in a short time. He will appear in the revived drama of The English Fleet.

MUSIC OF A GOOD CHRISTIAN.—A furious would-be composer, who was constantly persecuting the manager of the theatre at Lyons to bring out a work he had composed, entitled, Lausus et Lydie, was asked one day why he did not send his work to Paris, on which one of the company present replied, "Because the gentleman is a good Christian and wishes to be buried in his own parish." Ever since, the people of Lyons entitle the music of this amateur, the music of a good Christian.

CONCERT-GIVING IN NEW YORK.—It has become a settled maxim with professional concert-givers, that profit is not to be expected from concerts given in New York. The expenses absorb all but the largest receipts. New York, say the professionals, is to the rest of the United States, what Europe is to New York, namely, the place where the reputation is made; or, in other words, it is the dog, on which the physic is tried. If New York swallows the dose, it is considered safe to administer the same article to the smaller cities. With regard to the expenses of concerts here, we can testify that they are prodigious; a very moderate concert costs five hundred dollars. Some concerts, including preliminaries, have involved an expenditure of as many thousands. Therefore, think twice before you give a concert.—Home Journal.

ACCIDENT AT THE STRAND THEATRE.—During the performance of the pantomime, last Tuesday evening, one of the wings slipped, by some unaccountable accident, out of the grooves, and fell upon a little boy who was playing one of the subordinate parts. Mr. G. W. Bridgeman, who happened to be present, immediately proceeded behind the scenes to tender his professional assistance, but the little sufferer had already been conveyed to a neighbouring surgeon's, and is at present progressing favourably.

MUSIC AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—It is proposed to have a gigantic organ and a band of forty performers in the great national palace at Sydenham. Nothing, however, is definitely settled.

MISS VINNING, who recently gained the King's Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, is already known to the public as one of the most rising of our younger concert singers.

MR. GUSTAVUS BROOKE has just finished a series of performances at Cork and Limerick. When he had accomplished his engagement at the former place, and arrived at Limerick, the Mayor and many of the wealthiest inhabitants of Cork addressed a petition to Mr. Brooke for one more performance, apostrophising him in terms which would have been too strong for Kean or Macready to accept without blushing. With the easy magnanimity of greatness, Mr. Brooke (having a night to spare) assented. When he had got to Cork, an address from the Mayor and many of the wealthiest inhabitants of Limerick, addressed the tragedian to similar purport. With the easy magnanimity of greatness, Mr. Brooke (having a night to spare) again assented. The whole affair—with the Mayor's petitions and Mr. Brooke's reply—was advertised in the Cork and Limerick papers. The advertisements took up a column, which may account for the editors of those papers writing leading articles on Mr. Brooke and his magnanimity. In these articles the writers place him many degrees above Garrick and George Cooke. Mr. Brooke is now on his way to the metropolis, where he is bound to fulfil an engagement with Mr. Smith at Drury Lane for 130 nights, which is a good omen for the threatened English opera.

BAL MASQUE AT THE GRAND OPERA IN PARIS.—The annual series of masked balls has commenced. To judge from the first night the season will be a highly successful one. Among the quadrilles executed by Musard's orchestra, is a new set entitled Les Clairons, which surpassed everything of the kind ever heard—for noise. The theatre has been newly decorated, and, according to our informant, presents a most brilliant appearance.

HUNGARIAN PROMENADE CONCERTS.—These entertaining performances continue to be carried on with great spirit by Mr. Simpson, the Director. M. Kalozdy and his wonderful little orchestra are as popular as ever. They have introduced Jullien's new American Quadrille into their répertoire, which produces an immense effect. The Tyrolean singers are also well received. Those graceful duet-singers, the Misses Brougham, are re-engaged.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The last performance of the Messiah, for the present, took place last night. The hall was crammed. The performance was excellent. Elijah will be the next oratorio.

MR. BENEDICT will return to town next week to conduct the concert of the Harmonic Union on the 23rd.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FAYERMAN'S PATENT MUSIC-TIMEKEEPER. The object of this Timekeeper is to enable a performer to see, hear, and keep time in Music, in any measure in which it is written. The time can not only be changed instantly from one rate of speed to another, without suspending its motion, but it can also be accelerated, retarded, or stopped at pleasure, Every alteration in the time is rendered visible; and counting and beating become almost superseded. The Timekeeper is not restricted to private use, but is available for the Choir, the Orchestra, the School, &c. It has been pronounced, by those who have seen it, to be the most complete instrument for effecting the above objects, and of the greatest utility in teaching and playing music. On the 9th January, 1854, was published, a Description of the Timekeeper, with numerous Illustrations, (price Four Shillings), which may be had of the Patentee, Mr. Edmund R. Fayerman, No. 7, Shaftesbury Crescent, Pimlico. A copy will be transmitted, post free, on receipt of a letter enclosing Postage Stamps, or an order on the Pimlico Post-office.

NOTICE.

We have to inform our readers that the office for the publication and sale of THE MUSICAL WORLD is removed to MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS', No. 28, Holles Street, Cavendish Square. Subscriptions, Advertisements, Music for Review, Correspondence, and all communications whatever for this Journal, must be addressed, henceforward, to the EDITOR OF THE MUSICAL WORLD, care of MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, as above.

A PUPIL OF MENDELSSOHN.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

MR. EDITOR,—In your impression of to-day, after quoting an extract from the New York Musical Review and Choral Advocate, you make the following remarks:—

"Liszt may give lessons; we have no doubt he does. Thalberg gives lessons; we know he does, and gets well paid for them. But Mendelssohn never gave lessons. 'A pupil of Mendelssohn' is, therefore, no better than a puffing advertisement."

Now, I am not in the habit either of puffing or advertising myself; and I deeply regret the necessity which compels me, on the present occasion, publicly to state that I received from Dr. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, a long course of instruction in pianoforte playing, counterpoint, and composition.

I could, were I inclined to do so, call upon many ladies and gentlemen, whose names are well known both in England and in Germany, to substantiate what I say; but to those who are unwilling to believe my single assertion, I will not condescend to bring forward proofs that I am not telling a falsehood.

There are other pupils of Mendelssohn, who are neither puffers nor advertisers. If they feel any regard for the memory of their lamented master, they will not scruple to come forward and publicly avow a fact on which they have just reason to congratulate themselves.

I remain, Mr. Editor, yours,

Jan. 14th, 1854. WILLIAM ROCKSTRO.

MISS ROSA P. LYNE.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—I beg to call your kind attention to a mistake which has crept into your valuable paper a second time, or I should not have noticed it. If you refer to page 823, of the 24th of December, 1853, and page 29 of your last, you will find that both times you have announced Miss Vinning to be the elected King's Scholar of the last examination, which is a great mistake on your part, and very unjust towards the real King's Scholar, who is Miss Rosa P. Lyne, an extremely talented and clever student, and one who is indeed worthy of the honour she has obtained. I therefore beg you will have the goodness to correct this error in your next.—I remain, dear Sir, yours obediently,

A STUDENT OF THE ACADEMY.

P.S. As a proof of my statement I refer you to the Academy books and the Times newspaper of that date.

ERNST.

THE musical public will be pleased to hear that Ernst intends to spend the season in London, and will arrive here in less than a fortnight from the present date.

THERE is no Overture; and a very short Introduction is but an accompaniment to the rising of the curtain and the entrance of Œdipus and Antigone. The grave expression of the opening bars proclaims the tragic, the almost solemn character of the work, and the succeeding phrase, commenced by two flutes alone and continued by two clarionets, is a beautiful suggestion of the gentle devotedness, the engrossing affection of the blind king's daughter.

The action takes place in the sacred grove of the Eumenides, whither the all-ruling destiny, of which the Theban hero is the involuntary yet scarcely unconscious victim, has led the wanderers' steps. Antigone, the loving parasite that still clings to the noble trunk which reared her—now in its decay its only sustenance, reciprocating the support she once received—supplies to her dependant father that most precious sense which, in the paroxysm of anguish, he destroyed. She is his sight; and through the medium of her glowing speech his mind's eye can perceive the more than natural beauties of the scene by which they are surrounded. A Coloniate warns them that the spot, to which unknowingly they have strayed, is holy ground, and answers to their inquiries, that they are at Colonos, in the Athenian territory. Urged by Œdipus, he goes to announce their presence to the royal Theseus, implying, in terms of oracular mystery, that "for little aid he much may gain." Œdipus then invokes the goddesses, within whose sanctuary he stands, to bring his more than mortal sufferings to their timely close. Phœbus, in fulfilment of whose predictions his career of chequered fortune has thus far been brought, has foretold that his death will take place in some spot consecrated to the Fates, and be announced by the most awful voice of Nature—the earthquake and the thunderstorm—its event being the certain harbinger of welfare to whomever may afford him kindly protection. Anxious at the approach of strangers, the wanderers penetrate further into the grove.

No. 1.

The chorus, personating the Senators and Elders of Colonos, come in quest of the strangers, who have intruded into the sacred precincts. Their eager search for those whom the messenger to Theseus has described, and their horror at the strangers' temerity in approaching the hallowed spot, are embodied in the first strophe, wherein the distribution of the text between the first and second choirs, into which the body of choristers is always divided, has an effect eminently dramatic and calculated to realize the consternation, mixed with indignation, which is stimulated by the sense of sacrilege. The awe of the presiding virgins, whose name is a terror, and whose supposed proximity silences even the voice of prayer and compels the passers by to think rather than to utter their adjurations, is livingly expressed by the hushed and breathy quality of the low notes of the tenor voices in a passage commencing :—

In this, however, admirable as is the general effect, it is due to the very merit of this general effect, to the very greatness of Mendelssohn, to except against the irrelative and consequently unsatisfactory employment of the D natural in the above quotation, which I cannot feel to be essential to the poetical expression, and must own to be objectionable to the musical propriety. Thus much for conscience' sake. Grammar is a hard taskmaster, and it has ever been the province of genius if not to slacken his severity, certainly to widen his limitations. It is because genius has succeeded in making our art what it is, out of the crude chaos of barbarism and pedantry of which Gregorianism is the type, that it becomes a duty, in examining the process of this alchymical power, to discriminate scrupulously between the pure ore which it reveals and the dross that passes also through its alembic. Were we to accept every novelty in art as an excellence—were we to refer to practice, instead of principle, example instead of precept,—we should end by confounding beauty with ugliness, and be compelled to refer to some arbitrary and artificial system, such as that of the cold and uncongenial contrapuntal school, to distinguish between the two. Thus much, I say, for conscience' sake; and very much, it seems, is involved in the due deference to this exacting intuition, since all these words, and all this amount of our friendly editor's "valuable space," have been expended in the discussion of a single note. The D natural is, to me, truly un-natural; the minor third in the dominant harmony is, to me, a deformity. Let those who like it justify it as they may; and that they like it will be to them its best justification. The passage is, I have said, most truthfully conceived; and because, in my reverence, I question the propriety of a single harmony, surely its general truthfulness of expression is not discoloured.

Œdipus discovers himself, in answer to the summons of the chorus-leader—expressed in recitative for a bass solo. Then follows a colloquy between Œdipus and Antigone, who speak, and the chorus, who sing, in which the latter respond to the fugitives' appeal for hospitality in broken exclamations of dismay at their impious intrusion.

We next come to the first antistrophe, in which, with most admirable judgment, the music of the relative strophe —with only such slight modifications as are induced by the proper accentuation or pointed declamation of some occasional words—is adapted to the continuous verses, the responsive portions divided between the first and second choirs being now reversed. It is highly interesting to trace the coincident propriety of the general expression in the adaptation of the same, or nearly the same, music to lines certainly of a different, if of a somewhat analagous sentiment. Surprise at the blind helplessness of the intruder soon gives place to fearfulness of the results of his profane presence within the holy circle. As an example of what I have admired in the adaptation of the old expression to the new situation, I will refer to the passage of which the commencement is quoted above, where the chorus acknowledge their awful reverence of the powers of the place, and which is now fitted to the words :—

"Therefore beware, unhappy stranger!
Hence remove from that awful place," &c., &c.

The chorus leader, in solo recitative, then directs them to a spot without the sacred verge, where they may freely converse with them. The blind man's conference with his daughter, while she supports his tottering feebleness, step by step to the appointed place, is exquisitely enforced by this very picturesque accompaniment :—

This is a fair example of the deep feeling evinced throughout the orchestral colouring of the spoken dialogue of the play.

The second Strophe introduces a change of movement. A short and very marked melody is almost immediately interrupted by speaking; but the unbroken continuance of the orchestral figure connects the dialogue in the progress of the music. The measured motion of the accompaniment then ceases; and the following earnest passage, for the voices in full harmony, is thus made to enunciate the injunction to which it is set, with great emphasis :—

The second Antistrophe is, like the first, set to a repetition of the music of the preceeding Strophe, with such occasional alterations as the rendering of particular words exacts. This regular division of the verse into corresponding sections is now, however, discontinued; and when, in consequence of repeated exhortations, the unhappy wanderer declares himself to be Œdipus, the entire body of voices unite in an exclamation of horror—accompanied by the full orchestra, of which the extreme power is now first employed. There is scarcely in the whole work a more powerful effect than is here produced. The feeling of the awful character of the reputed crimes of Œdipus, and the thrilling agony of dismay that revolts from the presence of their actor, are embodied with a grandeur true to the situation.

To speak in musical, no longer Aristotelian, terminology, what succeeds may be described as the coda of this interesting piece. The chorus warn Œdipus from the spot. The tearing open of his unhealed wounds renders him doubly sensitive to the disappointment of the expectation their ceremonious exactions have aroused. "Is this," he exclaims, "your promised protection?" Their reply—a sophistication, to the effect that, being deceived, they are justified in deception (a sentiment characteristic rather of the schools than of the chivalry of Greece)—and a command to the fugitives to depart instantly, and remove from the city the curse that hangs over their presence, is rendered in the most lengthened and much the most exciting passage that has yet appeared; by reason of its length it is unavailable for quotation, but its beauty is so obvious that, for such as can refer to the work, it is almost superfluous even thus to call attention to it. The ruthless character of the prominent melody, enhanced by the prolongation of the rhythm at the end of the second phrase, and still more enforced by the powerful climax to the stern and emphatic conclusion, is wonderfully coloured by the singularity of the orchestration, in which the accompaniment of the voices, by trombones in octaves, is a striking and important feature, while the peculiar employment of the harp, in a figure of a contrary measure to the pizzicato violins, sustains in a novel manner the agitated character of the situation.

Appended to the scene thus forcibly concluded, is an address of Antigone to the chorus, in which she appeals to them, by all their sympathies of home and kindred, to give ear to her, innocent, supplicating for her father, whose guilt, since being unconscious and visited by the gods, cannot merit this terrible retribution at the hands of mortals. The complete change here introduced into the feeling of the music, and the intense expression given, not only to the general sentiment but even to particular words, many of which are accompanied with a note to a syllable, evince the deepest poetical feeling and the keenest sense of dramatic propriety. G. A. MACFARREN.

BEETHOVEN ROOMS.—Mademoiselle E. St. Marc invited her friends and admirers to an evening entertainment on Wednesday evening at the rooms in Queen Anne Street. It was the annual Soirée Musicale of the young and fair pianist, and a crowded audience honoured the invitation. The vocalists were Misses Messent, Fanny Ternan, Annie de Lara, Van Millingen (sisters), and Mademoiselle Herrman; Messrs. Burdini, Henri Drayton, Perren, and M. Emile Villot. The instrumentalists, in addition to Miss St. Marc, were Herr Oberthur, harp, and the brothers Alfred and Henry Holmes, violin. The concert was of the popular chamber kind. The performances entitled to most notice, in the vocal department, were Miss Messent's, "Prita gia Soffre," very neatly sung; Fanny Ternan's "Batti, Batti," given with real artistic feeling and expression; and Signor Burdini's "Muletier de Calabre," a good comic song rendered with great animation and spirit. Miss St. Marc performed Mendelssohn's andante and rondo capriccio, in E minor, the grand duet, No. 1, for piano and violin, of Beethoven, with Mr. Alfred Holmes; duet for piano and harp, with Herr Oberthur, and Leopold de Meyer's Lucrezia Borgia fantasia, by desire. Mendelssohn's andante and rondo seemed to please the most, and narrowly escaped an encore. Miss St. Marc is most zealous and painstaking in her profession, and if determination constitute the true artist, she is certainly entitled to the distinction of being so called. Let her persevere, and there is no knowing to what she may not arrive. She is yet young, and has all her career before her. The brothers Holmes are both clever violinists, and Alfred promises to take a high position in his art. The concert was entirely satisfactory, and concluded before eleven. Conductors: Herr Meyer Lutz, Signor Pilotti, and Herr Rummel.

RACHEL AT ST. PETERSBURGH.

SOME of the accounts which have been received of Mdlle. Rachel's success in St. Petersburgh, speak of it in the highest terms, while others deny it altogether. From the most authentic and trustworthy information, we are enabled to state the real bearings of the case, and we feel bound, at the outset, to say that the success achieved by the great tragic actress has been immense; she is the idol of the public.

PARIS.—(From a Correspondent.)—By the 9th of December last (our news cannot be accused of being stale) Mdlle. Rachel had given twenty representations, and these twenty representations had produced 211,816 francs (£8,464 13s. 9d.). As our readers may be desirous of knowing what pieces were given, we will tell them. Phèdre was played four times, Marie Stuart four times, Andromaque four times, and Adrienne Lecouvreur four times. The largest sum taken in one night amounted to 11,818 francs (£472 10s.), on the occasion of the seventh representation of Adrienne Lecouvreur; and the smallest sum was 8800 francs (£352), for the second performance of Andromaque.

The subscriptions produced the enormous sum of 350,000 francs (£14,000); and, every morning, the public besieged the box-office to take those places which were not let for the season. We believe that, after the representations of Adrienne Lecouvreur, all the vacant places were absorbed in the subscription list. Thus we see an audience, which was, so to speak, always the same, rushing eagerly eight successive times to see the same play.

Such are the figures, or material side of Rachel's success. Is the reader desirous of becoming acquainted with what may be called its moral side? If so, here it is.

After the third performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur, some fifty young officers waited nearly two hours in the corridor for Rachel to pass. As soon as the great tragic actress, who was not informed of the circumstance, presented herself, the officers formed themselves in a double rank, holding in their hands their glittering helmets (for they all belonged to the Guards) As no one spoke, Madlle. Rachel took the initiative, and, with a salutation such as she alone is capable of making, addressed the young men, in that vibrating, deep voice with which we are all so well acquainted, as follows:—

"Gentlemen,—I have come to thank you from the bottom of my heart, for the marks of approbation which you manifest towards me. Had I been aware that you were doing me the honour of awaiting my arrival, I would have come sooner. I hope, gentlemen, that you will deign to pay me a visit at my house, for that will afford me an opportunity of once more thanking you for the bravos with which you overwhelm me, and of which I am proud. Be assured that the artist will never forget you."

These words were received with acclamations.

The next day, there was a general reception. Each officer made his appearance with a flower or leaf of the great actress's bouquet, which they had divided among themselves, the evening previous, and which served as a mark of recognition. Two officers happened to be talking of Rachel's success. "Plessy," they remarked, "had the Lancers for admirers; Volnys, the Artillery; Mila, the Dragoons, and Mayer, the Cossacks; but Rachel has all the regiments of the service at once." In fact, the entire youth of the army hardly knows to what acts to resort in order to prove its enthusiasm. The reader shall judge for himself by one instance, which smacks of the Régence mixed up with a little of the Tartar element.

The scene is laid in the establishment of Dussaux, the first restaurateur of St. Petersburgh, at one o'clock in the morning, after the play is over. Fifteen young men sit down to table—Phædra's health is drunk.

"Gentlemen," says one of the company, "you have just drunk Phædra's health; the glasses we have just emptied must never be used again."

The glasses are shivered into a thousand pieces. The health of Marie Stuart is drunk, the health of Andromaque is drunk, the health of Adrienne is drunk, and the health of Rachel is drunk, the last, possibly, more than once; and at each toast the glasses are broken. This was going very far, perhaps too far; but the company did not stop here. They threw all the dessert service out of the window, including even a magnificent table cover. After doing this, they made an appointment with each other for the next performance.

On this occasion, Madlle. Rachel was greeted with nine rounds of applause on her entrance, and recalled fifteen times. These recalls fatigued the great actress more than the performance itself. But there was no one waiting to receive her outside the theatre; it seemed as if all the enthusiasm of the public had been expended in the house.

Rachel reached her own residence. What did she find there? The cavalry officers stationed on the staircase, on which they had formed a path of roses and camelias from the vestibule up to the door of her apartment. The door itself was decorated with a wreath. Three rounds of applause saluted Adrienne, and then the officers, taking off their helmets, cried: "Homage to Genius!"

Nor is it from these rather turbulent young men alone, that Rachel has received proofs of the deep impression produced by her talent. On the festival of St. Catherine, she was invited to a soirée given by the Grand Duchess Helena, and attended by all the Imperial family. The Emperor, who had been rather indisposed for a couple of days, was the only one of its members not present. Rachel was to recite two scenes, and was asked for four. The Italian singers had been summoned to finish the entertainments; but the Empress, who had behaved with the most marked kindness towards the actress, withdrew as soon as the French scenes were terminated, but not before she had invited Rachel to a soirée, which was to take place a short time afterwards at the Winter Palace.

On the 7th of December, the whole Court was present at the performance of Adrienne Lecouvreur. This was the first time that the Imperial family had been to the theatre this season. It was expected that they would honour the French Plays frequently, since they had returned definitively from the country, although winter had not actually set in. On the 5th and 6th of December people had been able to dispense with fires. "The snow is a long time coming," says a letter now before us, "and I look forward to it ardently, for as yet I do not know Russia. At the present moment St. Petersburgh, as far as the temperature is concerned, very much resembles Paris, when the weather is gloomy, and there has been a little rain the night previous."

From the 8th of November to the 8th of December, Mdlle. Rachel will have performed twenty times. After Phædra, Marie Stuart, Andromaque, and Adrienne Lecouvreur, she was to play Roxalane. She was never in better vein. The repose she enjoyed during the summer has restored her strength, and she feels as if she were only at the commencement of her career. Why were we not allowed, before her departure, to profit a little by the return of her youth?

It is promised, however, that she will punctually return to Paris on the expiration of her leave of absence, and that she will devote six months to the Comédie Française. As for her resignation, which she has sent in, no one believes her to have been in earnest.

Sacred Harmonic Society.—The first performance for the season of Mendelssohn's Elijah, took place last night at Exeter Hall. There was an overflowing attendance.

Mr. Lambeth, of Portsmouth, has received the appointment of organist to the Glasgow Music Hall. Mr. Hiles has succeeded Mr. Lambeth as organist of St. Thomas's, Portsmouth.

Signor Calzolari.—The report of this gentleman's arrival in town is unfounded. Signor Calzolari is at St. Petersburgh, fulfilling his engagement at the Court Opera.

New Music Hall in Chester.—The present theatre in Chester (which, by the way, belongs to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners) is to be turned into a handsome music-hall, which will accommodate an audience of 1,400, and an orchestra of 300 performers. It is proposed to raise the sum required for the alterations (£3,000) in £5 shares.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.

The Creation was performed on Wednesday evening, being the third concert under Mr. Hullah's direction since the opening of the hall. Mr. Hullah is now supplying a high class of entertainment at a moderate charge, which affords hundreds of lovers of sacred music an opportunity of gratifying their tastes, without levying too large a contribution on their pockets. For this he deserves well of the public; and the public will, no doubt, support him. But the performances at St. Martin's Hall have an attraction independent of their cheapness—they are intrinsically good. The orchestra, if not large, is thoroughly efficient, and comprises among its members some of our best instrumental performers, and Mr. Hullah's first upper singing class constitutes a body of choristers which, from continual practice, has attained a degree of excellence highly creditable to their own perseverance and the method of training adopted by their preceptor. Mr. Hullah also engages the best principal vocalists; and thus, from an oratorio given under his direction, we may expect something worth hearing and worth paying for.

The performance of the Creation on Wednesday night was creditable to all concerned. The principal singers were Miss Birch, who sang the soprano parts of Eve and Gabriel; Mr. Lockey (tenor), Uriel; and Mr. Weiss, who interpreted the two bass parts of Raphael and Adam. Haydn's oratorio, the simplest and easiest of all the sacred works of the great masters, was given throughout with decided effect. The interdiction against applause and encores not existing at St. Martin's Hall, as is the case at the elder establishment in the Strand, many of the pieces were received with the utmost warmth, and one or two repetitions insisted on. The chorus was quite up to the mark. "The Heavens are telling," and "Achieved is the glorious work," especially, were given with precision and force. The soloists all distinguished themselves. Miss Birch was very happy in the well-known soprano airs, "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," (or "wings"). Mr. Weiss came out with great power in the popular scene, "Now heaven in fullest glory shone;" and Mr. Lockey obtained a well-deserved and unanimous encore for his pure and effective singing of "In native worth."

Mr. Hullah was received with great applause on his entrance into the orchestra. Owing to the crowded state of the room and the success of the performance, the oratorio of the Creation is to be repeated on Wednesday.

Signor Belletti has arrived in London for the season.

Mr. R. Harold Thomas.—This gentleman, a short account of whose concert at Leamington appeared last week, although very young, is a sub-professor in the Royal Academy of Music, one of the best pianists in that institution, and moreover a composer. Mr. Thomas is a favourite pupil of Mr. Sterndale Bennett, who so kindly lent the prestige of his name and talent to the concert. A local paper, speaking of this concert, says, among other flattering things—

"His spirited performances were the theme of general encomium and admiration. He was encored in both his solos, and repeated, in the second part, his new sketch—'An April Shower,' by particular desire."

The writer concludes with the following remarks:—

"This concert has thoroughly established Mr. Thomas's reputation in Leamington. Many of his patrons personally complimented him upon the success which had attended his first appearance here; and not a few expressed a hope that he would, in future, make an annual visit to a town where his own intrinsic merits could not fail to secure for him a leading place among the most popular of public favourites.

Want of space alone prevented the insertion of these extracts in the notice of Mr. Thomas's concert last week.

MR. AGUILAR'S SOIRÉES.

THE first of Mr. Aguilar's soirées of classical and modern pianoforte music, took place at his residence, on Saturday last. The programme was one of legitimate musical interest. Mr. Aguilar's solo performances consisted of Clementi's sonata in D, (No. 3, Op. 46), Beethoven's characteristic sonata, entitled "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour" (Op. 81), and a selection from Mendelssohn's Songs without Words (No. 3, Bk. 4; No. 1, Bk. 6; and No. 2, Bk. 5). In all of these he maintained his reputation as a thoughtful and intelligent interpreter of the highest order of pianoforte music, rendering every passage with a perfect appreciation of the composer's intention and execution at once chaste and correct. Mr. Aguilar also played, in conjunction with Herr Jansa and Signor Piatti, his own MS. trio, which was so much admired at his concert in the Hanover Square Rooms last May. This composition improves on a new hearing. It is at once highly effective and replete with musical interest. Its performance, by the three able artists, left nothing to be desired.

The vocal music consisted of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful songs "To Chloe in sickness," and "May Dew," charmingly given by Madame Ferrari; a pretty serenade, "The stars are brightly beaming," of Mr. Aguilar's composition, well sung by Signor Ferrari; and Donizetti's duetto, "Ah, le potessi piangere," by the lady and gentleman together. The concert, which commenced at half-past eight and ended at a quarter-past ten, afforded the utmost satisfaction to the audience. The rooms were very full. The next soirée is announced to take place on the 28th inst.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH ARTISTS.

NO. I.

SIMS REEVES.

(Concluded from our last.)

SIMS REEVES made his début at Drury Lane on Monday evening, December 6, 1847, in the part of Edgardo, in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. We say début, since his performances at the same theatre five years previously, in 1842, were comparatively little better than the attempts of a novice in secondary parts. Those who remembered the youthful and imperfect singer of the earlier period could hardly have done otherwise than prognosticate a failure; while those who knew nothing of Sims Reeves, and they were the greatest number, wondered in what unknown regions the new English tenor had been found.

Of the début of Sims Reeves at Drury Lane we shall take leave to quote at length from an article in the Musical World, of December 11th, 1847, which, as it conveyed our impressions at the time, will render our account more faithful than if it were drawn from memory, and preclude us from entering into any further details about his vocal and histrionic capabilities, which seven years' experience has only served to perfect.

"The new tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves, achieved, deservedly so, the most unequivocal success we have witnessed on the English stage for a quarter of a century. It may be in the recollection of our readers that, in our review of a concert in which Mr. Reeves sang last year, at Drury Lane, we spoke of him in the highest terms, and prognosticated for him a great career as a dramatic singer. We must own, however, that, on the stage, he has far surpassed our expectations. Mr. Reeves's voice is a pure high tenor of exquisite quality, the tones vibrating and equal throughout. The management of this fine voice displays a skill which shows that its possessor must have studied deeply and laboured hard in early youth. We have heard no voice, not Italian, so decidedly Italian as that of Mr. Reeves. It is Italian in character, Italian in timbre, and there is the Italian feeling in his style. He has evidently been taught in the best school, and with a good natural capacity he has done wonders in a few years. It is almost impossible to believe that within so short a space so great an improvement could have been accomplished, since we heard Mr. Reeves with no strong hopes of him in 1842. He is now a practised, we may say indeed a great singer: and it will be his own fault if he does not become one of the foremost artists of the modern stage. As an actor Mr. Reeves is also entitled to high praise. His deportment is natural and easy; his action manly and significant; and, without any tendency to exaggeration, he exhibits both force and passion. In his first scene on Monday night he was somewhat cold—perhaps from the anxiety inevitable to a first appearance; but in the second act he created a furore. His malediction was extremely fine, and the death scene was both sung and acted in the most artistic and effective manner. Mr. Reeves was called for after the first act, twice after the second, and again at the end, when the audience cheered him for several minutes. Mr. Sims Reeves's début was, to conclude, a signal triumph."

During the period of Jullien's management at Drury Lane, Sims Reeves's performances were confined to Lucia di Lammermoor and Balfe's Maid of Honour, both of which were frequently given. The season was a brief one, but the new tenor contrived to ingratiate himself into public favour. His great success procured him an engagement from Mr. Lumley. On Saturday, May the 20th, 1848, Sims Reeves appeared, for the first time, at Her Majesty's Theatre as Carlo in Linda di Chamouni (Madame Tadolini being the Linda) and at once established himself in the good graces of the habitués of that aristocratic theatre, as he had already done with those of Drury Lane.

It was to be regretted that an engagement which commenced so brilliantly, and which promised so well both for actor and manager, should have been brought to a sudden and unsatisfactory termination. Sims Reeves appeared but one night. The following letter, published in the principal journals of the day, will explain the cause of his withdrawal from Her Majesty's Theatre:

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—As the wording of Mr. Lumley's announcement is calculated to mislead the public as to the real cause of my non-appearance on that occasion, and the date affixed to his placard, viz., "Tuesday evening, five o'clock," is evidently intended to convey the impression that my decision was not made known to the management until within a few hours of the performance, I trust you will allow me to offer a few words in explanation. The facts are these:—In my engagement with Mr. Lumley, certain characters were expressly stipulated for by me, viz., Edgardo in Lucia (the nomination of which in the bond principally induced me to accept the offer), Percy in Anna Bolena, and Arturo in Puritani, the small part of Linda having been undertaken by me at the request of the manager, who seemed to think my performance of it would strengthen the cast. Those who considered the introduction of an English artiste to the patrons of Her Majesty's Italian Opera a dangerous experiment, and who witnessed my début on Saturday last, must be now convinced that no encouragement is wanting on the part of the public, whose kindness on the occasion I shall not cease to remember with gratitude. My début being considered successful, and the opera of Lucia having appeared in the play-bills of Her Majesty's Theatre, I naturally concluded that my next part would be Edgardo. But, alas! for the faith of managers and the inviolability of agreements, the startling intelligence soon reached me that Signor Gardoni was to perform my part in Lucia, no rehearsal of which was called until after my début. The intention of the manager was thus carefully kept from me until after my appearance in Linda, Mademoiselle Lind's name having been the only one mentioned in the announce bills of Lucia. As soon as I became acquainted with the facts, I immediately informed the manager, that, in consequence of the direct violation of our engagement, I could not consent to appear again unless my part was restored to me. As I did not wish to sacrifice my hard-earned reputation by tamely submitting to a proceeding calculated to lower me in the estimation of the public, my decision was transmitted in writing to M. de la Bellinaye (Mr. Lumley's acting-manager) yesterday (Monday) at half-past two o'clock, p.m. This can be proved by witnesses. The public will now be enabled to judge of the accuracy of the date of Mr. Lumley's placard, viz., Tuesday evening, five o'clock! It is most distressing to me that the public should have experienced any disappointment on my account, but I trust that I shall be held blameless when it is considered that, under these circumstances, Mr. Lumley had no right whatever to announce me for Tuesday evening. Trusting you will pardon me for intruding on your valuable space, I am, your obedient servant,

109, Great Russell Street, J. SIMS REEVES.
Tuesday, May 23, 1848.

In reply to this, the following explanation was transmitted to the papers by Mr. Balfe, director of Mr. Lumley's orchestra :—

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Having signed that gentleman's engagement, I am compelled to answer the statement made by Mr. Reeves.

The nature of Mr. Reeves' engagement was simply that he was engaged for five nights certain this season, one night at least in each week, with power of renewal at the option of the direction for an additional number of nights, on the same conditions, this year, and for twenty nights next season—nothing more was stipulated.

The part of Edgardo, which Mr. Reeves suddenly and imperatively demanded, had been in the hands of that great public favourite, Signor Gardoni, six weeks before Mr. Reeves was engaged. But so far from any wish existing to prevent Mr. Reeves having the fullest opportunities of success, some of the best parts in the répertoire, and those deemed most suited to his talents, had been destined for him.

When yesterday I made the last effort to persuade Mr. Reeves, to whom I sincerely wished success, not to act against his own interest, and against the advice of his real friends, I once more stated that these parts were reserved for his immediate performance; although the direction was only bound by his engagement to make him sing five nights, which did not imply his performing several parts, but quite the contrary.—I have the honour to remain, sir, your obedient servant, M. W. BALFE.

Her Majesty's Theatre, May 24, 1848.

Sims Reeves was not slow in rejoining. The following seems to have settled the controversy :—

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—Mr. Balfe's reply to my statement is singular, in having made its appearance before any statement of mine had been published. (See "Notice to Correspondents," in this day's Morning Post.) It will not easily be credited by the public, that I should consent to sing at Her Majesty's, or any other theatre, without the fullest assurance that the part of Edgardo—to a certain extent identified with any dramatic reputation I may possess, both at home and in Italy—should not be taken from me, and entrusted to one who, though he may be, no doubt, justly styled "that great public favourite," has never yet attempted the part, and is, perhaps, not altogether adapted to the performance of it. It is, however, for the public to decide, whether what decidedly assumes the aspect of a foreign cabal against an English artist shall, or shall not, be successful. I am unwilling to credit the general reports that jealousy, in a direction where it could least be expected, has, succeeded in effecting this most unlooked-for catastrophe. It would certainly appear hard that an artist should be driven from the public service, not because he has been unsuccessful, but because he has had the good fortune to please the public "too well." In conclusion, I have to reiterate my statements, that the clear understanding at the period of my engagement was, that I should perform the character of "Edgardo;" that I should never have sung at all under any other understanding, and that I can only attribute the management's apparent change of purpose to the public's great kindness on Saturday evening, and the small envies and jealousies these may have excited. With the renewed assurance of my deep regret that any step on my part should appear derogatory to the rights of the subscribers or the public,—

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

May 25. J. SIMS REEVES.

We think now, as we thought then, that Sims Reeves had cause to feel aggrieved, and that it would have been better for the theatre had he appeared in the part for which he had stipulated.

In the autumn of the same year Sims Reeves made a tour in the provinces, where he laid the foundation of his ex-metropolitan reputation. He was engaged as principal tenor at the Norwich Festival, in September, and obtained the unanimous praises of the critics for his singing in Handel's music. He was then engaged by the Directors of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and appeared frequently during the winter at Exeter Hall, where his performances materially added to his reputation.

On Saturday, May 22, 1849, Sims Reeves made his first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera, as Elvino in Sonnambula with brilliant success. The cast of the opera was admirable—Persiani being Amina, and Tamburini, Rodolpho. Shortly after, June the 2nd, to oblige the management and to add a special attraction to the event—the performance being by desire of Her Majesty—he consented to appear in the Huguenots, as the soldier who leads the "Rataplan" chorus. That such an act manifested the feeling of a true artist needs not be urged, and that Sims Reeves has always been impressed with a desire to gratify the public, even at a sacrifice to his own interests, may easily be gathered from this and other incidents of our memoir.

On Saturday, July 14, Sims Reeves performed Roderick Dhu, in Rossini's La Donna del Lago, a character eminently fitted to his large and energetic style of singing. His associates in the opera were, Mario as the king, Grisi as Elena, Angri as Malcolm Grœme, and Marini as Douglas.

At the close of the Royal Italian Opera, Sims Reeves again proceeded on a provincial tour, in the course of which he appeared in the operas of Ernani, Puritani, Lucia di Lammermoor, and La Sonnambula. Passing through Dublin, on his way to England from Cork, he went to the Theatre Royal, to witness the début of an Italian singer in the part of Edgardo in Lucia di Lammermoor. The failure of the débutant was signal; after the first scene he was obliged to quit the stage, and some gentlemen in the pit having recognised Sims Reeves in the boxes, with true Hibernian coolness called upon him to come forward and finish the opera. Unprecedented as was this request, it was nevertheless instantly taken up by the audience, who unanimously appealed to Sims Reeves for compliance. Who could resist a solicitation at once so genuine and complimentary? Sims Reeves, after some natural hesitation, bowed to the audience to signify his assent, and in less than twenty minutes made his appearance on the stage in the dress of Edgardo, and concluded the performance. The excitement of that night will not be forgotten by those who were present.

In October following, Sims Reeves was engaged at Covent Garden—now transformed into an English Opera under Mr. Bunn's management—as Elvino in the Sonnambula. He also appeared, during the same season, in Auber's opera of Haydée with remarkable success—Miss Lucombe (now Mrs. Sims Reeves) making her début on the operatic stage in the character of Haydée with equal credit. During the winter season he also frequently sang in the oratorios at Exeter Hall, at the London Wednesday Concerts (the great success of which was in a great degree owing to Sims Reeves), and in several provincial concerts of importance.

In 1850, Sims Reeves accepted another engagement from Mr. Lumley, and appeared on the 21st of March, at her Majesty's Theatre, as Ernani (in Verdi's opera of that name), a character which he seems to have made his own. Ernani was frequently played during the season. On the Tuesday after Easter, he played his famous part of Edgardo, in Lucia, Catherine Hayes being the heroine; and in the same year Elvino, in Sonnambula, to Madame Sontag's Amina.

Provincial tours, Exeter Hall, the Musical Festivals in the Provinces, and country concerts of all kinds, kept Sims Reeves fully occupied during the winter of 1850-1.

In 1851 he was engaged for the third time at Her Majesty's Theatre, where he appeared as Florestan, in Beethoven's Fidelio, on the 20th of May. Sophie Cruvelli (after an absence of three years) was Leonora; and the night was one of the most remarkable in the annals of the establishment. Sims Reeves's performance of Florestan, distinguished by the highest intelligence and the finest musical appreciation, was, perhaps, his greatest triumph on the Italian Stage. Fidelio was given repeatedly during the season, and always with increasing success.

Drury Lane was opened by Mr. Bunn after Christmas 1851, with a serio-comic opera company, and Sims Reeves played Fra Diavolo—for the first time in London—on Saturday, January 24th, and created an immense sensation. He had previously been recognised as a tragic actor, and it was now seen that he was equally a proficient in comedy. His Fra Diavolo was a picturesque and highly finished performance. Auber's opera was followed by Lucia di Lammermoor, and on Tuesday, March 10th, Balfe's last grand opera, The Sicilian Bride, was produced, Sims Reeves playing the principal character, one of the most trying and arduous he had ever undertaken.

In the winter of 1852-3, Sims Reeves did not appear on the operatic stage, but in the spring of 1853 he played at Drury Lane, and the Lyceum, on several special occasions, in Fra Diavolo, The Waterman, The Beggars' Opera, Lucia, &c.,—and became more popular than ever with the public.

His engagement at Drury Lane concluded, Sims Reeves made a tour of the provinces, which was almost unprecedentedly successful. He returned to London laden with bank-notes and crowned with laurels.

Having brought the subject of our memoir down to the present time, nothing remains to be said. All our readers know that Sims Reeves, some time ago, married Miss Lucombe, a most talented and accomplished lady, and one of our best native vocalists; but all our readers do not know that he is, at present, enjoying (with his cara sposa) his otium cum dignitate in Paris, where, for a month at least, he intends to remain.

Sims Reeves is now in the prime of life and the meridian of fame. He is respected, and admired, in public and in private. Nature has been bountiful to him, and Fortune has smiled upon his endeavours. What, then, is to prevent him from attaining all that a man and an artist can desire?

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(Jan. 15).—At the Académie Impériale de Musique, the début of Sophie Cruvelli in the Huguenots has been postponed till to-morrow (Monday, 16th), in consequence of a slight indisposition. Fanny Cerito, in the ballet of Orfa, is as great a favourite as ever with the Parisian public. For the moment the star of Mdlle. Priora is eclipsed.—At the Opera Comique, the long-expected opera of Meyerbeer, L'Etoile du Nord, has been further postponed, owing to the illness of Mdlle. Lefèbvre.—At the Théâtre Italien, the revival of the Barber of Seville has recalled the palmy days of Italian Opera. The cast presents an ensemble of unusual strength. Alboni sings to perfection in Rosina, and the costume suits her figure to admiration. We must especially compliment her on her coiffure, which is an innovation on that which she has hitherto always adopted. Mario is the beau ideal of the Count Almaviva; and Tamburini (Figaro) seems to have recovered all his vigour and youth. Rossi is excellent in Bartolo. The only weak point is the Basilio of Ferrara, whose voice is not suited to the music. The Barbiere has become a decided attraction. Yesterday, the Italiana in Algeri was performed, with Alboni, Gardoni, and Rossi.—At the Théâtre Lyrique, Mdlle. Duez has returned and made her rentrée in the Barbier de Seville, in which she produced a great effect.—Georges Hainl, the well-known chef-d'orchestre from Lyons, has arrived in Paris for a few days.—Mme Dufiôt-Maillard, the dramatic singer, has quitted the stage, in order to devote herself entirely to tuition.—Seligmann, the violoncellist, has gone to Amsterdam, to fulfil an engagement with the Philharmonic Society. He returns to Paris in the beginning of next month.—M. Alexandre Dumas has written the libretto of a comic opera, in one act, to be produced at the Theatre of the Porte Saint-Martin; M. de Groote, who has written a great deal for that theatre, has composed the music. The musical season is likely to be rich in harpists: among them is Mr. John Thomas, from the Royal Academy of Music, and Her Majesty's Theatre, in London. He has been in St. Petersburgh, Vienna, Berlin, Leipzic, Dresden, and Hanover.—Grard, the ancient barytone of the Opéra Comique, who lost his voice some time since, has become insane. The cause is said to be poverty. Coudero, the well-known tenor, has set a subscription on foot, to which all his associates of the Opéra Comique have contributed.

The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire commenced their season on Sunday, the 8th instant. The concert began with the overture to Don Juan, followed by the introduction to that master-piece, including the trio and duet, sung by Mdlle. Rey and M. M. Chapuis, Bonnehé, Battaille, and Noir. A fantasie concertante, for two flutes, composed by M. Léon Magnier, came next. It was played by M. M. Dorus and Brunot, and was very successful. This was followed by Spontini's Religious March from the opera of Olympia, which, in its turn, gave way to Beethoven's Pastoral Spmphony. The concert was brought to a close by the finale of the second part of Haydn's Creation, the vocal solos by Mdlle. Rey and M. M. Chapuis and Battaille.

Jan. 19.—Sophie Cruvelli made her first appearance at the Grand Opéra on Monday, the 16th instant, and achieved an immense success. She made her second appearance on the following Wednesday. The house was crammed to suffocation on both occasions, and the tickets were sold at fabulous prices.

HAVRE.—Mme. Cabel is singing here with great success, in the Fille du Régiment, and the Barbier de Seville.

BOULOGNE-SUR-MER.—On Sunday last, the day of the Epiphany, a mass by Lesueur was performed in the church of Saint-Nicholas, by a hundred singers, under the direction of M. Jules Vervoitte, Chapel Master of the parish. A great number of persons from Abbeville attended the performance of this composition of their townsman.

NANTES.—Madlle. Louise Guénée, the pianiste, has given a concert here. She lately gave one, towards the funds for building the Church of Saint-Nicholas, which produced a considerable sum.

ROUEN.—Poultier, the tenor, whose Georges in La Dame Blanche has procured him the utmost applause, will devote himself henceforth to the répertoire of the Opéra Comique.

VIENNA.—During the year 1853 the new management at the Court Theatre has produced twenty-nine operas and ten ballets. Meyerbeer's Prophète was played thirteen times; Les Huguenots, nine times; Robert le Diable, eight times; Beethoven's Fidelio, eight times; and Rossini's Guillaume Tell, eight times. The first concert of sacred music took place on the 8th of January, at 12 o'clock, in the hall of the Musical Union (Musikverein). The performance began with the Trauer-Cantata, by Sebastian Bach. This was followed by the "Ave Verum" of Mozart, and the concert concluded with Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony."

HANOVER.—Marschner's opera of Austin has been brought out with great pains and tolerable success.

LISBON.—At the Don Carlos Theatre, the Italian company has already produced the following operas:—I Masnadieri, Luisa Miller, Ernani, La Sonnambula, and Maria d'Ingleterra (Pacini). Don Pasquale, Rigoletto, Il Trovatore (Verdi), and the Huguenots, are in preparation. Mesdames Castellan and Fortuni, and Messrs. Miraglia and Bartolini are the principal artists.

WILHELMINA CLAUSS.

[For the following information about the proceedings of Mdlle. Clauss, on her way to St. Petersburgh, we are indebted to La Revue et Gazette Musicale.]

Cologne, 13th January.—Mdlle. Clauss, who has been expected with impatience, has at length given us an opportunity of applauding her great talent. The charming pianiste played on January 10th at one of the Society's Concerts. She performed Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor; one of Chopin's Nocturnes; an impromptu by Ferdinand Hiller, and a piece by Thalberg. The audience insisting on another morceau, Mdlle. Clauss played Chopin's impromptu in A flat (Op. 29), and retired amidst the most flattering applause. Mdlle. Clauss is to appear on the 12th at Düsseldorf; the 13th at Elberfeld; the 15th or 16th at Bonn, and the 20th, again at Cologne. From Cologne, Mdlle. Clauss goes to Hanover, where she is engaged at the Court, and from Hanover she will proceed to Berlin.

SOPHIE CRUVELLI.

(From a Correspondent.)

Paris, January 18, 1854.

I send you a few lines about the début of Sophie Cruvelli, at the Grand Opera, which took place on Monday evening, the 16th inst. I may at once say that a more triumphant success has never been witnessed on the boards of that theatre, on which so many renowned artists have appeared. "At last Cruvelli has found her place!"—was the unanimous exclamation at the end of the opera.

The house was crammed to the ceiling. I have rarely witnessed a scene of such excitement. The audience were literally palpitating with expectation in the interval which preceded the rise of the curtain. So great had been the curiosity to be present on the occasion, that, a fortnight in advance, orchestra stalls were sold as high as 200 francs, and the best places in the boxes were scarcely to be had at any price. On the evening of the performance the mere privilege of entrée, without fixed places, was selling at the doors of the theatre for twenty and twenty-five francs, and finding greedy purchasers. The foyer, and all the lobbies, were crowded with persons unable to get seats. You are aware that there is no "standing room," as at our London theatres, in the Grand Opera here.

The Emperor and Empress arrived some time before the hour of commencement. The number of notabilities among the audience was so great that I shall not think of naming them. Among others, however, I must mention the celebrated Meyerbeer, whose interest in the success of Sophie Cruvelli must have been urged by two influences—the first, a real desire for the young singer's welfare; the next, the renewed impetus given to the attraction of his Huguenots—which, I am told, among all his operas, is his chief favorite. There was Auber, too—looking young and vigorous enough to compose another Muette de Portici, and vivacious enough for another score of Black Dominoes. Benedict, just arrived from Munich, where he had assisted at his own success, was now anxious to witness that of his interesting friend and compatriot; but, as he came too late to get a place at any price, he was gallant enough to risk his neck in the heated and thronged parterre. Vivier, of course was there—for what évènement can be regarded as complete without the presence of the humoristico-spirituesque horn-player—a self-constituted, but not the less a satisfactory arbiter elegantiarum? To conclude, Alboni, "the inimitable," the intellectual Pauline Viardot-Garcia, Mario, Tamburini, and a host of artistic celebrities, with Jules Janin, Hector Berlioz, Théophile Gautier, Fiorentino, and all the authorities of the Parisian press, were observed in the crowd; and, in short, it was scarcely possible to direct an opera-glass to any part of the house without bringing the face and figure of some notable person into view.

I have no time to enter into details of the performance; but I may sum up by assuring you that, by unanimous verdict, it was agreed that such a Valentine had never been seen or heard before. Had Mario been the Raoul I think the public would have gone mad. The reception given to Cruvelli on her entrance was deafening; but this was pale when compared with what followed. The first scene established her success. Her costume was in exquisite taste, and I never saw her look more fascinating and beautiful. The voice—and what a voice is Sophie's!—vibrated through the house in such a manner as to give almost a fresh musical sensation. The duet with Marcel in the scene of the Pré aux Clercs produced a furore. The applause and cheering of the organised claque—the crying nuisance of the French theatres—was utterly drowned by the thunders of approval that came direct from the audience. The claque had lost its voice, and its office was a derision. Where truth speaks out, the cry of the mere hireling is suffocated. After the great scene—the duet between Valentine and Raoul, which follows the Benediction of the Poignards (the dramatic triumph of Meyerbeer)—the enthusiasm that ensued surpasses my powers to describe. Imagine it yourself. I was present the first night of Jenny Lind at Her Majesty's Theatre, in London. Well, then, the excitement at the Grand Opera, on Monday, was still greater than that which was raised by the sweet notes of the "Swedish Nightingale." Sophie vanquished Jenny on her own ground. And this, too, in a theatre where applause is generally left to the claque, and the real public seldom interferes, seldom gives any demonstration of sympathy or content—unless it be when the "lions," in the orchestra stalls, begin to roar in behalf of one of their terpsichorean darlings. At the end the stage was literally covered with flowers.

You must take the will for the deed. I am no professed critic; but, aware of the interest you have ever manifested in the career of Sophie Cruvelli, I was sure you would be glad to have some news of her début at the Grand Opera, before one of the most formidable tribunals in the world. For myself, I own candidly, I have never been so moved, so delighted, at a theatrical representation; and to me the Valentine of Sophie Cruvelli appeared an equally grand display of genius and accomplishment. She looked like an angel, sang to perfection, and acted like Rachel.

If you have no better and more detailed history of this event—which, in spite of the Turkish question, Omar Pasha, the Sultan, the Czar, and the fleets, has excited all Paris both by anticipation and retrospection—I hope you will accept mine as a true reflection of what was the public opinion, while laying no claim to be considered a critique.

I must inform you that the Emperor frequently applauded; and that the handsome and intelligent Empress, who shone like a star in the Imperial box, was evidently enchanted with the performance of Sophie Cruvelli. To the conquest of the German and Italian operatic stages she has now added that of the French. Excuse me—but I am proud of my fair young countrywoman.

To-night the second début comes off, and it is quite as difficult to get places as it was on Monday. The prices paid for stalls have been incredible.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

(From the original of Alexander Oulibicheff.)*

CHAPTER III.

Among the numerous letters of recommendation that our travellers brought with them to Paris, there was one to Herr Grimm, the secretary of the Duke of Orleans. Who is not acquainted with the intimate friend of Rousseau, the author of the literary bulletins for several German princes, the dauntless combatant of the Coin de la Reine (Queen's Corner), and the witty author of the Petit Prophète de Böhmesbrod? A lover of music like Grimm could not do otherwise than display the most polite and obliging readiness towards fellow-countrymen who were recommended to him. The following letter to a German prince was written by him about the Salzburg family, of whom he had constituted himself the guide and protector in Paris:—

"Eighth wonders of the world are too rare for a person not to take a pleasure in gossiping about them when he is lucky enough to see anything of the kind. A Salzburg capellmeister of the name of Mozart has just arrived here with two most lovely children. His daughter, who is eleven years old, plays the piano in a brilliant manner; she executes the grandest and most difficult pieces with wonderful precision. Her brother, who will not be seven before next February, is so extraordinary a phenomenon that a person can scarcely believe what he sees with his own eyes and hears with his own ears. Not only is it an easy task for the boy to execute with the greatest exactness the most difficult pieces, and that, too, with tiny hands that can scarcely grasp a sixth, but what is incredible, he improvises for hours together, giving himself up to the inspiration of his genius, and a flow of enchanting ideas, which follow one another in the best taste and without confusion. The most practised capellmeister cannot possibly possess so profound a knowledge of harmony and modulations as this child, who always carries it out according to the least known but invariably correct method. He possesses so perfect a knowledge of the keyboard, that if it is hidden from him by a cloth laid over it, he continues playing with the same quickness and precision as before. To decipher all that is laid before him is for him an easy task; he writes and composes with wonderful facility, without going near the piano or seeking for his chords on it. I noted down a minuet, and requested him to write the bass beneath; he snatched up his pen, and, without approaching the piano, wrote the bass under the minuet. After this, you can easily believe that it does not cost him the slightest trouble to transpose and play any air that is placed before him in whatever key may be required. But the following fact, which I myself witnessed, is no less incomprehensible. A lady asked him a short time since, whether he could, from ear alone, and without looking at her, accompany an Italian cavatina that she knew by heart? She then began singing. The boy tried a bass, which was not strictly correct, because it is impossible for a person to hit exactly beforehand upon the accompaniment of a song which he does not know. As soon as the song was finished, however, the child requested the lady to begin again, and, on her doing so, he not only played the whole of the song with his right hand, but, at the same time, and without the slightest hesitation, added the bass with his left. After this, he asked the lady ten successive times to recommence, and every time he altered the character of his accompaniment. He would have allowed her to recommence twenty times, had he not been entreated to discontinue. I see very well how it will be; this boy will turn my head if I hear him only once more; and I can now comprehend how difficult it must be for a man to restrain himself from going mad if he beholds miracles."

Under the guidance of so zealous and influential a friend, the sojourn of our travellers in Paris could not fail of being crowned with success. They gave concerts, received invitations from the best society, and were presented to the King and all the Royal family, as well as to Madame de Pompadour. All three found their account in this. Leopold Mozart appeared contented with the louis d'or which he took; Nannerl received elegant presents; while Wolfgang was allowed to eat tit-bits from off the Queen's plate, and say to her Majesty, in German, whatever happened to enter his head. His prattle, which the Queen translated to Louis XV., entertained even that worn-out monarch. Will the reader believe that our hero had the boldness to give his opinion of Madame de Pompadour, because she had refused to kiss him?

"Who is she, I should like to know," he enquired, "who will not kiss me? Why, the Empress kissed me!"*

On all sides, poems were showered upon "these mortals beloved by heaven and the Queen," and an excellent engraver executed a plate representing the whole family in a group, the father playing the violin, the son at the piano, and the daughter with her mouth opened as if to sing. Encouraged by such various marks of homage, Leopold Mozart now resolved to publish the attempts of the young composer. Our hero's first works appeared in Paris. They consist of four sonatas for the pianoforte, with violin accompaniment ad libitum; two of them were dedicated to Victoire of France, the King's youngest daughter, and the two others to the Countess of Tessé.

After a stay of five months in France, our travellers directed their steps towards the land of guineas and old music. They had hardly arrived in London ere they obtained an admittance at Court, that is to say, to the place in which they had now become accustomed to obtain a firm footing in every fresh country which they visited. The manner in which they were received surpassed, according to Leopold Mozart's declaration, all the marks of favour bestowed upon them at other courts. George III. was a lover and connoisseur of music. His wife, Caroline of Mecklenburg, enjoyed the reputation of being an excellent virtuosa. Our hero could not have found in all the rest of Europe judges more distinguished or more competent to estimate his powers. I am of opinion, too, that local influences had a share in spurring on his zeal. He was in a place where still reigned supreme the remembrance of Handel, to whom the gratitude of Old England had raised a monument in Westminster Abbey, next to the monuments of kings, and between those of Newton and Shakspeare. Among the living, too, Mozart saw another celebrated fellow-countryman, the favourite composer of the English in those days—a son of Sebastian Bach.† Many of my readers may, perhaps, think it improbable that motives of this description could influence the mind of a child only eight years old; but I would beg them to bear in mind that this child was a man in all that concerned his art, and, moreover, such a man that very few even in those days could stand a comparison with him. "He already knows everything," his father writes, "that can be expected even in a professor of forty years' standing." The names of great musicians already made his bosom heave with a feeling of rivalry and enthusiasm. But, however this may be, the little enchanter was of opinion that he must excite the enthusiasm of his audience at St. James's by totally different means to those he had previously employed to gain the suffrages of the lovers of music in Vienna and Paris. He commenced playing at sight, and without mistakes, fugues by Bach and Handel! This most certainly surpassed all his former extraordinary feats. He afterwards selected, by chance, one of the numerous instrumental parts of an air of Handel which were lying scattered about on the piano. It was a bass part, to which, without altering a single note, he supplied a most beautiful melody. All those who turn pale at the very sight of a sheet of music-paper, are well aware that such a task is incomparably more difficult to execute than merely to write a bass under a melody. We can conceive the astonishment of the artists on seeing a problem solved by the inspiration of the moment, in so brilliant a manner, that the actual melody to the bass, which melody had been the work of deep consideration on the part of its composer, could hardly be said to bear away the palm when compared to the composition of the child. Bach could contain himself no longer, but rushed up and embraced Handel's little rival. He then took him on his lap, and commenced playing the first bars of a sonata which was lying on the music-stand. Mozart played the following bars, and the two succeeded one another in this fashion to the end of the sonata with such a mutual good understanding and precision, that the persons who were sitting in the more distant part of the room scarcely remarked what was really going forward. They thought that Bach alone had played. Some few days later, our virtuoso played on the king's organ, and judges in London, as well as Paris, all agreed in the conclusion that his mastery over the organ was even more wonderful than his mastery over the piano.

A very interesting notice of Mozart is to be found in vol. 60 of the Philosophical Transactions. It is written by Daines Barrington, member of the Royal Society, and is addressed by him to the secretary of the society. In this paper, the learned author treats of the prodigy which he has before his eyes, considered both musically and psychologically. After Barrington has discussed various points, which I here omit, in order to avoid repetition, he relates several facts of which he was an eye-witness. One day, he brought Mozart a duet composed by an Englishman, with accompaniment for two violins and a bass, to some words of Metastasio, and asked Mozart to play it. In order to give those of my readers who are not aware with what difficulties the reading of a score is beset, some slight idea of what the boy's feat really was, I will cite the comparison, as ingenious as it is correct, made by Mr. Barrington. He says the reader must imagine five lines placed one under the other, the first line containing a passage from Shakespeare, and the four lower ones commentaries on this passage, but all written in such a manner that the letters in each line are pronounced in a different manner; for instance, on one line B meaning a, on the second b, and on the third c. (By this Mr. Barrington would typify the different cleffs.) Let the reader now picture to himself, the author of the paper goes on to say, a child of eight years of age, who is capable of comprehending so intricate a combination at the first glance, delivering the text with the readiness of a Garrick, and simultaneously indicating the principal matters contained in the commentary on each line, or rather translating them out of their various characters, and some idea may be formed of the capabilities of him who is the subject of the present notice. The greatest masters would hardly be capable of singing and playing a duet as this child did, that is to say, performing a piece of music on the first trial from the score, in the time and style most suited to the composition, with correctness and precision. We learn from Mr. Barrington's paper that Mozart could sing, and that, too, in the most charming manner. His voice, it is true, was thin and infantine, but his method was excellent and classically pure. At that period there happened to be in London a celebrated singer of the name of Manzuoli, of whom our hero had a very high opinion. In order to complete his musical examination, Mr. Barrington gave Mozart to understand that he should be glad to hear a love song from him, such as his friend Manzuoli sang at the Italian Opera. The boy looked at him with much archness, and then immediately began a kind of jargon in the form of a recitative, to which he added a ritornello as a perfectly suitable accompaniment to the song. He then played a symphony which might correspond with an air composed on the single word Affetto (love). Upon this he was requested to give a song of rage, which he improvised as quickly as he had done the other, executing it in the same fashion, and with all the passion required by the word Perfido (unfaithful one). The feeling of dramatic enthusiasm worked his nerves up to such a pitch that he struck the notes like a person possessed, and bounded several times up from his chair. Although these improvised compositions were not masterpieces, Mr. Barrington goes on to say, still they rose far above mediocrity in this branch of the art, and gave proof of an extraordinary fertility of imagination. So wonderful a talent, that victoriously overcame all the tests which the learned Englishman applied, caused him to suspect in the individual he was studying the presence of a double phenomenon. He was of opinion that Mozart's stature, which might be called small even for a boy of eight years of age, was an exception to the general rule, quite as much as his genius was. It was possible that the father might have concealed the true age of his son, who in all probability was fifteen or sixteen, and thus have kept one half of the wonder secret, at the cost of the other. A fortuitous circumstance, however, completely overthrew all Mr. Barrington's learned hypothesis. One day, as he happened to be present, a cat came into the room, and Wolfgang, who was very fond of animals of this kind, ran after it without troubling himself any more either about his music or Mr. Barrington. On another occasion, he suddenly took it into his head to run about the room with his father's stick between his legs by way of a horse. This was certainly a strong refutation of the opinion which Mr. Barrington had adopted, for behaviour of this kind perfectly agreed with the boy's diminutive stature and infantine features. Almost all the musicians in London shared Mr. Barrington's doubts without, however, giving themselves so much trouble to clear them up as he did, for he did not relax in his endeavours until he had succeeded in obtaining through Count Haslang an extract from the parish register of the place where Mozart was born. After this point had been decided, to the honour both of father and son, Barrington wrote the paper cited above, from which I have taken the most important facts, and which closes with a comparison between Handel and Mozart. The former played the piano when he was seven years old, and commenced composing when he was nine, from which facts the author of the paper comes to the conclusion that the latter, whose talents developed themselves at a still earlier age, might perhaps one day equal his great model, if he lived as long as Handel, who died at the the age of sixty-eight. This prophecy must have appeared in England a very bold one, and yet how far was it behind the truth!

Among the works which Wolfgang composed in England, there is a Sonata for four hands, and Leopold Mozart affirms in his letters that it is the first thing of the kind which his son ever composed; but this is an assertion that I shall leave unexamined.

From London the family proceeded to the Hague, where Wolfgang and his sister fell seriously ill, and did not recover until after a lapse of four weeks. The Princess of Nassau-Weilburg, at whose invitation Leopold Mozart had come to the determination of taking Holland in his way, gave the children the most touching proofs of attention and kindness during their illness. Wolfgang showed his gratitude by the dedication of six sonatas to her. Besides this, he composed some arias, and, on the occasion of the festival of the Prince of Orange, the brother of his patroness, a pot pourri, in which all the instruments of the orchestra were used concertante, and had to play variations one after the other. From the Hague our travellers made an excursion to Amsterdam, they were allowed to give two concerts, although it was Lent, when all public amusements were forbidden by law. This exception in their favour was made because, as the decree of the authorities said, "the making public the wonderful gifts of the children was conducive to the glory of God."

In the spring of the year 1766, our artists returned to Paris. Let us once more listen to their friend Grimm, in order to be enabled to form a true idea of their progress.*

"We have just seen the two amiable children of Herr Mozart, capellmeister to the Prince Archbishop of Salzburg, who met with such success during their sojourn in Paris in 1764. The father remained eighteen months in England and six in Holland, and brought them back here with the intention of returning hence to Salzburg. In every place where these children have remained any time, there has been but one opinion in their favour, and they have astonished all connoisseurs. Mademoiselle Mozart, who is at present thirteen, and who in other respects is greatly favoured by nature, has the most beautiful and brilliant execution on the piano, and her brother alone can rob her of the voice of applause. This wonderful boy is now nine years old; he has hardly grown at all, but he has made prodigious progress in music. Two years ago he already composed sonatas; since then he has had six sonatas engraved for the Queen of England. He has published six others in Holland for the Princess of Nassau-Weilburg, and has also composed symphonies for a grand orchestra, which have been produced and received with general applause. He has even written several Italian arias, and I do not despair of seeing, before he is twelve years old, an opera of his produced at some theatre in Italy. He has heard Manzuoli in London for a whole year, and turned this circumstance to such good account, that, although his voice is extraordinarily weak, he sings with as much good taste as feeling. But what is most incomprehensible, is the profound knowledge of harmony and its most delicate transitions which he possesses in the highest degree, and in allusion to which the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, the very best judge in such matters, as well as in many others, said, 'That many capellmeisters, who were most accomplished in their art, died without having been able to learn that which this boy knows at the age of nine.' We have seen him hold contests for an hour and-a-half together with musicians from whose foreheads the perspiration ran down in large drops, and who had all the trouble in the world to keep up with the boy, who came out of the struggle without fatigue. I have seen him conquer and silence, upon the organ, organists who imagined themselves to be extremely clever. In London, Bach used sometimes to place him between his knees, and in this manner they would play in turn on the same piano for two hours together, in the presence of the King and Queen. He has here gone through the same ordeal with Herr Raupach, a skilful musician, who has been a long time in St. Petersburg, and improvises with great readiness. I could talk for a long time of this interesting phenomenon. In other respects, he is the most amiable creature that you could meet with; all that he says and does is full of intelligence and feeling, joined with the grace and innocent behaviour of his age. His good spirits even prevent our fearing, which we otherwise should do, that fruit so precociously ripe might drop off the branch before the proper time. If these children live, they will not stop in Salzburg. In a short time, sovereigns will contend for the possession of them. Their father is not only a skilful musician, but a man of good sense and intelligence, and never did I know any one in his station who, in addition to his talent, possessed so many other good qualities."

On their journey homewards through Switzerland, our family of artists became acquainted with Solomon Gessner, who presented them with a copy of his works, on the title page of which, in the dedication, he called Wolfgang Mozart, "The Honour of Germany, and the Wonder of the World."

At last, after an absence of three years, the Mozart family once more reached their home.

AN UNPUBLISHED OPERA OF BELLINI.

When Vincenzio Bellini was a young and promising student in the Conservatoire at Naples, he was entreated by his associates to compose an opera for them. Bellini acquiesced, and Adelson e Salvina, a comic opera, was the result of his first essay in this style of composition. It was performed by his fellow students with great success at one of their public representations at the Conservatoire, and received with enthusiasm.

Owing to some reasons of etiquette, however, the authorities of the Conservatoire would not permit the publication of the work, but shortly afterwards, when the composer quitted the Conservatoire, he was allowed to take away the score with him, for the purpose of making some alterations. Bellini always retained a strong affection for the first offspring of his genius, and it was his intention to revise the instrumention, and produce the opera with the auxiliaries of a large orchestra and first-rate singers in Paris. But he did not live to complete his wishes, and at his death, in 1835, Adelson e Salvina was found among his papers. It was then reconsigned to the Conservatoire, where it has remained ever since, a valued relic with all those who knew and loved Bellini, and an agreeable and useful work for the student to consult.

At the earnest request of many friends of the composer, the Conservatoire has agreed to sanction the publication of Adelson e Salvina, and arrangements have been made to assign the copyright of the opera to publishers in Naples, France, and England. In all these countries it will shortly be brought out, in a complete form. We anticipate its publication with great interest, as the first work of a man of genius, and one of which report speaks highly.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA.

THE first concert of this new Association was given on Thursday evening, and, if we may draw conclusions from an opening night, promises to take its stand among the established societies of London. The Orchestral Union evidently suggested the new association, which is constructed on exactly the same principles. The London Orchestra and the Orchestral Union have both different aims from other societies. They constitute in themselves bodies corporate, which not only purport to give concerts on their own account, but are open to engagements for any concert in the metropolis or in the provinces. No doubt this offers an advantage to the givers of concerts on a large scale, and will save them time and expense. A concert-giver, instead of employing intermediately an agent to engage a band for him, thereby incurring additional expense without the certainty of obtaining what he required, has only to apply to Mr. Alfred Mellon, or Mr. Frank Mori, and he has an orchestra ready formed to his hand. Such institutions were evidently wanted in London, and will tend materially, by the facility afforded of engaging a body of instrumentalists, to elevate the generality of entertainments.

The London Orchestra numbers in its ranks some of our most eminent performers, and we have only to mention the names of Lazarus, Barret, Baumann, Lovell Phillips, Prospère, Rowland, Chipp, Thirlwall, and Payton, to shew of what materials it is composed.

The concert of Thursday night was a good beginning. It commenced with Mendelssohn's A minor Symphony, which, on the whole, was admirably played. The London Orchestra would certainly be improved by the addition of a few stringed instruments, the only department in which it exhibits weakness. The wind instruments for the most part are beyond reproach. Mr. Frank Mori took the real times of every movement, and conducted the symphony with the readiness and precision of a practised hand. Mendelssohn's glorious inspiration was heard with unalloyed delight from beginning to end.

The second great piece of the concert was Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto, in D minor—another splendid composition—with Miss Arabella Goddard at the piano.

Miss Arabella Goddard has lately been in no small degree instrumental in rendering the pianoforte compositions of Mendelssohn constantly familiar to the public. Her present choice was a good one. Perhaps in the whole repertory of the piano there is nothing more transcendent and more beautiful than the D minor concerto of the great master; nor one in which an artist of the highest powers can display them to greater advantage. The youthful pianist on the present occasion in no way diminished her reputation in the trial. Her performance was masterly and finished, and the expression of each movement was reflected with congenial feeling. The first movement was complimented with loud and unanimous applause, while the andante, given with a peculiar charm, from the exquisite music and playing combined, appealed irresistibly to every heart. The finale was worked up with surprising fire and impetuosity, and the pace at which it was taken was rigidly Mendelssohnian.

Another instrumental feature was the new trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, of which we have spoken so favourably in a late notice. The executants on Thursday night were Messrs. Ferdinand Praeger, Sainton, and Lovell Phillips.

Madlle. Cesarini, a débutante at the Hanover Square Rooms, sang the difficult aria d'intrata from Lucia di Lammermoor. This young lady promises to become a great acquisition to the concert room. She has a pure soprano voice, of a fine metallic quality, and has acquired the true Italian method of singing. She produced a decided effect, and accomplished one of the most trying airs for the soprano voice more like a practised mistress of her art than a débutante. We shall have to say more anon of Madlle. Cesarini.

The other vocalists were Mdme. Amadei, Signor and Madame F. Lablache, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, and Mr. Land.

Mr. Frank Mori obtained a most flattering reception on his entrance, and—at the conclusion—well deserved it.

ROSINA STOLTZ.

THIS celebrated lady appeared, on the 5th inst., at the Theatre Royal, Turin, as Arsace in Semiramide. Her reception by the public was most brilliant. She was repeatedly applauded throughout the opera, especially in the andante, "Un si barbara sciagura" where the bravos actually interrupted, for a moment, the performance. At the fall of the curtain, she was recalled several times, and overwhelmed by a shower of bouquets.

THE REV. DR. EVANS.

WE learn, with the deepest regret, of the unexpected death of this highly respected gentleman, at the age of 52. The Rev. Thos. Evans was Master of the Grammar School connected with the Cathedral at Gloucester. He was an admirable amateur musician, and for many years one of the most strenuous and untiring promoters of the Gloucester Musical Festival. A more amiable and enlightened man, a better master, or a more learned and conscientious churchman than the Rev. Dr. Thos. Evans never existed. His loss will be bitterly felt by all who had the honour to know him. His memory will be as sacredly and firmly cherished.

DEATH OF MR. PHILIP KLITZ.

(From the "Hampshire Advertiser.")

IT is with a very deep feeling of sorrow and regret (in which a large proportion of the public of Southampton, together with the principal towns of the Southern Counties, will participate), we record the decease of Mr. Philip Klitz, professor of music, who died after a short illness, of bronchitis, yesterday morning, January 13, at the age of 49. He was born at Lymington, where his father established his reputation as a musician, and brought up six sons to his profession. Philip, the eldest, early became a popular composer of ball room music. He came to reside in Southampton about twenty-five years ago, and showed the versatility of his talent by composing a variety of ballads, of which the words were frequently his own. A series of naval songs, called "The Songs of the Mid-Watch," the Admiralty did him the honour of ordering to be added to Dibdin's, in a special edition published for the navy. Besides his musical works, he was the author of "Tales of the New Forest," which he was well qualified to write, from his intimate acquaintance with the scenery of the forest and the manners of its people. He was a great advocate for the Hullah System, and introduced it in Southampton and other places, and indeed sought to cultivate a musical taste among the young generally. His lectures on music were exceedingly attractive at all the Literary Institutions of these counties. He was a performer on the pianoforte and violin, and conducted Paganini's Concerts when very young. He has, for many years, held the office of organist at All Saints Church, and there, as well as previously at other churches, raised and taught a choir, and perfected the vocal service. His wife and an only son have to mourn the loss of an affectionate husband and father—the profession of one of its most meritorious members—and the Masonic brethren a brother whom they esteemed. He always gave a willing assistance to the craft, and distinguished himself amongst them, and was P. P. G. O. of Hampshire. One of his Masonic compositions, "Faith, Hope, and Charity," is possessed by every lodge in the province, and is introduced at most of their festive entertainments.

MONS. ARMAND BERTIN.

(From La France Musicale.)

DEATH has just struck down one of the most honourable and most honoured members of the press. Mons. Armand Bertin has been suddenly snatched away from his friends. We feel it our duty to render one last mark of respect to this eminent writer. Mons. Armand Bertin, chief editor of the Journal des Débats, lived during the most turbulent periods of political feelings; but, by his conciliating disposition, the elevation of his ideas and the generosity of his heart, he was always able to maintain a position of unassailable independence; and even those persons who were opposed to him politically, at epochs fraught with the greatest peril, never ceased to entertain for him, personally, sentiments of the most profound sympathy.

Mons. Armand Bertin was, so to say, the father of his co-editors. Whenever a writer of talent entered the family of the Journal des Débats, he met with sincere goodwill and friendship, and if he severed the bonds of relationship it was from his own free choice. Mons. Armand Bertin's death is a great loss for the daily press. For a long succession of years he was always on the breach, and succeeded in preserving for the Journal des Débats its powerful influence. Who will now continue his work? This is a question which we cannot answer. There is, however, one assertion that we can safely advance, which is, that he has rendered the task one of great difficulty for his successors. His name will always be remembered in conjunction with that of the paper of which he was the soul, and he will always be cited as a model for all who purpose entering the difficult career of newspaper polemics.

BERLIN.—The following is a list of the musical works produced at the Royal Opera House from the 26th of December to January 8th:—Masaniello (principal character by Theodore Formes, brother of the bass); Taglioni's ballet Satanella, music by Auber, Hertel, and Pugin (Marie Taglioni as Satanella) three times; Lucrezia Borgia (Johanna Wagner as Lucrezia Borgia, and Theodore Formes as Gennaro); The Marriage of Figaro; Gluck's Armida; and Bellini's Capuletti e Montecchi (Johanna Wagner as Romeo).—Mendelssohn's brother-in-law, Professor W. Henzel, to whom we owe a large number of excellent portraits of various artists—among others, of Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Liszt, etc.—has been suffering from liver complaint, but is at present recovering.—Jenny Lind is to sing at the third concert for the benefit of the Gustavus Adolphus Society.—Wilhelmina Clauss intends giving a concert here on her way to St. Petersburg.—Count Thomas Tyszkiewiez, the chivalrous defender of Carl Maria von Weber's Der Freischütz, has arrived here from Paris.—His Majesty the King has conferred the title of Royal Chamber Singer on Madlle. Johanna Wagner.—Vieuxtemps will be here about the end of this month.—Flotow's opera of Rübezahl was to be brought out at the Royal Opera some day during the week just passed. The Niebelungen, by Capellmeister Dorn, will shortly be produced at Weimar. Carl Formes will play for a certain number of nights at the Opera House in April next.

STUTTGART.—The Opera here has brought out the Prophète, the Huguenots, Fidelio, Norma, Fille du Régiment, Sonnambula, Don Juan, and Giulia, oder die Corsaren, by Lindpaintner. The last opera, the most recent work of the composer, has had success.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—Theresa Milanollo gave three concerts here during the Christmas week.

LEIPSIC.—At the second Gewandhaus Concert, two fine specimens of chamber music—namely, Mendelssohn's quartett in D major and Mozart's quintett in G minor, for stringed instruments—were played, the former by Messrs. Dreyschock, Routgen, Herrmann, and Wittmann, and the latter by Messrs. David, Routgen, Herrman, Hunger, and Rietz, and rapturously received by the audience.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

REVIEWS OF NEW MUSIC.—We have made arrangements to commence notices of New Publications next week. Every composition forwarded to the office of the MUSICAL WORLD, for review, will be attended to in the order of its arrival. All works of importance will be noticed, without delay, as matters of general interest; but short ballads, dance pieces, &c., having no such claim, must be advertised previously, if their authors are desirous of the publicity of our columns.

NORTHAMPTON.—Our correspondent from this town is respectfully informed that we cannot afford space for long provincial notices. Nor can we publish opinions, or criticisms, or, in short, anything further than news, from any but the accepted and responsible writers of the MUSICAL WORLD. For mere facts we are always obliged to our friends, in the provinces or elsewhere; but it would be unreasonable to expect us to endorse their individual private opinions. Were we to do so, there would scarcely be a column in the paper without some direct contradiction of doctrine. We are sorry that the article of our correspondent should have been so strangely modified, and will inquire into the matter. The late editors of the MUSICAL WORLD will doubtless be flattered by our correspondent's opinion of their editorship.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. BRINLEY RICHARDS has the honour to announce that he has returned to town for the season to resume his engagements.—6, Somerset-street, Portman-square.

EGYPTIAN HALL.—A GRAND MOVING DIORAMA of CONSTANTINOPLE, including the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus, up to the Black Sea, will open, in the New Turkish Room, on Monday evening next, the 23rd inst., at 8 o'clock. The diorama was painted by Mr. ALLOM, from sketches made on the spot, assisted by Mr. Desvignes and Mr. Gordon. The explanatory lecture has been written by Mr. ALBERT SMITH and Mr. SHIRLEY BROOKS, who are personally acquainted with Constantinople, and will be delivered by Mr. CHARLES KENNEY. The concluding tableau, representing a fire at Constantinople, as seen from the Golden Horn, has been painted by Mr. WILLIAM BEVERLEY. Full programmes and particulars may now be had at the Hall, and reserved seats taken. It is respectfully intimated that no charge is made for taking places, nor for programmes, nor are the attendants permitted to receive any gratuity.—Admission, One Shilling; Reserved Seats, Two Shillings.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER IV.
1766-1768.

Every one in Salzburg was now anxious to see the Salzburgers, who had departed unknown and returned celebrated. Matters took the same course with them as they do with many others in a similar position: people crowded round them, and were more obliging and friendly than they ever had been, while, in their hearts, they were less favourably disposed to them than before. Among other visitors who now sought their acquaintance, was a notability of the town, a certain baron, who was puzzled how to address the artists. You† appeared to him, on account of the distance which then existed between the nobility and the middle classes in Germany, too much; still he did not think that, towards artists who had been allowed to penetrate into the familiar society of kings and princes, he ought to use the much-loved he, and, therefore, believed that he had discovered a fortunate medium when he couched his remarks in the following terms:—

"Well, we have made a long tour; we have gained a great deal of honour"—

Wolfgang, however, interrupted him with the words:

"Excuse me, sir, but I do not recollect ever having seen you anywhere but in Salzburg."

This anecdote, related by the sister of our hero, proves that the boy possessed not only genius but wit.

The year 1767 deserves to be inscribed in golden letters in the annals of music. Mozart spent it quietly at home, passing his time in the study of the compositions of Sebastian and Emmanuel Bach, Handel and Eberlin. I have read, somewhere or other, that the last-named composer, who was, at that period, a capellmeister in Salzburg, and, consequently, a colleague of Leopold Mozart, gave our hero lessons in counterpoint. He was, it is true, a celebrated contrapuntist and organist. But Wolfgang devoted his attention to the renowned Italian masters as well. We do not find their names mentioned anywhere, but, if a careful comparison of Mozart's style, with the various epochs of the Italian school, can enable us to repair this omission of all former biographers, I, for my part, am of opinion that the Italian masters to whom our hero was under the greatest obligation, were those who represent the transition period from the seventeeth to the eighteenth century, namely: Stradella, Carissimi, and, most especially, Alessandro Scarlatti, Leo, and Durante. But, however this may be, so much is certain, that this double and thorough course of study, which disregarded every thing like national prejudice, was of the highest importance. It affords us a key to all Mozart's works, and we shall afterwards treat of it at length in its proper place.

In the autumn of this year, our virtuosi resumed their wandering life. They went to Vienna, but the small pox, which was then committing great ravages, immediately drove them away. The children, however, did not escape the disease, it attacked them in Ollmütz and detained them there two months. When the danger was passed, they returned to the Austrian capital. They were received at the court of the Emperor, Joseph II, in the most flattering and distinguished manner. Personages of the highest influence, such as Count Kaunitz, the Duke of Guttemburg, Fräulein von Guttemburg, the favourite of the Empress Dowager, and, also, Metastasio, appeared to take a lively interest in them. How bright were their prospects!—and yet their sojourn in Vienna, this time, was one continued succession of annoyances, petty quarrels and deceptions. We will tell the reader why.

Wolfgang was now almost past the age of childhood, an age so well calculated to excite feelings of kindness, and which disarms even envy itself. However eminent the talent with which a child may be endowed, people are always inclined to consider him more in the light of a thing than a person. He is nothing more than a rare and wonderful object and in no wise a superior being of the same nature as themselves. Moreover, in the case of a child, the envious can always console themselves with the reflection: "As a general rule, these little prodigies either become very ordinary men or do not live." Matters, however, begin to assume a more serious aspect, when the prodigy, who has already attained the age of youth, progresses instead of retrograding, and thus annihi-

† For the benefit of our non-German readers, we may state that, until a comparatively recent period, people of rank in addressing their inferiors did so in the third person singular (er or sie), and not in the third person plural (Sie), which is the form of expression always used by the Germans of the present day, with a few exceptions which are rapidly giving way before the more enlightened views of the age. So common, however, was formerly the custom of using the third person singular towards inferiors, that even Frederick the Great, is well known, after a review, to have addressed one of his favourite generals, who had greatly pleased him by the manner in which he had commanded the day's proceedings, with the words: Er hat gut manœuvrirt, (He has manœuvred well, instead of You have manœuvred well). English Translator.

lates the secret hopes of his rivals, who only pardoned him on account of his being a child. Young Mozart now came as a musician of twelve years of age into a city filled to the very garrets with pianoforte players and composers. This youth, three feet six inches high, already took his position by the side of the first artists, and was the most accomplished extempore performer of his day. There was, too, the strongest evidence that, in time, he would become something more. This fact sufficiently explains the dismay in the camp of all the professional musicians, who laid aside their hatred of one another, and their secret and petty jealousies, in presence of the common enemy. They all united against a foe who threatened to rob them of their already scanty means of subsistence. As, however, these worthies could not deny facts, they came to an understanding among themselves to avoid, on all occasions, meeting the Mozarts; the result they desired followed as a matter of course. If any person asked one of them what he thought of the boy, he first regretted in an off-hand manner that he had not yet heard him, smiled significantly, ridiculed the fashionable world, and appeared to set out from the conviction that the latter was neither so ignorant nor so credulous as to believe all the idle stories which were related. The members of the upper classes, ashamed of their supposed mistake, felt themselves bound to assure the musicians that they themselves, so to say, had been the first to laugh at the whole matter, and requested a frank statement of the real merits of the case. They were then informed, under a promise of the most profound secresy, that the father was a very clever charlatan, and the son, a little creature who had been admirably tutored for the purpose of making money and throwing dust in people's eyes. In this manner, the conspirators would necessarily have gained their end, without exposing themselves to a charge of calumny; for, supposing things came to the worst, they could always assert that they had been informed so themselves, and that they had had no opportunity of convincing themselves of the contrary. Leopold Mozart, however, got scent of their tactics, and succeeded, by a masterstroke of policy, in overthrowing them. He obtained information that one of the most important conspirators intended playing, in a numerous assemblage of musical amateurs, a concerto of his own composition, which was as yet in manuscript, and had been pre-announced and trumpeted forth as the ne plus ultra of difficulty. What did our cunning Salzburger do? He went to the amateur, in whose house the composition was to be played, and offered his son's services for the evening in question, but with the especial proviso, that the gentleman was not to say a word of the matter to anyone. The latter, who saw in the proposal merely an additional source of pleasure for his guests, accepted it with delight. On the appointed evening, the intended hero of the party made his appearance with the pleasant consciousness of anticipated success. The manuscript was lying upon the desk; the amateurs had grouped themselves around the piano and were waiting in breathless expectation for the treat they were about to enjoy. The professor took his seat, cleared his throat and blew his nose. At this moment, the door opened—no doubt to let in some guest who was late. But what a surprise for every one! What a piece of wily cunning! It was the dreaded Salzburger himself—Banquo's ghost at Macbeth's feast! It was now totally impossible to escape him. The master of the house, who suspected nothing, expressed the pleasure he experienced in having an opportunity of making two such celebrated virtuosi acquainted with each other. As is invariably the case on such occasions, the two men complimented one another in the most flattering terms. But, while the Viennese professor and Leopold Mozart were exhausting themselves in compliments, Wolfgang, who, all his life, could never learn to play the courtier, proceeded at once to the principal object of the evening, seated himself at the piano, and played the concerto off, at sight, as if it had been a composition which he had diligently studied and learned by heart for the purpose of executing in public. We must, however, be just towards the composer of the concerto, and confess that his conscience, awakened by his astonishment, would not allow his feeling of enmity to keep the upper hand any longer. He could not refrain from openly declaring: "That, as an honourable man, he must admit that the boy was the greatest master then in existence—previously, he had not been able to believe it."

It was not, however, sufficient to have vanquished one opponent in so noble a manner; it was necessary to overcome the whole dreaded fraternity, and place the Viennese public in a position to decide between Mozart and his antagonists. An opportunity of doing this soon presented itself, and one of such a kind that nothing better could possibly have been desired. The Emperor Joseph gave the young maestro to understand that he should like to hear a comic opera of his composition. This wish was a command, which Wolfgang most joyfully obeyed. The opera entitled La Finta Simplice (the Simple Stratagem) was written in a few days, and received the approbation of Hasse and Metastasio. But the task of composing it was the least difficult part of the matter. Scarcely were the conspirators informed of the danger with which they were menaced, than they moved heaven and earth to prevent the work from being produced. They were successful. The Italian theatre was leased to a certain Affligio, under the condition that he should continue to pay all the singers who had formerly received their salaries from the Court, and allow all persons connected with the Court to retain their right of free admission. As the impresario, in consequence of this agreement, had alone to incur the whole risk of the enterprise, he reserved to himself, as was perfectly natural, the full power of selecting his répertoire; on him alone depended the accepting or declining new pieces, and, in this particular, the Court had not the right of dictating the course he was to pursue. The conspirators now applied to this poor man, who was already bowed down to the earth by the fear of soon being declared a bankrupt, and instilled into his mind the idea: that he would be inflicting his own death blow were he to bring out La Finta Simplice; that the public would feel greatly displeased at seeing a mere boy of twelve years old seated at a piano and conducting an opera, the very day after that on which Gluck had conducted; that his immediate ruin would be the inevitable consequence, and much more to the same effect. Affligio allowed himself to be so terrified, that all he now thought of was to get rid, in the best manner he could, of his obligations to our hero, to whom he had promised a hundred ducats for the piece. The principal point was this: to break with him without formally violating the agreement or incurring the displeasure of the Court, who had ordered the opera and wished to see it. It was necessary that the plans destined to annihilate Mozart's first dramatic attempt should be artistically arranged. First of all, the poet was never ready with the alterations deemed necessary in the libretto; then, the singers declared that they were not capable of singing the airs, which they had found quite suited to their vocal powers at the rehearsals held by the maestro. After the singers, came the orchestra.

How could veterans, who had grown grey in the service, place themselves under a beardless conductor? What an insult! While the impresario was thus conspiring against himself, the individuals, whose instrument and victim he was, were not idle out of the theatre. They exerted themselves to the utmost to bring the new opera into discredit, everywhere declaring that it was horrible, a fact of which they, as musicians, must, of course, be good judges. But this, according to the German expression, was a blow in the air. Mozart had already played his work on the piano in some of the first houses in Vienna, and all who had heard it were unanimous in its praise. The conspirators now changed their plan of attack, going about everywhere and spreading the report that the music was the work of the father, since the son did not understand a word of Italian, and was scarcely acquainted with the A B C of composition. Leopold Mozart, always prepared to fight them with their own weapons, forgave his opponents, from the bottom of his heart, for a lie which was destined to afford his son the opportunity of a new triumph. In the presence of numerous witnesses, he took a volume of Metastasio's works, opened it at hazard, and gave the poem, which he had thus accidentally turned up, to the young maestro. Wolfgang did not stop to reflect, even for a single moment, but wrote, as if from dictation, and in something less than an hour, both a melody and an accompaniment, fit for immediate performance. Wolfgang was subjected to a similar ordeal at the Count of Kaunitz's, the Duke of Braganza's, Hasse's, capellmeister Bono's, and also at Metastasio's, and on each occasion passed through it with the same result and the same rapidity. Unable to dispute such convincing proofs, the cabal was silent, but continued, notwithstanding, to prosecute its intrigues in secret. In this manner, months passed away; empty excuses were substituted for deceptive promises, without, however, any one thinking for a moment of bringing out the Finta Simplice upon the stage. At last, worried by these continual annoyances, and exhausted by the fruitless steps he had taken, Leopold Mozart lost all patience, for, instead of his bettering his circumstances, he saw his exchequer sinking lower every day. He went to the so-called Count Affligio, reminded him, in strong terms, of the contract he had entered into with his son, and threatened, in case the manager intended to disappoint him, that he would bring an action. The Italian, highly incensed at this specimen of German roughness, at first endeavoured to find excuses, but, when he saw that these would not suffice, and that he could not avoid giving a decisive answer, ended by saying:—

"Very well, then, if you are absolutely determined to see your son prostitute his talent, you may, but I will have his opera hissed off the stage."

Our hero's father knew only too well that Affligio was the man to keep his word—on this occasion, at least—and, therefore, did not choose to put him to the proof. La Finta Simplice was not produced.

I confess that when, reading through Leopold Mozart's letters, I came to these particulars, which I have considerably abridged, I could not avoid being of opinion that, after all, the wrong done by the manager Affligio was, perhaps, not so great, and that our hero's first dramatic attempt was too weak to be worthy of production on the stage. But my doubts were dispelled at a later period, when I had turned the circumstances of the case more carefully over in my mind. Arguing from all Mozart's previous efforts, by which, principally, we must form our conclusions, he rose far superior to the ordinary composers of his time; the dilettanti, too, who set the fashion in Vienna, and had heard the opera on the piano, agreed in saying that the merit of the music would ensure its success; in addition to this, there was the enthusiastic applause of the singers themselves, before they had been forbidden to be sincere, and lastly, above everything else, the impartial evidence of two great connoisseurs, to the effect that the production of La Finta Simplice would have raised the reputation of its composer to the stars (alle stelle). Hasse and Metastasio expressed their admiration of the work, and declared that they had seen thirty operas succeed in Italy, which, in no respect, could be compared to Mozart's. There is no doubt that, at the present day, La Finta Simplice would not please very much, or, rather, it would not please at all, but, precisely on this account, it would probably have been successful in the year 1768. Our hero's genius, at that period, and for a long time subsequently, was developed by his memory; the maestro of twelve years of age did not yet stand high enough to risk a non-success with the possibility of not being understood; his style was not yet Mozart's; he copied the faults of the favourite composers of his time, just as a youth of his age, at the present day, would begin by imitating Rossini or Beethoven, however great the originality he might manifest at a subsequent period. All who have seen the scores of Italian operas written before Idomeneo, are aware that, between the time previous to Mozart and the time after him, there is an abyss in which the former dramatico-lyrical taste of the public is for ever buried. The Italian operas of the eighteenth century, which have preserved their place in the memory and affections of musical connoisseurs, were all composed during the last years of Mozart's life, or after his death.*

But although the conspirators had closed the theatre against our hero, they only half attained their end, which was to render it impossible for him to enjoy a public triumph. Mozart had his revenge. A new church, belonging to the Orphan Asylum, was just completed at this period. The director commissioned Mozart to compose, for the consecration of the church, a solemn mass, an offertorium, and a trumpet concerto, which the young maestro was to direct in person. The whole Court was present at the performance; the concourse of spectators was immense, and the Emperor Joseph at last had the satisfaction, which he had promised himself, when he commanded the opera, of seeing the boy at the head of a grand orchestra. A handsome present from the Empress afforded the maestro a proof of the satisfaction of his distinguished auditors.

The celebrated Mesmer, who, at that period, resided in Vienna, was one of the most zealous friends of the Mozart family. A prodigy like that which he now beheld could not possibly do otherwise than awaken the sympathy of the father, or rather the renewer, of magnetism. Mesmer was fond of music; in the first place, on its own account, and next, perhaps, as a medical man, because he often found it to be a useful auxiliary in his magnetic cures. He was determined that, in spite of Affligio and the whole cabal, an opera by his young friend should be produced. To gratify Leopold Mozart's desire, an operetta, translated from the French, was selected, which Wolfgang set to music, and which was played in Mesmer's house. It experienced the success which is invariably met with in amateur theatricals. The title of it was Bastien et Bastienne. As far as I know, Herr von Nissen is the only person who mentions this trifle, which is not found in the general index of Mozart's works, and concerning which even his father's letters do not say a word. So conscientious a man as the Danish Biographer never would have invented the fact: that is beyond all doubt; but, in obedience to the maxim laid down for his own guidance—namely, to assert but little when others do not speak for him—Herr von Nissen disposes of the matter in two lines, without giving us the source whence he obtained his information; and, in obedience to another principle, quite as unchangeable as the first, leaves the reader to make his own reflections and commentaries. Gerber, in his new Lexikon der Tonkünstler, reckons the opera of Bastien et Bastienne among Leopold Mozart's works, and not among those of his son Wolfgang. Which of the two is right, Herr von Nissen or the Lexikon, I will not take upon me to decide.

In this manner, the family remained in Vienna fourteen months, a period which our hero's father must have considered doubly lost, because he had been obliged to break into his savings, while his son had lost the money expended on his score. (To be continued.)

ROBERT SCHUMAN'S MUSICAL LIFE MAXIMS.

(From the German.)

(The following maxims were designed to form an appendix to the first edition of the author's Jugendalbum (Album for Youth). Each maxim was to have been illustrated by an appropriate piece of music; but this part of the original plan was never carried out. The German publisher, however, proposes to insert them in the next edition of the Jugendalbum. Meanwhile they have appeared in the Leipsic Zeitschrift für Musik.)

I. The cultivation of the ear is the most important matter. Endeavour early to distinguish notes and keys. Ask yourself what tones the bell, the window pane, the cuckoo, respectively give out.

II. Sedulously practise scales and other finger exercises. Do not, however, imagine you have accomplished everything, when you have spent many years in mechanical exercises. It would be as if you had employed all your time in repeating the alphabet, with daily increasing rapidity. Use your time better.

III. "Dumb pianofortes," so called, or key-boards without sound, have been invented. Try them long enough to find that they are good for nothing. You cannot learn speech of the dumb.

IV. Play in time! The performance of many virtuosi is like a drunkard's gait. Make not such your models.

V. Learn betimes the fundamental laws of harmony.

VI. Be not frightened by the words theory, thorough-bass, counterpoint, etc.; they will meet you in a friendly manner, if you do the same with them.

VII. Never hesitate about a piece of music; attack it briskly; and play it to the end.

VIII. Dragging and hurrying the time are faults of equal gravity.

IX. When you play, never trouble yourself about who is listening.

X. Play as if you were conscious of the presence of a master.

XI. To play easy pieces well, is better than to play difficult pieces indifferently.

XII. Insist on having your instrument in tune.

XIII. Be able not only to play your pieces, but to hum them without a piano. Accustom your imagination to retain not only the melody but the harmony of a composition.

XIV. Use yourself to sing at sight, no matter what your voice may be, without the aid of an instrument. The sensitiveness of your ear will continually improve by that means. If you have a good voice, cultivate it without delay, and regard it as the fairest gift of heaven.

XV. Study till you can understand a piece of music on paper.

XVI. Read over new compositions before you try to play them.

XVII. When you are fatigued with practising, leave off. It is better to stop, than to continue without spirit and freshness.

XVIII. As you grow older, play nothing merely fashionable. Time is precious. A hundred lives would not suffice to make you acquainted with all that is good.

XIX. In every period there have been bad compositions, and fools to praise them.

XX. Mere finger passages grow commonplace, and require change. They should only be regarded as a means to an end: they are otherwise worthless.

XXI. Do not help to circulate bad music: nor listen to it, unless compelled by circumstances.

XXII. Do not labour to acquire facility in the so-called bravura.* Try to convey the impression of the composer; attempt no more than this, since more than this becomes caricature.

XXIII. Consider it monstrous to alter or omit anything, and to introduce modern ornaments in the music of good composers. There is no outrage to art so flagrant.

XXIV. In the selection of pieces for study, ask advice of older players, and you will save much time.

XXV. Gradually make yourself acquainted with the most important works of the great masters.

XXVI. Be not led astray by the dazzling popularity of the so-called virtuosi. Court the applause of artists, rather than that of the multitude.

XXVII. Every fashion grows unfashionable: if you persist in the old route, you incur the risk at last of being regarded as a coxcomb.

XXVIII. It is more injury than profit to you to play much before company. Pay deference to the taste of others; but never play anything of which, in your inmost heart, you are ashamed.

XXIX. Lose no opportunity, however, of playing with others, in duets, trios, etc. This gives fluency, spirit, and facility. Accompany singers when you can.

XXX. If all were to insist upon playing first fiddle, there would be no orchestra. Respect, therefore, every musician in his place.

XXXI. Love your instrument; but be not vain enough to think it the only one. Remember that there are others quite as good; that there are singers, and that the highest manifestation of music is through the medium of chorus and orchestra combined.

XXXII. As you progress, think more of scores than of virtuosi.

XXXIII. Practise industriously the fugues of good masters—above all, those of John Sebastian Bach. Make the Clavier-bien-tempéré (48 Preludes and Fugues), your daily companion. It will help you to become a thorough musician.

XXXIV. Among your associates, court the society of those who know more than yourself.

XXXV. As relaxtions after your musical studies, read the poets, and walk in the open air.

* Why not?—Ed.

Mr. Aguilar's second performance of classical and modern pianoforte music takes place to-night.

Miss Arabella Goddard, accompanied by M. Sainton, Madame Amedei, Mr. & Mrs. Weiss, and Mr. Land, left London on Monday, for a month's tour in the provinces. The first concert took place, on Monday night, at Devizes.

St. Martin's Hall.—The Creation was repeated on Wednesday, under the direction of Mr. Hullah to another crowded audience. The singers on this occasion were Miss Birch, Messrs. T. Williams, and Frank Bodda. The performance was quite as successful as the first.

Willis's Rooms.—The annual grand German ball of the Society of Benevolence and Concord came off last week, at Willis's Rooms, and was well attended. The band, under the conductorship of Herr Wilhelm Ganz, gave great satisfaction, and many of the quadrilles were redemanded. The selection of dance music comprised some of the newest compositions.

HARMONIC UNION.

The performance of Elijah, on Monday evening, under Mr. Benedict's direction, was, on the whole, remarkably good. The choruses were given with unusual clearness, and all in the proper times, except "Behold the Lord God passed by," which was too slow, and wanting in the point and steadiness that characterised the others. Mr. Benedict is an excellent conductor; he thoroughly understands the music of Mendelssohn, and, what is more, has sufficient veneration for the composer to adhere strictly to his intentions, which can hardly be asserted of every public conductor. He must try, nevertheless, to tone down his choristers a little. Some of them sing as furiously as Jehu is said to have driven, and thus derange the harmony of the ensemble. It cannot certainly be said of the gentlemen-tenors at the Harmonic Union that they do not "sing out," since at times they positively vociferate. Mr. Benedict, however, will regulate their enthusiasm in proper time. The band also wants pulling back; in the chorus "Thanks be to God," the scale for the violins—which produces such a striking effect, when well played, that it has been compared to a flash of lightning—was by no means in order. Some of the gentlemen, in their eagerness, began upon F instead of G; and rendered it necessary for those who began upon G to endeavour to catch them, which they did not succeed in doing. Thus a very bright and original idea of the composer was well nigh being made ridiculous.

The singers were all in good vein. We like Miss Dolby's spirited reading of Jezebel's recitatives (where the wife of Ahab excites the people against Elijah) much better than the calculated and long-drawn declamation of a celebrated foreigner who has been so highly extolled for her execution of this scene. Miss Stabbach's improvement is rapid; she has evidently been studying with ardour, or she could not possibly have sung the difficult soprano music throughout so well, and especially the great and trying air "Hear ye, Israel." The applause bestowed by the audience upon this young lady was amply merited. Mr. Lockey sang with his accustomed care; and Mrs. Lockey, who divided the contralto music with Miss Dolby, gave "Woe unto them," as well as the author himself could have desired. Mr. Leffler sang some of the bass recitatives and the last air of Elijah, "For the mountains," which he rendered with smoothness and good effect. Sig. Belletti appeared for the first time at Exeter Hall, though not for the first time in English oratorio, as those may remember who were at the Norwich Festival of 1852, when the air "Why do the nations?" was allotted to him in the Messiah. At Liverpool, too—which emporium of commerce Jenny Lind besieged with "farewell" concerts, on her way to the United Concerts, in 1850—among other things, the contralto air (as Mr. Macfarren has now established it to be on such undoubted authority) "But who may abide the day of his coming?" was confided to Sig. Belletti. His task on Monday night was still harder, but he acquitted himself admirably. Being a practised musician, Sig. Belletti found the music easy in spite of its difficulties, and sang the impetuous air, "Is not his word like a fire?" so finely, that the audience re-demanded it with unanimity. The rest of Elijah's music was also given with effect by the clever Italian vocalist, whom we can compliment with strict impartiality upon his general pronunciation of our not very readily attainable language. In the double quartet, "For he shall give his angels," the principals were assisted by a Mr. Plumb and a Mr. Frost and by two ladies, Misses Newby and Ada Newby, who furthermore joined Misses Stabbach and Dolby in the quartet "Holy! holy!"

Mr. W. Rea, the organist, must be praised not merely for his good playing but for the fidelity with which he adheres to Mendelssohn's own organ part, to which he does not add and from which he does not detract a note, a fact hardly to be asserted of every public organist. There was great applause for Mr. Benedict on his appearance and exit, and great applause during the oratorio; and we see no reason why there should not have been. When we go to an oratorio on week-days we are not supposed to be attending divine service; why, therefore, should applause be restricted? Let echo answer. Sig. Belletti's was not the only encore; Misses Stabbach and Dolby with Mrs. Lockey won the same compliment in "Lift thine eyes;" but they did not deserve it, since they sang the unaccompanied trio a great deal too slow, which took all the life out of it. The hall was not crowded.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The last two concerts have been exclusively of the popular kind. The addition of Mrs. Newton Frodsham (late Mrs. Alexander Newton) has materially strengthened the vocal department, and that clever lady's execution of the fine air of the Queen of Night, "Gli angui d'inferno," from Mozart's Il Flauto Magico, was the feature of the concert of Wednesday week. Two pianists have appeared, an Englander and a foreigner—Miss Ellen Day (at the first concert) and Madlle. Graever (at the last). Both are easy and brilliant performers, and both were quite successful. A trombone solo by Sig. Cioffi, at the first concert, a great display of executive skill, was warmly applauded. The concert of last Wednesday was essentially a Bellini-concert. The most popular pieces from the Sonnambula were allotted to Mrs. Newton Frodsham, Miss Grace Alleyne, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Mr. Lawler, all of whom acquitted themselves well. The audience were evidently delighted. A pleasing variety of songs, duets, etc., was also given by Misses Poole and Lascelles, Madame F. Lablache Mr. T. Young, and Sig. F. Lablache, besides solos on the violin and violoncello by Messrs. Viotti Collins and G. Collins, each very effective in its way. Herr Lutz now conducts the entire concerts, Mr. Benedict having altogether seceded. Herr Lutz has an excellent leader at his elbow—viz., Mr. Thirlwall.

The performance at the next concert will be for the benefit of the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital. Mozart and Beethoven are to be the chief contributors to the programme.

D'ALBERT'S ALBUM, for 1854. T. Chappell.

"Rich not gaudy," might be the characteristic motto for D'Albert's Musical Annual for the current year. The colours on the covers are white and gold, and though simple, are displayed with elegance and good taste. The title-page is plain to a fault, but the presentation page is elaborate and fancifully designed. The illustrations are five:—A young lady representing "Fair Star," another young lady representing no one in particular, a view of the Dardanelles, a Turkish Warrior with Attendants, and a lithograph of the French Empress. The ladies are hardly to be called beauties (according to our taste), but the view of the Dardanelles, and the Turkish Warrior are excellent specimens of the combined labours of Messrs. Brandard and Hanhart. The lithograph—an uncoloured one—of the Empress of the French is attractive, though questionable as a likeness. The figure is perhaps too tall, and the face not sufficiently feminine to do justice to the illustrious and charming lady.

Of the music it is not so easy to speak, as there is so much more to describe. The Album contains six sets of waltzes, four quadrilles, three galops, three polkas, and one mazurka. We should be somewhat puzzled to say which are the best. However, if called upon to make a selection, we should point to the "Georgette Waltz," the "Constantinople Quadrille," the "War Galop," the "Marquise Waltz," the "Autumn Flower Waltz," and the "L'Espérance Mazurka," as most to our liking. Many will doubtless select for particular approval the "Little Bo-peep Quadrille," and the "New Lancers' Quadrille." By-the-bye, this last we can strongly recommend to all gentlewomen who are desirous of re-essaying a dance which should never have been banished from the ball-room.

Mr. D'Albert, who of late years has become so popular and prolific a contributor to the repertory of dance music, has not hazarded his reputation in the volume before us. He has written his best, and provided his admirers with a varied collection of pieces, for the greater part so easy, that the mere beginner can readily play them. We recommend the Album as an elegant presentation book, and the music as pretty and well fitted for the purpose to which it is devoted.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH ARTISTS.

NO. II.

CLARA NOVELLO.

CLARA ANASTASIA NOVELLO is the fourth daughter of Mr Vincent Novello, a highly-esteemed organist and musician, and the head of one of the oldest and most respectable musical firms in London. She was born on the 10th of June, 1818. Her family being for the most part bred to the musical profession, she was afforded early opportunities of developing the talent she displayed as a child. When nine years old her parents placed her under the care of Mr. John Robinson, of York. At York she underwent a regular preparatory course of tuition, in pianoforte playing as well as in singing. Miss Hill, of York, was her first instructor in the vocal art, and, under her superintendance, Clara made rapid progress.

There are some in York who still remember the small, clear, "childish treble" of little Clara, when she sang in the Roman Catholic Chapel of that city. Shortly before her departure from York, she was witness to the almost total destruction of the magnificent cathedral.

In 1828 Clara Novello returned to London, and prosecuted her studies under her father.

In the following year, Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Novello, on their return from a visit to the widow and sister of Mozart at Salzburg, ascertained at Paris that there was a vacancy for a pupil in the Academy of Singing for Church Music. The father immediately called upon M. Choron, head-master of the establishment, and obtained leave for his daughter to enter herself as a candidate, Clara being on a visit to some friends in Boulogne. Mrs. Vincent Novello went there in search of her, and three days afterwards Clara was examined before the masters of the Academy, according to the adopted practice at that institution. She sang the "Agnus Dei," from Mozart's Mass in F, No. 1, and Dr. Arne's "The Soldier Tired;" and was unanimously pronounced the successful candidate against nineteen competitors.

During her stay at the Academy, Clara Novello applied herself with assiduity to the study of the greatest writers for the Church, and laid the foundation of that fame she now enjoys, as one of our most accomplished singers of sacred music. At one of the public exhibitions of the pupils, Clara had the honour of singing before the king (Charles X.) and the Royal Family, when Prince Polignac was pleased to pay her some kind and encouraging compliments. She was placed upon a low stool, that she might be better seen by the audience.

The Royal Establishment being dispersed, at the outbreak of the Revolution, in 1830, Clara left Paris. The governess of the female pupils, alarmed for the safety of the young ladies—more particularly of Clara, who was a foreigner and an especial favourite—made intercession with a friend to take her little charge under his protection. Clara was, in consequence, hurried through the streets, encountering, as she went along, the wounded and the dead who were being conveyed away. The scene produced so strong an effect upon her nervous system, that, when she reached her destination, she sank into a lethargic stupor, in which she remained many hours; and this, according to her medical attendant, probably saved her from a brain fever.

Returning to England, in 1833, Clara Novello made her début in public, at the benefit Concert of Mrs. Jewell, at Windsor. Shortly afterwards she received an engagement for the series of twelve Ancient Concerts; and, in the same season, was engaged by the directors of the Philharmonic Society, where she sang the "Per pietà" of Mozart. This was an important event in her life. Not having reached her fifteenth year, she was the youngest singer who had ever obtained that honour. In the same year she made her first appearance at a provincial festival, in Worcester; and, in 1834, formed one of the orchestra at the centenary celebration of Handel in Westminster Abbey. In the same year, the members of the Philharmonic Society elected her an associate.

At this period her youth, her accomplishments, and prepossessing appearance won general admiration. Some, however, while they acknowledged her artistic claims and admired her personal attractions, found fault with a certain gravity of demeanour, and apparent coldness of manner, which, they said, detracted from the impression she made, and was unnatural at her age. Apropos of this, in 1836, one who knew her well, writes as follows:—

"The fact is, that Clara Novello, who appears so sedate and demure to a large and mixed audience, is, among her friends, remarkable for exuberance of animal spirits. Her courage is indomitable: difficulties and opposition only acting as stimulants to exertion. She has a generous nature, with a child-like fondness for the most simple pleasures. But the best features in her character are, that she does not appear to have a spirit of envy, and is totally devoid of affectation."

The success of Clara Novello as a concert singer steadily advanced until 1837, when she was recommended by Rubini and others to visit Italy, and study for the stage. This new career presented manifold advantages; but circumstances combined to prevent its realization for years. She had serious thoughts of starting for Italy forthwith; but, having already accepted engagements in England for the autumn festivals of 1837, etc., it was represented to her there would be great difficulty in crossing the Alps so late. This was especially urged by Mendelssohn, who was then in London, and who solicited her to take part in the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, of which he had just been appointed a director. Such a compliment from so great a man could not be disregarded, and Clara Novello at once complied.

She went to Leipsic at the close of the season. In Leipsic she made a great sensation. The Germans were delighted with the beauty of her voice and the purity of her style, and at the first concert she was received with the utmost favour, although no previous interest had been exerted in her behalf. The effect produced by Clara Novello at the Gewandhaus Concerts is described by Mendelssohn at length in the following letter, written at the time, and which we have great pleasure in publishing entire:—

Leipzig, 18th Nov., 1837.

MY DEAR SIR,—It is now a fortnight since your sister first appeared here in public, and directly after it I wanted to write to you and give you a full account of it, and only to-day I have leisure enough to do it. Excuse it, but although it is late, and I may think that you heard already from other sides of all the details of her great success here, I cannot help writing you also on the subject, and before all I shout "triumph," because you know that you were my enemy,* and that my opinion prevailed only with great difficulty (tellers included), and that it comes now out how well I knew my countrymen, how well they appreciate what is really good and beautiful, and what a service to all the lovers of music has been done by your sister's coming over to this country. I do not know whether she thinks the same of my opinion now. I am sometimes afraid she must find the place so very small and dull, and miss her splendid Philharmonic band, and all those marchionesses, and duchesses, and lady patronesses who look so beautifully aristocratically in your concert-rooms, and of whom we have a great want. But if being really and heartily liked and loved by a public, and being looked on as a most distinguished and eminent talent, must also convey a feeling of pleasure to those that are the object of it, I am sure that your sister cannot repent her resolution of accepting the invitation to this place, and must be glad to think of the delight she gave, and the many friends she made in so short time, and in a foreign country. Indeed, I never heard such an unanimous expression of delight as after her first recitative; and it was a pleasure to see people at once agreeing, and the difference of opinion (which must always prevail) consisting only in the more or less praise to be bestowed on her. It was capital that not one hand's applause received her when she first appeared to sing "Non più di fiori," because the triumph after the recitative was the greater; the room rung of applause, and after it there was such a noise of conversations, people expressing their delight to each other, that not a note of the whole ritornello could be heard. Then silence was again restored, and after the air, which she really sang better and with more expression than I ever heard from her, my good Leipsic public became like mad, and made a most tremendous noise. Since that moment she was the declared favourite of them; they are equally delighted with her clear and youthful voice, and with the purity and good taste with which she sings everything. The Polacca of the Puritani was encored, which is a rare thing in our concerts here, and I am quite sure the longer she stays, and the more she is heard, the more she will become a favourite; because she possesses just those two qualities of which the public is particularly fond here, purity of intonation and a thoroughbred musical feeling. I must also add, that I never heard her to greater advantage than at these two concerts, and that I liked her singing infinitely better than ever I did before; whether it might be that the smaller room suits her better, or perhaps the foreign air, or whether it is that I am partial to everything in this country (which is also not unlikely), but I really think her much superior to what I have heard her before. And, therefore, I am once more glad that I conquer'd you, my enemy.

They are now in correspondance with the Court of Dessau and with Berlin, whereto they intend to go during the intervals of the concerts here; I hope, however, that their stay will be prolonged as much as possible. We had Vieuxtemps here, who delighted the public; we also expect Blagrove in the beginning of January. Charles Kemble, with his daughter Adelaide, passed also by this place, but she did not sing in public, only at a party at my house. Has Mr. Coventry received my letter, and the one for Bennett I sent him? And have you received the parcel with my concerto, which Breitkopf and Hartel promised to send in great haste? Do you see Mr. Klingemann sometimes? And how is music going on in England? Or had you no time to think now of anything else than the Guildhall-puddings and pies, and the two hundred pine-apples which the Queen ate there, as a French paper has it. If you see Mr. Attwood, will you tell him my best compliments and wishes, and that a very great cause of regret to me is my not having been able to meet him at my last stay in England. And now the paper is over, and, consequently, the letter also. Excuse its style, which is probably very German. My kindest regard to Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, and my best thanks for his kind letter and the papers he sent me by Mrs. Novello. And now good-bye, and be as well and happy as I always wish you to be.—Very truly yours, FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

Alfred Novello, Esq.,
London,
69, Dean Street, Soho Sqnare.

The fame of Clara Novello's success at Leipsic spread throughout Germany, and a gracious reception at the Court of Weimar procured her an introduction to that of Prussia, which led to substantial and lasting results. His Majesty, Frederick, father of the present sovereign, was warm in his approval of the young English cantatrice; and, at several private and public concerts, in the royal palaces of Berlin and Potsdam, invariably commanded a repetition of his favourite air from the Messiah, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." The king had retired from the active duties of sovereignty, and frequently indulged, at Potsdam, the taste for music which was eminent in his family. He displayed an almost paternal interest for Clara, and, at the parting audience, examined her minutely about her future intentions, and presented her with introductions to his sister, the Empress of Russia (since that time a constant patroness), as well as to the Court of Vienna, accompanied by much excellent advice.

At Vienna, Clara Novello passed the spring of 1838, singing at the Court and at public concerts—especially at a series which was devoted to the relief of the sufferers from a flood at Buda-Pesth.

Proceeding, with her family, to Milan by the Tyrol, Clara spent a day, at Salzburg, with the aged widow of Mozart, to whom she sang several of the great composer's songs. The widow was enchanted, and entreated her to prolong her stay; but her arrangements made this impossible. On arriving in Italy, Clara's projected training for the stage was reluctantly postponed for two years. The cause may be shortly explained. At the time of their arrival, Milan was thronged with visitors, who came to take part in, or witness, the coronation of the Emperor of Austria as King of Lombardy. Clara Novello was engaged at all the musical festivities. Several of the ambassadors were present, and were entertained by the Austrian ministry, who had accompanied the Court to Milan. At a party given by Prince Metternich, the Russian Ambassador urged Clara to pay a visit to St. Petersburgh, and avail herself of the august patronage she would be likely to obtain through the letter of the King of Prussia. The hint was adopted.

A series of engagements in most of the important towns of North Germany occupied Clara Novello's time in the season 1838-9. The terms secured to the singer were generally half the receipts, with a certain sum guaranteed, in case the concert should not prove successful. This, however, was not once the case; and the number of the concerts was often tripled and quadrupled.

At St. Petersburgh, Clara was received with the utmost courtesy by the Empress, who intimated the gratification she should experience at hearing Miss Novello again, on her Majesty's projected visit to the Rhine, at the close of the year. Accordingly, when the time arrived, we find Clara was seldom absent from the musical entertainments given to the Empress by her Rhenish hosts. Thalberg, another favorite of her Imperial Majesty, was also frequently engaged.

At the close of the year 1839, Clara Novello determined to enter upon her long deferred project of studying for the stage—which, amid all her successes, had never been abandoned.

At the coronation in Milan, Clara Novello had been introduced to Rossini, the recollection of whose kindness on that occasion induced her to pay him a visit at Bologna, and solicit his counsel. After she had sung several pieces, he told her that the popularity she had achieved in the Courts of Europe might lead her to expect he would pay her compliments; he preferred, however, to call her attention to what she had yet to learn. This he did most elaborately, ending by advising her to resign all engagements for a year, to go to Milan and take lessons in singing from Micheroux, to study mimica, or stage action, to attend the theatre nightly, and give her undivided attention to operatic music. The advice was adopted. Clara went to Milan, studied with Micheroux, and became his favorite pupil. But Micheroux oftener praised her more for her humility than for her talent, and used to say, that no success could spoil her.

Clara Novello's first appearance on the stage took place at Padua, in 1840. The part selected was Semiramide. It was a bold essay for a beginner, but was nevertheless decidedly successful. After her début in Padua, she obtained engagements at Bologna, Modena, Genoa, etc. By some misunderstanding with the agents, she became due for the Carnival season of 1842 both at Rome and Genoa. Neither would yield up its right. Rome adopted the stratagem of engaging her for the previous autumn at Fermo, and, as she was thus within the papal territory, her passport was stopped, and she was not permitted to depart. The affair was ultimately compromised by Clara Novello singing during six weeks of the Carnival at each city. At Fermo she met the Count Gigliucci, who paid his addresses to her, and was accepted. The marriage was deferred, however, till after fulfilment of all her engagements. These included her performances in Saffo and other operas at Drury Lane, under Macready's management, together with the autumn festivals of 1842. At the conclusion of the Gentlemen's Concerts in Manchester, Clara Novello retired from professional life without taking leave of the public. In November she became the Countess Gigliucci, and passed several years of domestic happiness and quietude in private. The union has been blest with four children.

It fortunately happened for the lovers of the vocal art, that about three years ago, circumstances compelled Clara Novello to resume the exercise of her talents in public. She reappeared at Rome in 1850, and subsequently at Florence, Lisbon, Madrid, Düsseldorf, London, and the English provinces in succession. Between the stage, oratorios, and concert singing, Clara Novello's time has been fully occupied. She is at present fulfilling an engagement of three years at Milan. Her popularity at the famous Scala is very great, and the Milanese, at the end of every season, look forward to her reappearance as an event. This year is the third of her scrittura.

Clara Novello is engaged for the projected English opera at Drury Lane, and the public will be enabled to form their own opinions as to her dramatic talents. It is to be hoped this opportunity will be afforded her, since as yet her capabilities as an operatic singer are comparatively unknown in England, and her reputation has been entirely made by oratorios and concerts. That reputation, however, stands so high, as to warrant us in anticipating an artist of no ordinary accomplishments and powers.

NEW CHURCH AT READING IN BERKS.—In the centre of the Castle Hill Estate, fronting the Bath road, in Reading, a plot of ground had been apportioned by the original proprietor of the property for a square, which was surrounded by a very handsome iron palisading with large gates at each corner. The land having been recently purchased for the Conservative Land Society, the executive committee have decided that the ground in the centre of the square shall be given for the erection of a new church, the increasing population of Reading rendering the gift very useful and beneficial to the locality. This is the second grant of land for the building of a church by the Conservative Land Society.

NEW THEATRE.—Mr. E. T. Smith, of Drury Lane, is about to build a new theatre on the site of the Shadwell Workhouse.

A CHARITABLE MANAGER.—Mr. E. T. Smith, lessee of Drury-lane Theatre, has during the last fortnight issued in the theatre 250 quarts of excellent soup and 200 loaves to destitute and deserving applicants. Mr. Gustavus Brooke gives blankets to the provincials.

THE ORPHEUS ENGLISH AND GERMAN GLEE UNION, under the direction of Mr. F. Kingsbury, including Misses Rycroft, Lizzy Dyer, and Mr. Suchet Champion, have just returned from a successful tour in the West of England.

CELEBRITIES OF SCOTCH EXTRACTION.—Chambers, in his Journal, reminds us that Ben Jonson, Sir Isaac Newton, Cowper, Kant, Byron, Macaulay, Lola Montes, the Empress of France, Donizetti (from Donald Izett), and Jenny Lind, are all of pure Scotch descent.

FOREIGN.

PARIS (Jan. 22).—At the Académie Impériale de Musique the rehearsals of the new ballet in five acts, for Cerito, have commenced. The music is by M. le Comte de Gabrielli. An Italian mime, M. Mathia, will make his début on the occasion. Mdme. Tedesco is about to take a congé of a few months; she commences her tournée in Belgium. M. Brignoli, a young tenor, who made his début a few years ago at the Italian Opera, under Ronconi's management, has been engaged at the Académie.—At the Opéra Comique, on Sunday, and on Friday, Halévy's Mousquetaires de la Reine was performed, with MM. Mocker and Hermann Léon; Mdlles. Caroline Duprez, Lemercier, etc. The Noces de Jeannette, the Papillottes de M. Benoist, and the Châlet, have also been given. The rehearsals of Meyerbeer's comic opera, L'Etoile du Nord, will proceed with activity. It is expected, unless war is declared against Russia, that it will be produced in the middle of February.—At the Théâtre-Italien, l'Italiana in Algeri has been given with great success. Alboni's Isabella is one of her most admirable performances. Gardoni seconded her efficiently in the part of Lindoro. Rossi was Taddeo, and Fortini, Mustafa. The finale, and the trio "Pappatacci," were encored.—Among the pianists of the season, there is much talk of a boy of twelve years of age named Theodore Ritter, who, though yet unknown, promises one day to be famous. He is said to play all styles, from Chopin up to Sebastian Bach. The Société des Concerts give their second concert this morning (Sunday).—The Amateur Musical Society, under the direction of M. Georges Bousquet, (the musical critic of the Illustration), commence their Séances shortly.—Charles Soliva, a composer, a maître-de-chapelle to the Emperor of Russia, died in Paris, lately, aged 61. He was a pupil of the Conservatoire of Milan, and produced two operas at the Scala—La Testa di Bronza and Elena e Malvina. He also composed a great deal of sacred music. He was—as everybody is, native or foreigner, who passes through Rome—hon. member of the Société Sainte-Cécile. He has left several MSS., among others a Te Deum, for voices and orchestra, dedicated to the Emperor Napoleon.

CHARTRES.—The Philharmonic Society gave its first concert for the season on January 11th, under its new directors, MM. Maroteau and Gosmann. The programme was in the Casino style, the trumpery overture of Adolphe Adam to Le Roi d' Yvetot being one of the features. To this, Auber's sparkling overture to La Part du Diable was a relief. Mdlle. Leprince, M. Gosmann, and Madame C. Ponchard were the singers, and M. Lee played some very heavy solos on the violoncello. They have little notion of good music at Chartres.

HAVRE.—The new and clever singer from the Théâtre Lyrique, in Paris, Madame Marie Cabel, has come here to spend the remainder of her congé. She has appeared, with great success, in La Fille du Régiment, Le Barbier de Séville, Les Diamants de la Couronne, Galathée, and Le Bijou Perdu. The receipts of her first performance were presented to the poor of Havre. Madame Cabel returns to Paris immediately to resume her duties at the Théâtre Lyrique.

STRASBURG.—Emile Prudent has been giving concerts here. He is well received by the public. His fantasias on Guillaume Tell, and the Sonnambula, his Danse des Fées, and Retour des Bergers, created a sensation. The Danse des Fées was especially successful, and was always redemanded. The local papers are in extasies with M. Prudent.

MADRID, January 6.—The day before yesterday at the Theatre Royal the first representation of Robert le Diable took place, with a mise en scène which surpassed everything that had been seen here before. All that Madrid possesses, distinguished by birth, knowledge, and talent, was present on this occasion. The opera was received with the greatest applause. At the end of the last act, the house resounded with the cries of "Vive Meyerbeer!" "Vive le grand compositeur!" The artists entrusted with the principal parts were all recalled.

ANTWERP.—Madame Doria continues in favour with the public. On the 20th she appeared as Semiramide. All the authorities of Antwerp, and half the court from Brussels, whither on dit, Madame Doria is going, by royal command, were present.

MILAN.—The Gazetta Musicale of Milan informs us, that at La Scala, Verdi's Rigoletto has created a furore, and is being repeated nightly to crowded houses. Madame Clara Novello appeared in Gilda—the character played by Madame Bosio at the Royal Italian Opera—and sang admirably. The Gazetta Musicale speaks of her in the highest terms.

LEIPSIC.—At the twelfth Gewandhaus Concert, Joseph Joachim performed a new concerto of his own composition, and caused an excitement unusual with the Leipsic public. The playing and the composition were both much praised by the Leipsic judges.

VIENNA.—The following is a list of the pieces produced at the Imperial Opera-house, during the week beginning on the 12th instant.—On the 12th inst, Eine Sommernacht; on the 13th, Eine Sommernacht; on the 14th The Prophet; on the 15th, Die Teufelsgeige, ballet; on the 16th, Eine Sommernacht; on the 17th, Keolanthé, and on the 18th, Die Zaubergeige. In the Sommernacht, the principal characters were cast as follows: Fräulein Wildhauer, Elizabeth; Herr Ander, Shakspeare; Herr Staudigl, Falstaff; Fräulein Tietjens, Olivia; and Herr Kreutzer, Latimer. According to the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung, Herr Staudigl was not suited for Falstaff, the only true representative of the jolly knight being, in the opinion of that journal, Karl Formes. Herr Ander with Fräulein Wildhauer and Herr Staudigl were called for at the end of the second act and at the conclusion of the opera.—The following musical celebrities died in Austria during the past year: Fuchs Aloïs, member of the Imperial orchestra, on the 20th March; Foroni, composer, on the 24th March, in Verona; J. Kresky, Imperial emeritus capellmeister, on the 2nd February, in Ollmütz: and von Lannoy, composer, on the 28th March, in Vienna.—Meyerbeer's music to Struensee was performed at the second Spiritual Concert, on the 22nd inst.—Vieuxtemps' third and last quartet meeting took place on the 22nd inst., at five o'clock, p.m., in the Musical Union Hall. The programme included Haydn's quartet in E major, Beethoven's sonata in A major (the piano-forte part by Herr Evers) and Mozarts quartet in G minor.—J. Merk, an excellent composer for the violoncello, died a short time since. His place in the Imperial Chapel has been filled up by M. Carl Schlesinger.—Carl Evers, the pianist, leaves Vienna for Prague, where he intends giving concerts. His sister, Katinka, is also at Vienna.

NEW YORK.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The grand Bal Paré, which had been announced by Jullien for the 18th instant, was nearly being abandoned altogether. It was to have been given at Metropolitan Hall; but on the night of the 7th a fearful conflagration reduced this splendid building, and another large building contiguous—Lafarge's Hotel—to a heap of ruins. It is supposed that the fire originated in one of the hotel furnaces, under the orchestra belonging to the concert-room.

Metropolitan Hall (where Jullien has given all his concerts since leaving Castle Garden) was originally entitled Tripler Hall. It was built by a Mr. Tripler, and in 1850, although not quite finished, was publicly inaugurated (on the 14th of October) by Mdme. Anna Bishop and Mr. Bochsa, with a concert, at which only about 1,000 people assembled—although the room was calculated to hold 4,000, comfortably seated. Jenny Lind was to have made her first appearance at Tripler Hall; but, as it was not finished, Mr. Barnum took Castle Garden for the purpose of bringing out his new wonder, the successor of Tom Thumb. The cost of erecting Tripler Hall, without the purchase-money for the ground on which it stood, was reckoned at about 100,000 dollars. The concerts of Catherine Hayes, Alboni, and Sontag were also given in this building. Mr. Lafarge, proprietor of all the ground from Broadway to Mercer-street, purchased the hall of Mr. Tripler, when it was anything but a lucrative speculation. The total loss connected with the destruction of the two buildings is estimated at 494,000 dollars, of which 242,500 were insured at various insurance-offices—150,000 in New York alone. Lafarge House was leased to Messrs. Wright, Laniers, and Co. for 54,000 dollars per annum. It was a new hotel, and one of the finest and most capacious in New York. Hundreds of rooms had already been engaged. Luckily the plate, valued at nearly 20,000 dollars, had not yet been carried into the hotel, which was to have been inaugurated with a grand festival (of eating and drinking).

Jullien, thus frustrated, has made arrangements, however, to give his Bal Paré—which, says the New York Herald, "is to be attended only by the bon ton, and gentlemen who wear neither frock-coats nor boots, all to appear in full dress coats, pump-shoes, white stockings, and cravats made of white satin"—at "Niblo's." Talking of Jullien, I must tell you that, at the close of his last concert in New York, a handsome and elaborately designed silver salver was presented to him by the resident musical artists, whose conjunction with his orchestra added to its efficiency.

The following was the inscription:—

"Presented to M. Jullien, by the New York members of his Band, whose names are annexed, as a token of their high appreciation of his admirable skill and ability as a chef-d'orchestre. New York, January 1, 1854."

This was preceded by a few remarks, to which Jullien replied in appropriate terms.

Jullien has been giving Handel's Messiah at Metropolitan Hall, in conjunction with the New York Sacred Harmonic Society. Nearly 4,000 people were present. Madlle. Pico Vietti, Miss M. S. Brainard (a native), Mr. M. Colburn, and Sig. Badiali were the chief singers. At "Niblo's" they have been performing Meyerbeer's Prophète, but in a very imperfect fashion. Poor Jullien has again given offence to the strong national conceit of the Yankees, by declining to produce at his concerts a so-called symphony (in reality a very tiresome and unmeaning pot-pourri), entitled Washington, the last "movement" of which is the American air of "Hail Columbia." I suspect that it was the music, and not exactly the political tendency of this "symphony" of M. Emilius Girac—a contributor to the Musical World and Times, who professes himself a pupil of Reicha and Cherubini—to which Jullien objected. The work proposes to illustrate the life of Washington. Had it been called Horse-radish it would have been equally suggestive, since it is as apropos of horse-radish as of the American liberator. I heard it at a rehearsal, and had a great mind to recommend the author to send it to the Society of British Musicians. On Thursday, Jullien gave us a regular dose of Yankee musical genius. "Symphonies," by Fry and Bristow, were presented (the first movement only of Bristow's); and, as a bonne bouche, we had the great maestro's own American Quadrille. As for Fry, with the Day in the Country, Breaking Heart, and Santa Claus, if none understand them better than myself, he has not much chance of being appreciated. I have no more musical news at present. The fact is, things are rather dull just now.

BOSTON.—(From a Correspondent).—Mr. Forrest, the tragedian, is playing at the National Theatre, and Mr. J. R. Anderson, the tragedian, at the Howard Athenæum—the former in Richelieu, the latter in Hamlet. One is worth the other. If Gustavus Brooke were here, he would make up the trinity of histrionic magnificence. Mr. Davenport (from London), a real Bostonian, is expected in the spring. Of him Mrs. Mowatt, in her Autobiography, writes thus:—

"Edward L. Davenport, of Boston, was strongly recommended to Mr. Mowatt by old and leading members of the profession. His high moral character, his unassuming and gentleman-like manners, his wonderful versatility and indisputable talent, caused him to be selected as the person who was to travel with us during my second year on the stage. Upon this selection every succeeding month and year gave us new cause for congratulation. The prominent position he has since won upon the English stage, and the honours he has received from fastidious English audiences, are the just reward of intrinsic but unostentatious merit."

Dion Boucicault, having sufficiently lectured New York, is now going to lecture Boston. Meanwhile a local paper, the Sunday Dispatch, bids him welcome in the following paragraph:—

"DION BOUCICAULT.—This celebrated lecturer, wit, dramatist, and gentleman, announces a series of lectures, commencing on Tuesday next. The author of London Assurance connot help being well received in a city so much indebted to him for amusement; and if in his lectures he manages to enlist attention as successfully as he does in his plays, he may count upon being well bestowed and duly honoured while under our protection; great word that—but let it go! If energy is anything, "Dion" will take, and no mistake."

Apropos of Boucicault, a most singular paper has appeared in the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, under the heading of Those whom I have known, by "Cosmopolitan." The writer speaks of Boucicault as of one with whom he must have been intimately associated; and, moreover, brings into his narative other men of London, in a style so peculiarly graphic, that I cannot help thinking your old and brilliant contributor, Charles Rosenberg, must be the real "Cosmopolitan." I have shipped you a Gazette, that you may read and be convinced.—Jullien is again here. He commenced a series of six concerts, on the 5th, at Music Hall. The "sleighing time" did not militate against his attractions, and the hall was full. On the 6th he gave his "Shaksperian night," with the same programme which pleased so much at New York. By the way, Jullien is "burnt out" of the "Emperor City." Of course you have heard of the destruction of Metropolitan Hall by fire. The Germania Society are giving their annual series of concerts at Music Hall. The 6th took place last night. The Handel and Haydn Society have just performed the oratorio of Samson for the second time, in the same building, and are now preparing Israel in Egypt; so that we do not want for good music in Boston. The Germania and Mendelssohn Societies are combining to get up a performance of the oratorio of the Desert (Qy. the Deluge, ED.).

DIORAMA OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

THE ever-active and indefatigable Albert Smith, whose mind is a bee in summer seeking for honey to hive up for the public benefit, with the co-operation of the no less active and equally indefatigable Shirley Brooks, has written a new entertainment, which was given for the first time on Monday night at the Egyptian Hall, and in point of interest, if not of stirring events and adventures, promises, at the present moment, to rival even Mont Blanc. The entertainment consists of a moving diorama of Constantinople and its environs, with an explanatory lecture written by the above-named gentlemen and delivered by Mr. Charles Kenney. The diorama is on a large scale, and includes numerous and magnificent views along the Dardanelles and Bosphorus, as far as the entrance to the Black Sea, and many highly interesting pictures of the interior of the Golden City. It is painted by Mr. Allom, by whom the sketches were made on the spot, and reflects the highest credit on his pictorial skill and industry.

The views are too many to particularize. In the first part we were much struck with the French and English fleets riding at anchor in the Dardanelles, and the first approach to Constantinople. The Gardens of the Seraglio and the interior of St. Sophia are splendidly painted; and the views of the Atmeidan, or Hippodrome, and the Turkish Café at night, are exceedingly striking and picturesque. As the diorama proceeds, the illustrations become even more real and interesting. The Great Public Baths of Constantinople, the Water-side with the Seven Towers in the distance and the Sultan's State Barge on the water, the Summer Palace of the Sultan, the Mosque of Shah-za-deh Djamasi, and the Gun Factory at Tophana, are all admirable specimens of dioramic art. The last view is one of the finest and most natural we have seen in any moving picture. The concluding picture—a View of a Fire in Constantinople by Moonlight—is painted by Mr. William Beverley, whose name is a guarantee for its excellence.

The diorama is explained in an appropriate and ably written lecture, delivered quietly, sensibly, in a clear voice and with perfect distinctness, by Mr. Charles Kenney. It is, we believe, that gentleman's first essay in public speaking, or, at least, in lecture-giving. We congratulate him on his success.

The new entertainment cannot fail to prove attractive in the highest degree. Independently of its own intrinsic merits, it derives an unusual interest from passing events. Everybody is anxious to learn particulars of the Dardanelles, the Bosphorus, and the Black Sea. He who goes to the Egyptian Hall to see Constantinople will learn, in one night, more from Messrs. Charles Kenney and Allom than if he studied the subject in books for one year.

THE IMPORTANCE OF POLKAS.

OUR announcement of last week has brought down upon us a terrible letter from the composer of the "Delightful Polka." We print it for two reasons, first, to give the writer an opportunity of making his own views public, next, to protest against the insinuation that the Musical World, or any respectable journal, is in the habit of giving favourable reviews in return for subscriptions or advertisements.

The following is the letter—verbatim et literatim;

3, Hartland Terrace Kentish Town Rd.

SIR—After I gave your collector two of my last Compositions I find in your paper that you dont intend noticing any except work of importance. Now in my opinion a Polka or Waltz &c &c is a work of great importance first to the Publisher, and then to the Composer My Delightful Polka sold 2000 and now is passing through a new Edition wile my Pianoforte fantasias, Studies, Overtures sell very slow.

The reason that I have been Subscriber so many years is that I had a right to send my music to be reviewed and I have paid five Shilling a Quarter for that purpose as I can see the Musical World when ever I like to the American Store—without paying for it.

I have send to all the papers (which I dont subscribe to them) every week several pieces for review and have had them noticed

My Album contains no less than 750 Notices (wich very few belongs to your World) from different papers including Sunday time &c and I only send one copy of each work You will find that I am not the only person that finds fault with your publishers rule as I know several persons who take the World in for the sake of the review. Mr. Novello wished me to subscribe to his Musical Times I send him a note to say that I will be happy to do so, and sent some music at the same time for review the next week I received the music back with the message they did not review Music and consequently I declined having the paper as it was full of Novello's publication and you will be full of Boosey's Dancing music as they are no less of 31 advertisements this week and of course they will reviewed so that there will be no chance for any Composer of Dancing Music to have his work noticed unless he pays for it. All the Publishers of my Music advertised it in those papers wich they think proper, and profitable so that if I want a notice in yours I must advertise against my wish and pay for the notice. I think I ought to do like Mr. Cocks the Publisher did in one of the Weekly paper by send them a letter by saying that if the Review was favourable he would take a ½ of 100 of Copies so that if it is your intention, or the proprietors intention not to give me any notice without advertising the Music and paying for it I shall be compelled to troble you to send me back my last two new pieces wich cost me three shilling and a 11 you have by you nearly six Months which have never been reviewed at all and I only cut out the notice for the Album and see if there is any one that wants a Master wich I never see 12 years I have had your paper. You see Mr. Editor every one for themselves so you cannot blame me for taking this step if proprietors will make such obsurd rules.

Perhaps you will be so kind to send me a line and consider this note a private one. I remain

Monday 23 Jan 1853. CARLO MINASI.

"Every one for themselves" is a good maxim. Let Mr. Carlo Minasi adhere to it, but let him not judge others by his own narrow notions. He may rest assured that the province of journalism is not so despicable as he imagines, and that, if he has no other means of courting fame than those suggested by his letter, he had best take his five shillings and his polkas, "delightful" or detestable, to another market.

P.S.—We are surprised that the "Delightful Polka" should have sold 2000 and be "passing through a new edition"—or indeed, that it should be allowed to pass under any pretext—but we are not at all surprised that the "Pianoforte fantasias, studies, overtures sell very slow," since they are what they sell—if not absolutely a sell.

LUMLEY v. GYE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER, JAN. 14.

(Sittings in Banco before Lord CAMPBELL and Justices COLERIDGE, ERLE, and CROMPTON.)

IN this case the court has granted a rule, calling upon the plaintiff in the above action to shew cause why a commission should not issue to the Royal Court of Berlin, or to one of the judges of the said court, to examine witnesses in the kingdom of Prussia on behalf of the defendant. It appeared when the rule was granted that, in the month of June last, a commission had issued to a member of the English bar (Mr. Hayward, Q.C.) to examine Miss Wagner and her father in reference to that lady's engagement with the plaintiff, the breach of which engagement, at the instance of the defendant, had given rise to the action. That commission, however, had proved abortive, in consequence of the refusal of the counsel who appeared for the parties to allow the commission to be executed according to the Prussian forms as prescribed by a Prussian judge who attended to administer the oath to the witnesses, and by the subsequent refusal of Miss Wagner to consent to be examined in any other manner than before a judge of her own country and in her own language. The present rule was granted to remedy the failure which had thus taken place, and it was proposed that the commission should be addressed to a Prussian judge, and that the oath usually taken by the commissioner under such circumstances should be dispensed with. Sir F. Thesiger, Mr. Hoggins, Q.C., and Mr. Huddleston showed cause against the rule. The Attorney-General, Mr. Creasy, and Mr. Willes appeared in support of it.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he was of opinion that upon the defendant's paying the costs of the first commission, a fresh commission should issue to examine witnesses. If the Court had power to issue the commission, it was very desirable that it should do so, for, otherwise, most important evidence would be excluded. There could be no doubt Miss Wagner and her father were most material witnesses, and their evidence might be for ever excluded unless obtained in this manner. The question then was, had the Court the power to issue the commission? He (Lord Campbell) was of opinion that it had the power. It was not intended to send the commission to the Royal Court of Berlin, but to the individuals who constituted that Court. It had been stated on the part of the plaintiff, as an objection to issuing the commission, that the manner in which the witnesses would be examined was different from what it would have been in England, and no doubt that objection was deserving of serious consideration, and ought to be well weighed. He (Lord Campbell) thought, however, that it ought not to prevail, because the Court was not to suppose that, although the witnesses would be examined according to the law of Prussia, the whole return would be contrary to the law of England. If it should appear upon the face of the return that it was so, it would be rejected. But if the objection did not appear upon the face of the document, extrinsic evidence might be produced to show how the examination was conducted, and if the document could be impeached, it would be rejected. If the Court should be mistaken, an opportunity would be afforded for revising its judgment, for it would be competent for the objecting party to tender a bill of exceptions to the reception or rejection of evidence, and the opinion of the House of Lords might be taken on the question. He (Lord Campbell) thought that in the exercise of their discretion the Court would do well to grant the commission. The fact that the witnesses would be examined by the judge was not alone a sufficient objection. It was also said that hearsay and other objectionable evidence might be returned, but if that should be so, the whole might be repudiated, or any particular objectionable evidence might be rejected. Upon the whole, his Lordship said he thought the commission ought to issue, on the defendant paying the costs.

The other judges expressed similar opinions, and the rule was made absolute accordingly.

DRAMATIC.

HAYMARKET.—On Monday night Miss Cushman made her appearance at this theatre, after an absence from England of five or six years. The play selected was Milman's Fazio, Miss Cushman performing Bianca, the character in which she first essayed her talents before a British public, and which, to a great extent, has been identified with her name.

Six years is an epoch in the life of an artiste, and few can withstand the changes and vicissitudes that occur during so long a period. Miss Cushman, however, does not seem to have altered in the least since we saw her in London. She still possesses the same power and energy, the same fire, the same intuition, the same realization, and, we may add, the same expressive looks. Her genius is as pre-eminent as ever, her art as evident, her performance as striking. Miss Cushman has talents of the highest order, and has studied deeply and to the purpose. Her acting bears the stamp of the most careful and thoughtful elaboration. Her impulse is great, her perception admirable, her judgment correct. For abstraction, or the power of projecting oneself into a part, and giving vitality and truth to its personification, Miss Cushman yields to no actress we have seen; her portraits, indeed, have been occasionally objected to as being too closely copied after nature. If this be a fault, however, Miss Cushman has no great cause for regret, since she shares it with Macready and Rachel.

Miss Cushman's faults may be summed up in fewer words. Her energy and impulse sometimes lead her to the verge of extravagance; in passionate scenes she not unfrequently wants repose; her action is often redundant, her attitude angular and constrained, her movements abrupt and hurried. But these admitted, she is always real, always natural, and, whether she be dignified or undignified, graceful or the opposite, the spectator is carried away by her force and earnestness.

Miss Cushman's voice, although a little nasal in its quality, like Braham's, is exceedingly agreeable, and capable of being adapted to every variety of passion. Her low subdued tones are singularly expressive, while her pathos is irresistible.

Such is Miss Cushman as she appeared to us on Monday night, in the character of Bianca, in Mr. Milman's play of Fazio.

About Fazio we are not desirous of entering into lengthened details. It may be termed a play with one character, the author having expended all his pains on Bianca. The hero is a nondescript—a sort of patchwork made up of Don Juan, Jack Sheppard, and George Barnwell. No actor could redeem the part from insignificance. Bianca, however, is drawn with a bold and masterly hand, and, if the character does not lay hold of our sympathies, it never fails to enlist our deep attention. It repels and attracts at the same time; but the attraction predominates. Aldabella is repugnant from first to last, and the other characters are nonentities.

The whole weight of the performance fell on Miss Cushman; and she sustained it, for the most part, with singular power and skill. Some of the scenes were overwhelming. We were disappointed with the commencement, and, up to the end of the second act, failed to recognise the acknowledged great mistress of her art. From that point, however, Miss Cushman gained upon the audience, went on with increasing success through the remaining acts, and, at the termination, elicited a real enthusiasm. The last scene, when Bianca comes on deranged, and the death of the unhappy heroine, could hardly be surpassed in dramatic truth. Miss Cushman elaborates her dying scenes with surprising skill. The death of Bianca may be compared with that of Meg Merrilies, in Guy Mannering, one of the most remarkable exhibitions of the modern drama. We could point to other scenes of her Bianca, in which perhaps she manifested more consummate art; but we have said enough to show that Miss Cushman is still the grand actress we always considered her; and we welcome her back, with real satisfaction, as one of the greatest ornaments of the English stage.

Miss Cushman played Mrs. Haller in the Stranger on Wednesday, and seemed to please the audience even more than she did on Monday. We are of opinion, however, that Bianca is more suited to her daring and vigorous style than the other. Mr. G. Vandenhoff was excellent as the Stranger. We hope ere long to see that gentleman and Miss Cushman in one of Shakspere's tragedies.

Fazio was repeated last night.

Mr. Buckstone has at last obtained a trump card. It depends upon himself to play it to advantage. If genius count for anything, Miss Cushman ought to fill the Haymarket treasury.

Strand Theatre.—Mr. W. Allcroft has been very successful in filling his theatre during the holidays. A full house attended on Monday to witness the first representation of Der Freischütz. Considering the smallness of the stage, Weber's celebrated opera was remarkably well got up. Miss Rebecca Isaacs made a very prepossessing Agnes, and Miss Fanny Reeves in the character of Anna pleased unanimously. Mr. Glenville and Mr. H. Manley, were Caspar and Rodolph; and the other characters were all creditably performed. The pantomime continues its successful career, Flexmore, as usual, causing roars of laughter. He is the "clown of modern clowns."

Surrey.—Miss Clayton, a provincial actress, has been performing a series of characters here in genteel comedy and domestic drama. This week has witnessed her performance of Juliana in the Honeymoon to crowded houses. Miss Clayton is young, with an agreeable person, and a clear although not a powerful voice. Her reading was clever throughout. She has the fault of all provincial actors when they first come to London —a disposition to "o'erstep the modesty of nature," and to injure their best points by exaggeration. When time and a little more London experience shall have cured this defect, Miss Clayton promises to become an important acquisition to the theatre. Mr. Creswick's Duke Aranza and Mr. Shepherd's Rolando are things of established transpontine reputation.

PROVINCIAL.

Manchester.—(From our own correspondent.)—The fifth concert of the Classical Chamber Music Society had been announced for the 5th instant. The great snow-storm was then at its height—and Messrs. Sainton and Piatti—who were engaged, were arrested at Birmingham in consequence. M. Charles Hallé, receiving telegraphic communication to that effect, the concert was postponed to the 19th, when it took place as usual. The following was the programme:—

Part First—Trio (in E), Mozart; Grand Sonata—Pianoforte and violoncello (in G Minor, Op. 5, No. 2), Beethoven.

Part Second—Grand Trio (in E Flat, Op. 70, No. 2), Beethoven; Fantasia—Violin ("Norma"), Molique; Nocturne (in F Sharp, Op. 15), Chopin; Study (in D), Henselt; Caprice (in F Sharp Minor, Op. 5), Mendelssohn, (pianoforte solus.)

Executants—pianoforte, M. Charles Hallé; violin, Herr Molique; violoncello, Signor Piatti.

Mons. Sainton not being able to appear, in consequence of the change of day, Herr Molique took his place. We were glad to find that Hallé had reverted to his original plan of finishing with a selection of solo pieces for himself, in lieu of a long sonata, since by this means the performance was over at a quarter-past ten. Mozart's trio in E made a delightful opening. The second movement, Andante Grazioso, given with grace and delicacy, was much applauded. The finale, rondo allegro, was also greatly enjoyed. Beethoven's sonata was admirably played by M. Hallé and Signor Piatti. It was not, however, so well appreciated by the audience, to whom it is unfamiliar; nevertheless, it is one of the earliest and least elaborate works of the master. The trio, which began the second part, was perhaps never heard with more effect in Manchester. The playing of all three executants was perfect. Molique's wonderfully clear tone was heard to great advantage in the allegretto, the applause after which and the preceding movement was enthusiastic. The finale was a display for Hallé, of which he made good use. The whole trio indeed was a treat of a high order. Herr Molique then displayed his masterly execution with great effect in his own solo, which consisted of variations on the well-known march in Norma—and elicited hearty bursts of applause after the theme and each of the variations in succession. M. Hallé played the solo pieces of Chopin, Henselt, and Mendelssohn in a remarkable manner, and, as is usual with him, from memory. His reading of each was characteristic, without pretence, and his execution as unfailing as it was energetic. Henselt's Study was a striking performance; but this was eclipsed by Mendelssohn's extraordinary caprice—a regular moto perpetuo, which M. Hallé gave with an unflinching prestissimo, thus bringing this delightful concert to a close with éclat. Three more concerts will terminate the present series.

Ibid.—Saturday Evening Concerts.—Mozart's 12th Mass drew a large attendance on Saturday last, at the Mechanics' Institution. The solo parts were taken by Mrs. Tomkins, Mrs. Brooke, Messrs. J. H. Price, Thomas, and Smith. The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. Walker presided at the organ.—The Athenæum Saturday Afternoon Concerts were resumed last Saturday. Mozart's Jupiter Symphony was played, and the overture to Semiramide and Masaniello. Herr Grosse performed on the clarionet. The concerts are to be continued weekly.

Liverpool (Jan. 21).—The annual meeting of the proprietors of the Philharmonic-hall was held on Thursday week, at the Cotton Sale Rooms, Hardman Earle, Esq., in the chair. It was announced that the society was in the most prosperous condition. After the usual routine of business, a vote of thanks was passed to Wm. Sudlow, Esq., Hon. Sec., for his services to the society during the past year. With a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.—On Wednesday evening week, a lecture on "Congregational Music" was delivered in the Lecture-hall of the Mechanics' Institution, by Mr. H. A. Ewer. Several specimens of ancient sacred music were sung by the members of the Musical Association, accompanied on the organ by Mr. Rogers.

In describing the Public Hall, opened in Clayton-square by Mr. John White, it was stated that the orchestra would shortly be furnished with a large organ. The instrument, which has been built by our townsman, Mr. Jackson, is now all but complete, and is to be formally opened by Dr. Wesley, on the 23rd and 24th instant. Mr. Jackson has introduced several improvements. The stops, instead of being directly in front of the audience, are placed at an angle of forty-five degrees, and within easy distance of the fingers of the player. This contrivance was first applied by Mr. Jackson to the organ lately erected at Whitchurch: it is also to be used in the organ now being constructed for St. George's Hall. The action is as silent as that of a Broadwood piano, and free from metallic connexion. The following is the list of stops, &c.; the organ is a C:—Great Organ: 1, open diapason, of 8 feet metal; 2, stopped ditto, 8; 3, claribella, 8; 4, dulciana, 8; 5, principal, 4; 6, flute, 4; 7, fifteenth, 2; 8, sesquialtra, 3 ranks; 9, passaune, 8 feet; 10, clarionet, 8. Swell Organ: 1, double diapason, of 16 feet; 2, open ditto, 8; 3, stopped ditto, 8; 4, principal, 4; 5, fifteenth, 2; 6, cornopean, 8; 7, oboe. Pedal Organ and Copulæ: Grand open diapason, of 19 feet; swell to great; great to pedals; swell to pedals; super octave pedals.

Manchester.—On Thursday evening week, Handel's Messiah was performed in the Temperance-hall, under the auspices of the directors of the Mechanics' Institution. The oratorio was conducted by Mr. Robt. Weston, and the performers numbered about 50. The vocalists were, Miss Whitham, Mrs. Brooke, Mr. Bednal, and Mr. Mellor. The band was under the direction of Mr. C. A. Seymour. Principal trumpet, Mr.

Ellwood; drums, Mr. Connoly; harmonium, Mr. H. Walker. The hall was crowded.

GLOUCESTER.—Another death has just occurred in this town, which must be recorded in a musical journal. Mr. Needham, the well-known music-seller died, at the age of fifty-six, on Tuesday the 17th inst. He was highly respected, and will be much regretted by his friends and fellow-townsmen. His son, Mr. Joseph Needham, will continue to superintend the business.

BATH.—The "People's Concert" came off on Monday, the 16th inst., and was the most successful of the series. Nearly one thousand persons were present. The German Band was encored in every piece. Mrs. Darby and Mrs. Whittaker acquitted themselves well, and the gentleman amateurs lent good assistance.

FAVERSHAM.—Mr. William Parsons gave a lecture at the Public Rooms of the Literary and Scientific Institution on Monday week, on the works of Thomas Hood. Miss Wilson gave several songs, among them "It was the time of Roses" and "The Song of the Shirt." On Thursday week Mr. Parsons gave a lecture on the works of Thomas Moore. Miss Wilson again assisted him. The company was greater than on Monday. Mr. Parsons has been delivering the same lectures in Folkestone, Sittingbourne, and other parts of Kent.

MILTON.—On Wednesday week the Milton Harmonic Union gave their first concert in the National School Rooms, Milton.

BATH.—The fifth Concert for the People took place last Monday, the 23rd instant. The principal performers were Mrs. A. Whittaker, and Mrs. and Mr. Gibbs, assisted by a number of gentlemen amateurs. The German Band also played on the occasion. The concert was successful, and the room crowded.

WORCESTER.—An amateur concert was given at the Natural History Rooms on Tuesday, the 24th. Not only songs and duets were sung, and solos performed on various instruments, but chorusses and hymns were attempted, which involved more knowledge of the musical art than we are accustomed to find in the upper circles. We cannot particularise. The ladies and gentlemen who sang and played were Miss Chandos Pole, Miss Clifton, Miss Taunton, Miss Pepys, Mrs. Talbot, Mrs. H. Pidcock, Lady Georgiana Lyger, Mr. Wolley, Mr. H. Chandos Pole, Mr. Peel, Colonel Chester, and certain professionals who assisted. Mr. Done conductor, and Mr. J. John accompanied.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The Southampton Choral Society gave their Annual Concert on Tuesday evening last, when selections from Elijah, the Messiah, the Creation, Israel in Egypt, and Judas Maccabæus, were performed. The vocalists were Miss Stabbach, Messrs. Stanley, Meers, and Ingram. Miss Stabbach produced a great impression in "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and was encored. She was no less successful in "Hear ye, Israel," from Elijah, and in "O had I Jubal's lyre," was encored. Messrs. Stanley, Meers, and Ingram were good in their several parts. The concert passed off with spirit, and the attendance was respectable and numerous.

MR. THOMAS WILLIAMS' LECTURES ON VOCAL MUSIC.—On Wednesday evening Mr. Thomas Williams delivered his lecture on the "Modern Ballad Music of England and Germany," at the Camberwell Institute. In the vocal illustrations he was assisted by Misses B. Williams and Julia Bleaden. Mr. Williams conveys to his audience a clear idea of a composer's style, as well as of the general characteristics of a particular school of music. Mr. Williams in his lecture has borne in mind the well-known Horatian maxim, and affords a pleasing variety by alternating "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." The first part of the lecture is devoted to a comparison between the ballads of England and Germany, the juxtaposition of vocal illustrations of each school enabling the audience to appreciate the difference in their character and construction. The second part introduces amusing sketches of German-artist life, interpersed with lively songs incidental to the subjects. Miss B. Williams, who possesses a rich and full-toned mezzo-soprano voice, sang Spohr's "Rose, in thy charms," and Balfe's "Cantineer" with great taste and expression, and made a most favourable impression. Mr. Thomas Williams was warmly applauded for his delivery of "Non più andrai," and Miss Julia Bleaden proved successful in several of the light, ad-captandum songs of the day. The encores were numerous, and the entertainment throughout proved entirely successful.

MISS ROSETTA VINNING.

(To the Editor of the Musical World.)

SIR,—I am very sorry you should have omitted inserting Miss Lyne's name, in your account of the King's Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music; but I must certainly correct a mistake "A Student of the Academy" made in a letter to you. Miss Lyne was elected a King's Scholar for two years, and Miss R. Vinning re-elected for one year; therefore she is still King's Scholar. I need make no comment on Miss Vinning's talents, as they are sufficiently known.

A PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

MOVED by Antigone's appeal (and who could hear unmoved such eloquence as that with which her words are uttered?—each accent softened, yet enforced, each thought idealized, yet having its truth rendered more obvious by the musical accompaniment), the subservient Chorus (whose duty in the drama is, like that of a critic in the arts, to censure everything, and, doing nothing, stand exempt from censure; proving—what need of proof?—how it is easier to judge of others' actions than to act ourselves), relent in their severity against the wanderer and his daughter, and assure them of the monarch's kind reception, when he shall arrive.

A short, but a most exquisite fragment of soft music introduces Ismene, the other daughter of the exiled king. It is a wonderful faculty of art, thus, with a single thought, a thought how transient! to conjure up a whole train of feelings, of loving, gentle, exquisitely feminine, filial duty.

The heartful welcome of her father and her sister cordially received, Ismene hastens to explain the anxious errand that has brought her. Impatient of the regency of Creon, their mother's brother, the sons of Œdipus have risen to assert the royal power in Thebes; but in contention as to which of them should hold it, Eteocles, the younger, has prevailed, and Polynices, exiled, seeks in Argos such support as will empower him to reclaim his rights. Creon, supporting the younger brother's usurpation, comes to seek Œdipus. The Delphic Oracle has told that where his ashes rest that state must prosper, and Creon purposes to lead him back to Thebes, in order to propitiate the fortunes of the cause he serves. Ismene is here to warn her father of Creon's approach. Indignant at the wrongs he has endured, Œdipus curses the state, and curses his sons, who drove him forth a helpless outcast, depending on his daughters' love alone, not only for the sense of sight which he has lost, but for the means of life and for support to his feeble steps. He knows the destiny connected with his death, and he offers to Athens that succour which he denies his native land, claiming alone the present protection of the Coloniate elders and of the awful powers whose precincts they guard. The Chorus describe the ceremonial libations exacted by the virgin goddesses of the sacred grove, and Ismene goes to fulfil the rites necessary to obtain their sanction of the fugitives' presence.

II.

THE music is now resumed. This piece is, still more than the preceding, composed of declamatory dialogue. The dialogue is of even a more agitated and excited character than in the previous scene, and the music is, accordingly, still more broken in its effect; but, proving the utmost mastery in the composer, it is not less regular in its construction.

The first Strophe commences with the Chorus, unwilling to tear open again the wounds of his heart, urging a question upon Œdipus with reluctant courtesy. The deferential tone of the music is here admirably to the purpose, and the gradual ascent of the vocal phrases expresses the interrogative form of speech in so successful a manner as is most rarely attained in noted declamation. This expression is continued in the orchestra for the reply of Œdipus, which answers question by question, demanding what they would ask. They seek to know the nature of his terrible misfortune, and the more definite character of their response, and the keen sympathy which it implies, are rendered in this very poignant passage, in which the interrogative form, difficult indeed to maintain in musical phraseology, is still preserved:—

He claims, by the right of a guest, that they forbear to urge him; but they urge him the more, pressing that, as they honour his wish, he should concede to theirs—which kindly importunity is conveyed in this very beautiful passage:

It must be understood that the several voices of the Chorus enter successively in this, while the orchestra sustains the harmony, the last voices being brought in with the double-basses upon the inverted chord of E flat, which makes the truly exquisite modulation from the key of F, at the end of the second bar. We must notice also the peculiar effect of the transient F sharp, which single note has in it the deepest meaning. Encouragement and hope, hope rather implied than felt, and the respectful sympathy with sorrow are here embodied, and we must feel no less the musical beauty than the poetical expression of the phrase I have quoted.

We are thus brought back to the key of D minor, in which the piece commences, and so the opening subject is resumed for the Antistrophe. This is set to a repetition of the music of the Strophe, with such considerable modifications as are exacted by the declamation and the accentuation of the words. Œdipus answers that he has borne the worst of ills, but calls the gods to witness that he has been the unwilling, the unconscious agent of fate. His words are accompanied, a note to a syllable, by the phrases before assigned to the Chorus. The emphatic enunciation thus induced gives great earnestness to his speech, and the deferential reluctancy expressed by the music is quite pertinent to the feeling with which he may be supposed to utter it. The questions of the Chorus are renewed to the same phrases as before most speakingly rendered their interrogatories. Œdipus, by the destruction of the Sphinx, had rendered a signal service to the Thebans, for which they rewarded him with their crown; but they also imposed upon him the marriage with Jocasta, of the guilt of which he was then unconscious. The first passage quoted above, greatly enforced in its effect by some changes in the instrumentation, and by an alteration of the concluding phrase, renders, very powerfully, the appalled expression of the choral exclamation, "Ascendedst thou, as we heard, thy mother's polluted bed?" I must remark, especially, upon the peculiar poignancy with which the last three words are given, rendering this a point of the highest dramatic character. The Chorus extort from Œdipus, anguish-tongued, the admission that his sister-daughters are the offspring of this fatal marriage.

The second Strophe is marked by a change of movement. Becoming more and more excited by his fearful relation, the chorus urge Œdipus still further. His answer, rendered in the English version, "My woes are numberless, around my heart they cling!" is accompanied by a tremolo passage for the violins, the notes of which are sustained with them in unison by the clarionets, while the horns, at a wide interval from the acuter instruments, hold a pedal note. The singular transparency of this instrumentation would make the passage sufficiently prominent; but, the interest of the progressions, the harmony changing with every syllable of the speaker, and the living eloquence with which they endue the words, constitute the true beauty of the idea, of which the orchestral treatment is the colouring. The involuntary shuddering, the sense of cold that shivers through our whole frame when acute grief, or even its recollection, pierces our heart, as with a poisoned dart that spreads its venom, thought-quick, through our nature,—you who have felt this, recognise it with me in the passage now before us; you who have not, cast your loving sympathy upon the world; you have a grief to spare for others, having made no sad experience of your own.

The Antistrophe is again a recapitulation of the music appropriated to the relative portion of the poem. Œdipus is asked if he be not also guilty of his father's murder. His exclamation, "Ah, why do ye make the scar again a wound!" is set to the same passage that so beautifully illustrates his former ejaculation of anguish. This is now given, however, in fulfilment of the principles of musical design, in the original key of the piece—whereas, before, it appeared in the key of A minor, the fifth of the original tonic. Œdipus, living again his sufferings in their recital, owns himself the author of his father's death; but declares his moral innocence of the deed—since, having been first attacked and not knowing his assailant to be the king, not knowing the king to be his father, he slew him in self defence. It had been foretold, by the Delphic oracle, that the son of Laius and Jocasta would slay his father and would wed his mother; to avert which terrible destiny, the new-born infant had been conveyed to a strange land. Ignorant of his country and his parentage, Œdipus, the involuntary agent of the Gods, returned to Thebes to accomplish his fate.

It appears that by the arbitrary discretion of the composer, this and the other dialogue scenes are arranged in the form (analagous with that of the Odes) of Strophe and Antistrophe, by means of which, especially, the musical unity is preserved, and coherence of form and regularity of design are maintained, in the setting of passages that would seem to exact a treatment of the most free and fantasial character—such as is employed in those impassioned recitatives, those marvellous masterpieces of dramatic power, of Handel and of Mozart. I have before remarked upon the peculiar pertinency to the subject of this rigid observance of the unities of our art in Mendelssohn's illustration. And, now that we have examined, phrase by phrase, the manner in which this principle is carried out, we are, I think, in a condition to do justice, in our estimation of it, to the admirable ingenuity with which the composer has appropriated the text of the poem to the exigencies of his design, by finding parallelisms of expression in inconsequent passages, the purport of which not only submits to, but is very powerfully heightened and enforced by a repetition or a modification of the same musical phrases, and thus making one idea of Sophocles, metaphorically as it were, to reflect upon and illustrate another. In this way, the reserve with which the Chorus at first urge their inquiries upon Œdipus is shown to influence him, and justifying his own jealousy of his misfortunes, and supporting that respect for his sorrows which showing him that they should be proper to himself, and not common to the world, prompts him to secrete them. Again, the anticipation of the passage in which they, warming in his confidence, growing familiar with his woes, losing the diffidence imposed by his reserve, definitely demand, if the report be true that he consummated the fatal marriage—the anticipation of this passage, when they first press him to reveal the nature of his corroding, acute, mysterious grief—implies that inner foreboding of an unexpressed evil—the darkness of the soul that precedes the thunderbolt—which many a heart has proved and many a poet has acknowledged. Further, the chilling agony that forces from the grief-endowered exile the ejaculation, "My woes are numberless!" runs through his sense anew, intensified into a freezing horror, when the thought that the blood of Laius is upon his hands impels from him another cry of anguish. If to say thus much explains not my meaning, to become more prolix in words can be to add nothing to its clearness. Wherever the suggestion may take root it will yield a goodly flower, believe me. You, whose imagination is not fertile of such niceties, cast it away, sole worth of its worthlessness, and judge better, see deeper for yourselves.

Oh, for the conveniency of a Greek Chorus! We are given to understand that the history of Œdipus is a household tale through all the countries he has traversed; little children are affrighted by it, we may well suppose, as a nurse's legend; the people gossip over it; and the nations shudder at its ominous import; even the senate, the censuring inactivities that compose the Chorus, who do not ill because they do not anything, whose very evil would ennoble them in the scale of humanity by establishing their responsibility,—even the senate, who, it may be, like other senates, are the last to feel what all the world perceives and acknowledges,—even the senate appear to be perfectly well aware of all the circumstances and all the details of the circumstances of the case; and yet, for the benefit of the public—the enlightened Athenian public of the time, and whatever other public succeeding ages may awaken to an interest in the story,—disinterestedly for the sake of all publics, past, present, and to come, the Chorus enter into a severe cross-examination of the agonised hero, to the end that the dramatist may be properly comprehended in his development of the action that is consequent upon this history. Then, by one of those wonderful coincidences that never were natural beyond the sphere of the dramatic art, but which are indigenous to the Adelphi melodrama as to the Greek tragedy, at the precise period—full-stop, complete point, or however your grammarians may denominate it—when Œdipus has said all that he can say to be interesting, and when the cross-examination could proceed no further without being tedious—at that particular instant Theseus arrives, to find the labyrinthine story traced to its termination, the monster of suspense that feeds upon our sensibilities slain; while the Ariadne's clue, the old woman's spell perhaps, that helped to the accomplishment which fortuitously releases the poet's muse from her fetters, is the critical perspicuity of the coloniate senate, who penetratively perceive that for them to admit their knowledge of a notoriety it is necessary for all the world to exclaim against the tardiness of such admission. Forgive me, O classics, that I, ignorant, trespass on your sacred places! That which is time-honored is I know a "favorite corn" with many a more refined, a wiser, and a better man than myself; and I, clumsy, come blundering in the hobnailed shoes of literary unsophistication to tread upon your prejudices and present no panacea for the pang my heaviness imposes; and I the while have, doubtless, crotchets of my own (I am not speaking technically), that may be to others' estimation as remote from reason, as much a cobweb investiture of the principles of art, as is the Chorus in the Greek tragedy.

Appended to this second piece of music is a symphony for the entrance of Theseus, which has all the breadth and dignity, the tranquil majesty, the smiling power, that betoken the friendly aspect of the great monarch of a mighty and a peaceful people.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.

M. HECTOR BERLIOZ corrects an error which has been circulated in some of the papers relative to himself, in the following letter addressed to the director of the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris:—

"MY DEAR BRANDUS,—Several of the Paris papers announce my approaching departure for some town in Germany, where, according to them, I have been lately appointed maître-de-chapelle. I can easily imagine what a cruel blow my definite absence from France would be to a great many persons, and how difficult a task they would find it to believe and put into circulation so important a piece of news.

"I should, therefore, be extremely delighted were it in my power flatly to contradict it, by saying, with the hero of a celebrated drama—

"'Je te reste, France chérie, rassure toi!'

Respect for truth, however, obliges me to rectify a slight error in the report now current. The fact is, I am going to leave France some day or other, in a few years; but the orchestra confided to my direction is not in Germany; and, since everything becomes known, sooner or later, in this diabolical city of Paris, I may as well tell you at once the place of my future residence. I am appointed director-general of the concerts of the Queen of the Ovas in Madagascar. Her Ovaish Majesty's orchestra is composed of very distinguished Malay artists, and a few Malgalchees of the highest talent. They do not, it is true, like white men, and I should, consequently, have had, at first, to suffer a great deal in my new home, had not so many friends in Europe taken such trouble to paint me as black as possible. I hope, therefore, that I shall be thoroughly bronzed against the ill-will of my future comrades when I come among them. Meanwhile, be kind enough to inform your readers that I shall continue to reside in Paris as much as I can, and to go to the theatres as little as I can, although I certainly shall go sometimes, and perform my duty as critic as much as ever—in fact more than ever. I am determined before I go to have my fling in the way of criticisms, since there are no papers in Madagascar.

"Believe me, etc.,

"H. BERLIOZ,

"Librarian of the Conservatoire."

We congratulate Hector Berlioz on his appointment. He will doubtless find some new and curious instruments to add to his already unprecedented scores.

QUARTET CONCERTS, CROSBY HALL.—The second of Mr. Dando's annual series of six, took place on Monday. Miss Helen Taylor was the vocalist, and Mr. William Dorrell was at the pianoforte. We were too late for Haydn's quartet (No. 19), as also for Cimarosa's "Deh parlate." Beethoven's pianoforte trio (No. 2 of Op. 1) was a special feature in the concert, and was finely executed. Spohr's quartet in E minor (No. 45) was also well played. Mendelssohn's magnificent quartet in E flat (his last and one of his most celebrated) had full justice done to it in the performance. Mr. Dorrell played a selection of pianoforte pieces, of which R. Schumann's (No. 4) was the most sentimental, Macfarren's "Welcome" the most sparkling, and Potter's "Etude," from Op. 15, the most difficult and showy. Miss Helen Taylor sang two songs in the second act—Marras' "S'io fossi un angelo," and Molique's "If o'er the boundless sky."

MISS ADELA MERLET was married on Tuesday last to Monsieur A. Carron, of Rouen, France. She will abandon the musical profession.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER V.

1769–1771.

MOZART had now visited Munich, Vienna, Paris, London, Holland and Switzerland, but never having been in Italy, had seen nothing. At that period, it was absolutely necessary for every composer to make a journey to Italy, while, at the present day, it depends altogether upon his taste and the amount of curiosity he may happen to possess. Then, too, Italy gave the tone in all works of art, and especially in music, to the whole world. It was there this daughter of Heaven was born upon the altars of Christianity, and, under their creative influence, was developed in the twofold character of melody and harmony, as unknown to the old and profane world as, in our times, to all non-Christian nations. For a while the Belgians took the lead, but, in the middle of the sixteenth century, the Italians went beyond them, thanks to Palestrina, from whose works we may date the origin of music, formed to captivate both heart and ear, and which was substituted for the Greek theories and combinations only calculated for reflection and the senses, though often genial and profound. Opera, which also soon afterwards had to thank Italy for its birth and the state of perfection it attained, tended to consolidate the musical superiority of that nation. France and England alone made any pretensions to a national lyric theatre. But what a theatre! in France nothing was to be heard but Lully and Rameau, Rameau and Lully, melancholy psalmody, and insipid cadences executed by grating voices incapable of screeching loud enough for their auditors, whose ears were of horn;† in England nothing more than a few national melodies. The rest of Europe was acquainted with no opera but the Italian. A great number of eminent Italian dramatic composers followed one another, generation after generation, as regularly as ordinary men. Numerous conservatories, fostering talent of every description, supplied the whole world with maestri and singers. There it was that the singers destined for the Papal chapel, and so renowned for a pure and masterly execution, unequalled in the world, were educated. Under the dome of St. Peter were preserved the manuscript treasures of the elder masters, which were not shown to any one, at which the uninitiated were forbidden even to look, and which were only performed once a year—in Passion Week.‡

I have already said that the triumphs of Italian operatic composers entirely threw into the shade all that either equalled or surpassed them in merit. The barbarians, who had snatched from Italy the empire of the world, were now beginning to dispute her superiority in music. They had already shewn what they could do, in the persons of Handel, Bach, Gluck, and Haydn. The world, however, had not yet spoken out in favour of men for whom so long a future was in store, but clung to the heroes of the day who at that period were preferred in Europe. Handel's fame was shut in on all sides by the ocean. Sebastian Bach, the most unpopular of all masters of the style he especially preferred,—a style that from its very nature is inaccessible and leaves the great mass of the public unmoved—counted only a very small number of the initiated among his admirers. Europe scarcely knew his name. Gluck, a much greater celebrity among his contemporaries than Bach, first gained his reputation in France; whither, however, he had not yet transplanted and naturalized the true musical tragedy which he created, and of which he gave the first specimen in Vienna in the year 1768. In fact, such was the opinion held by the critics of the age, that, even in France, where Gluck had some perfectly fanatical disciples, people looked on at the contest between himself and Piccini, without daring to say which of the two would carry off the victory. In both camps was the Te Deum performed, and we must not conceal the fact that the most influential votes were given in favour of Piccini! I am, however, of opinion that another and very natural cause had the greatest share in weakening the blow which Gluck's works were destined, sooner or later, to give the old Italian school. Dilettanti interest themselves much more for the music than for the drama, and, at all times, have been more capable of criticising the performance than the composition of an opera. Gluck employed German or French singers; and the difference between them and the Italian artists, whose talents often gave weight to the mediocre music of their composers, must have appeared extremely great. At that time, the Italians alone knew how to sing. We must not, therefore, be astounded, that, long before and very long after Gluck, amateurs invariably asserted throughout Europe, that beyond the pale of Italian music there was no salvation.

Joseph Haydn, the predecessor as well as the most famous successor of our hero, might, without doubt, be reckoned the greatest instrumental composer in the world up to the year 1768, the period which our narration has now reached. When, however, we recollect that in Haydn's day instrumental music, in all that regards its loftier signification, was still in its infancy, this is not saying much. We must not overlook the fact that, in Haydn's countless productions, there are two totally different epochs. For the moment, our business is only with the Haydn before Mozart, the composer of the first quartets and the first symphonies, which are no longer played, essays, however worthy of admiration in their time, by no means precluding the belief that the symphony would eventually take its place side by side with the opera.

Between this Haydn and the author of the Creation, there was, as we see, a great gulf. It was necessary that the way leading from one to the other should traverse the classical period of Mozart.

To conclude: the great composers above mentioned as well as some few other very clever artists, esteemed even at the present day, were scattered throughout Germany, and exercised only a very limited influence, for which they had to thank their genius alone, and which required the more time to develope, since it had to begin by effecting a total change in men's views and a still more decided reform in the art of musical composition. In Italy, on the contrary, the musical world formed a serried phalanx, a compact and homogeneous mass, agreed as to its principles, intolerant, and swamping everything, sending its apostles and missionaries to all quarters of the globe, and causing its doctrines to be promulgated with irresistible superiority and power, inasmuch as it possessed the monopoly of song. From this rapid glance at the position of the musical world about the year 1769, our readers will instantly understand why musicians from all parts of Europe flocked to Italy. They were all certain of being received as by a common mother. She sometimes even preferred foreigners to the most celebrated of her own children, felt pride in their triumphs and affectionately adopted them; but this, naturally, was only when they came to learn and not to teach, and after they had sufficiently profited by their studies to compose in the purest Italian style. Handel and Gluck were among those who had gained their knightly spurs in Italy, and, like all the rest, paid her their first tribute of imitation, the most flattering mark of respect that could be shown her, but which, it is true, she sternly demanded. Woe to the musician who should have endeavoured to maintain barbarous, which meant foreign, doctrines. Like poor Jomelli, he would have been hunted to death with anathemas and hisses. But what honied words, what kindness, what laurels and triumphs, on the other hand, awaited those tractable disciples who remained steady to their musical orthodoxy. What flattering and honourable epithets recompensed the foreigners who had the honour of obtaining letters of naturalization. "Hasse, il caro Sassone," "Amadeo Mozart, il cavaliere filarmonico!" Was not this honour calculated to outweigh every other consideration in the mind of a musician?

At a subsequent period, our hero gave his adopted mother cause to regret bitterly the affection she had shown him in his childhood, but which, at the moment we refer to, it was his business to gain. Leopold Mozart had long entertained the idea of making a journey to Italy in order to complete his son's education and fix his reputation upon a solid and lasting basis. Father and son returned, therefore, to Salzburg, plunged up to the ears into the study of counterpoint and the Italian language, and, finally, at the expiration of a year spent in retirement — when they thought themselves sufficiently prepared to appear before the supreme court in Bologna, of which Father Martini was president—resolved to set out. This time, Mozart's mother and sister remained behind. Before his departure, Wolfgang was appointed concertmeister in the archiepiscopal orchestra, which shows that even then he must have played the violin tolerably well. We shall speak, at some future time, of the salary he received.

We pass over the particulars of their progress during this first journey in Italy, which lasted eighteen months. Were we to reiterate results and manifestations of astonishment, such as we have already described, we should impart to our narrative an amount of monotony for which the details could not compensate. Travelling artists, wherever they go, do pretty much the same things. Visits, invitations, musical evenings, arrangement of concerts, distribution of tickets, acknowledgment of presents, and pocketing of good or bad receipts — these are the axes round which their whole existence revolves in a circle ending at the gates of one city to recommence at those of the next. The only difference consists in the names of places and individuals. The journey of which we are now speaking forms certainly an exception, and is of the highest interest, but simply because the traveller himself was an exception and stood completely alone. This, however, is another reason why we should only mention interesting details and characteristic actions, disclosing facts without precedent or example, peculiar to the history of Mozart, foreign to that of virtuosi in general, and opening to view a new and unexplored country.

The Italians are very extravagant in the manifestation of enthusiasm, which, with them, proceeds from the heart. Never before had our hero experienced so genuine a welcome, so unanimous a feeling of good-will, so instant a recognition and such a succession of friends and patrons, coming forward so spontaneously, and appearing to have no other business to transact but his, in every town he visited.

Scarcely had Mozart set foot on Italian ground, when he received that acknowledgment of his talent so obstinately denied him in Vienna. The manager of the theatre at Milan immediately ordered him to write an opera for production during the next Carnival. As our maestro had still, however, seven or eight months at his disposal, he employed them in visiting the capitals of the peninsula, proceeding first to Bologna, the residence of the most learned contrapuntists, at the head of whom was the famous Father Martini, the musical oracle of his day. At Parma, our travellers made the acquaintance of Signora Agujari or Ajugari, surnamed Bastardella. They had heard of this vocal prodigy, without altogether believing what they heard; the Signora, however, invited them to dinner, and politely seized the opportunity of dispelling their doubts. She sang various airs, several passages of which Wolfgang communicated in a letter to Nannerl. I should not be forgiven were I to withhold this fragment from the curiosity of my readers, and especially of such of my lady readers as sing. I, therefore, give it as it was preserved by Mozart:—

In all probability, such another voice as this, both in the upper and lower registers, never existed in the world. It reached, as we see, a whole octave above the compass of the soprano. The notes of this high octave, says Leopold Mozart, were somewhat weaker than the others, but sounded like an organ, soft and beautiful.

The Areopagus which awaited our hero was, like that of Athens, inaccessible to the seductive voice of persuasion. Not the dazzling powers of perfect virtuosoship, the talent of extempore playing, nor the most admirable readiness in reading scores, was sufficient to satisfy these severe judges, whose jurisdiction began where that of the public necessarily ended. Mozart had, therefore, no reason to complain that he was treated like a mere scholar by those who examined him. On the contrary, they seemed to say, "You announce yourself as a prodigy, and we are well aware that you play the pianoforte well, that you extemporise by no means badly, and that you can read music with tolerable quickness. It is even reported that you are about to write an opera for the theatre in Milan. This is a great deal for one of your age, but it only concerns the public, with whom we have nothing to do. As you choose to appear before our tribunal, you must not feel affronted if we require you to justify, by proofs which come within our jurisdiction, your claim to be considered a prodigy." Hereupon an anthem was given him from the antiphonarium, to set for four voices. Mozart accomplished the task in so masterly a manner and in so short a time that he gained the greatest applause from his judges, and made old Father Martini his friend for ever. A few months afterwards, he was unanimously elected a member of the Philharmonic Society.

In Bologna, Wolfgang made the acquaintance of a celebrated singer, the Chevalier Broschi, surnamed Farinelli, from whom he received an invitation, and whose career and history were, in their way, as extraordinary as his talent. As a singer and physician, he cured the insanity of a monarch—Philip V., king of Spain; as a singer and prime minister, he ruled Spain with an amount of wisdom that did him honour: he procured pensions for his calumniators, and portioned the maiden who pretended that he—the poor soprano!—had made her a mother! At length, when the wind shifted at court, Farinelli resigned his power with as much calmness as he had manifested moderation while he possessed it, returned with an immense fortune to the land of his birth, and took up his residence in a magnificent villa, which he had built in the vicinity of Bologna. It was he who urged Father Martini to write a history of music, and furnished him with the means, by making him a present of a musical library—the most extensive in Europe. It contained 7000 printed works and 300 manuscripts, which had been collected at Farinelli's own cost.

There is something touching in the meeting of two such persons as Farinelli and Mozart, each the most eminent representative of the art he professed. They came together like the twilight of evening and the rosy hues of dawn, on a mild summer's night; the one scarcely a youth; the other already at the decline of a career of which literature is proud, and in which music, the drama, and even politics claim an honourable share, in the possession of the gifts of fortune, loaded with distinctions of every description, and enjoying the otium cum dignitate, which in all respects he amply merited.

LINDPAINTNER.—This famous conductor and composer has been re-engaged by Dr. Wylde for the forthcoming concerts of the New Philharmonic Society. Herr Lindpaintner is expected to arrive in London on the 19th of March. In securing the services of this eminent musician the society has displayed a sagacity not unusual to its system of management.

THE ENGLISH OPERA.—We have just been informed that Mr. Case has signed an agreement with Mr. Allcroft for the Lyceum; so that, after all, there is a probability we shall have an English opera this season. Mr. Case takes with him to the Lyceum, as we learn, the entire operatic force he had engaged for Drury Lane. In the meanwhile, he does not forego his right to Drury Lane, but continues to prosecute his claim by legal means. Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves will arrive in town next week, when everything will be definitively arranged.

ORIGIN OF THE "LADY OF LYONS."—Mr. Macready had just undertaken the management of Covent Garden, with the design of restoring the English Drama. One evening, the manager said to Bulwer, "Oh! if I could get a play like the Honeymoon!" In less than a fortnight from that evening, the Lady of Lyons was written, and in Mr. Macready's hands. The play was produced without the name of the author. On the first night of its performance, Bulwer was speaking in the House of Commons, and entered the theatre just in time to see the curtain drop amidst the rapturous applause of the audience.—Dublin Commercial Journal and Family Herald.

MENDELSSOHN.

Ludwig Berger, then, had planted the youthful sapling; Zelter had dug about and fenced it against the adverse wind and storm, which, if they raged against it, seemed only to make the roots strike deeper. But another was wanted, one who, like a head gardener, should protect the tender buds from blight and frost, and present the first fruits of such a tree to the anxious world. In the year 1824, Moscheles was prevailed upon to accept this responsible office. I cannot refrain from paying my humble tribute of praise to one who, to this day, is honoured among the circle of the best and greatest musicians of the time, though such a tribute is comparatively worthless at my hands, when I remember that Felix himself constantly acknowledged his obligations to him. Moscheles has allowed me to quote from his own diary some characteristic remarks on Mondelssohn. "In the autumn of 1824, I gave my first concerts in Berlin. I then became acquainted with Mendelssohn's family, and soon my visits ripened into intimacy. As I called every day at the house, I soon learned to know and love their wonderful boy Felix. At this time, his youthful studies were a safe guarantee of a splendid future. His parents repeatedly asked me to give him lessons on the pianoforte, and, although his earlier master, Ludwig Berger, had agreed to the proposal, I hesitated at first to undertake so serious a charge, and to direct so decided a genius, thinking I might possibly cause him to go astray from a path which his own intuitive power might have pointed out to him as the one he should walk in. But father and mother grew importunate; I gave in, and commenced a course of lessons forthwith. Felix played at that time anything I myself could execute, and mastered, with wonderful rapidity, all such improvements as I could suggest. My concerto in E major, he played from the manuscript almost at first sight; and I remember how admirably he rendered the Sonata Mélancolique." These papers of Moscheles go on to show us an interesting view of the domestic life of the Mendelssohns, whose house was the constant resort of the best musicians of the place. On the 14th of November in the same year, we read of Moscheles, accepting an invitation to a party given in honour of Fanny Mendelssohn's birthday. A symphony by her brother Felix was first given, followed by Mozart's concerto in C minor, and a pianoforte duet, played by the author and his sister. Zelter, and several members of the Royal Chapel choir, were present. Another performance took place on the 28th of the same month, when Mendelssohn's symphony in D major,* his quartet in C minor, and a concerto of Sebastian Bach's, made up the programme. On the 5th of December, the anniversary of Mozart's funeral was solemnized, the Privy Councillor (Geheimrath), Crelle, delivered an oration, and the requiem was afterwards given entirely, Mendelssohn himself accompanying on the pianoforte. On the 12th of December, Felix assisted in his own quartet in F minor, and Moscheles in the now celebrated "Hommage à Handel." On the following day, Moscheles presented him with an "Allegro di bravura," which he played at first sight.

Soon after this month, if I mistake not, Moscheles left for England, but we find him again at Berlin on the 14th of November, 1826. The 19th of this month must be marked as a red letter day in the period of Mendelssohn's career of which we are now treating. For the first time he produced the overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream as a duet for the pianoforte. His sister assisted him in the trial of a work which bore the unmistakeable marks of genius, and helped as much as any one composition to give him an enduring name. On the 23rd of November, Moscheles published the first number of his Studies, and, about the same time, a symphony of Mendelssohn's appeared, in which the leading idea was expressed by trumpet accompaniments. This was followed by a capriccio, to which, in a jovial spirit, he gave the name of "Absurdité." We shall offer no apology for details, dry and uninteresting as they may appear to the ordinary reader. The lives of great men are doubly valuable to the world they leave behind them, if their just celebrity, which is patent to all, be not marred by the recollection of moral and domestic duty forgotten and abandoned in the pursuit of fame. The great musician is, after all, scarce worthy the name of artist, if his powers be mainly directed to the achievement of popularity at the expense and sacrifice of a genuine love of his art, which should not yield to the caprice and questionable judgment of would-be critics and connoisseurs. It is that disinterested love of the beautiful and good that actuated Mendelssohn in his short and brilliant career, that elasticity of mind which raised him above prejudices so common to the ordinary run of artists, which claim for their owner so high a place in the ranks of the greatest men of the present day; and the smallest facts connected with such an artist are not to be passed over as unimportant, if they help to form a more complete picture of the man.

It will be seen from the short extracts of Moscheles' diary that the musical world found a genial atmosphere in the house of Mendelssohn's parents. This must have materially aided the progress and activity of Felix, who so often enriched the programme with his own compositions; and it is but fair to add that the influence of Moscheles at this time, his judicious training and encouragement, contributed in no small degree to the elegance and aplomb of Felix's playing, which were his peculiar gifts and rewards for early availing himself of Moscheles' tuition. But the master soon changed into the close friend; age and experience of the world were generously devoted to furthering the fame of one hitherto little known, save among a select few in his own country; and it was Moscheles who first introduced Felix to a discerning public, by persuading him to come to London. It has been said with truth that Germany did not acknowledge the greatness of her son, until England had first welcomed him and sounded his praises. I am sure that before this time, he was not recognised as anything extraordinary, either in Hamburgh, where he was born, or in Berlin, the scene of his later triumphs. It is difficult to suggest reasons and excuses for Germany's being so dull of hearing. Beethoven, the intellectual giant, the Michael Angelo of music, was still alive; the author of Der Freischütz was in the full blaze of celebrity. Were not these absorbing influences? We only throw it out by way of a suggestion. But this is certain, that Moscheles warmly encouraged his pupil, whose courage never failed him under the cheering auspices of his friend, and Felix never forgot the kind words spoken to him, then an ardent and youthful but comparatively unknown artist. "You were always" (he writes to Moscheles) "my hearty supporter and well wisher,

* The translator makes it "symphony in D sharp." Now such a key would not be likely to be used, and in all probability D dur (D major) is intended. Of this symphony, however (unless it should be the famous "Reformation Symphony," so ill-advisedly suppressed), we have no information. How interesting would it be to the lovers of Mendelssohn's genius, if the MS. still exists, to see the work in print.—Ed.

at a time, too, when the Dii minorum gentium used to make faces at me." It is almost needless for us to state that Felix was welcomed in England by his friend and master, and we shall find that their introduction to each other at Berlin laid the foundation of a firm friendship honourable to both.

In the earlier years of his manhood, Felix was not so absorbed in the study of his favourite pursuit as to deny himself the pleasures and recreations common to youths of his age and standing. As a lad of seventeen, he was known for his activity; he rode well, and was an excellent swimmer. We are now speaking of him in the year 1827, as a young student in the University of Berlin. Zelter gives amusing stories of Hegel, one of the lecturers of whose instruction Felix availed himself, but whose oddity and peculiar style formed an incessant subject of Mendelssohn's mimicry. In the February of this year, he conducted some of his latest compositions at Stettin; and shortly afterwards the members of the Berlin Academy entrusted him with the direction of Bach's Passion Music. It had originally been one of his studies under Zelter; but even allowing this previous insight into a work of such difficulty, we are not the less astonished at the fact of a young man of twenty conducting successfully this complicated music. The performance seems to have more than answered popular expectation, for it was repeated by general desire shortly afterwards. Moscheles advised the elder Mendelssohn to send his son abroad on the completion of his university studies; and Felix, after his college life in the spring of 1829, became gradually more independent of parental surveillance. Before, however, we follow the traveller on his journeys, let us take a brief glance at what has already passed, and we shall find that the number and excellence of his works up to this period amply testify his activity and progress. He had written three quartets, two sonatas, two symphonies, an overture, several operettas (among them Die Hochzeit des Camacho, which has been preserved), two volumes of songs, and, to crown all, the noble overtures to A Midsummer Night's Dream and The Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage. These last two works, we are told, were composed within a short time of each other. If it be true that he wrote the latter work, so exquisitely descriptive and powerful of its kind, before he had ever seen the sea, we must allow him a fancy as vivid as that of Schiller, who painted so faithfully the Alpine scenery in his William Tell, scenery which had been present only to the keen eye of his imagination.* How intense is the anxiety of the crew at the protracted calm, followed by the joyous welcome of the breeze and safe return of the ship to harbour. We almost feel on board ourselves. To inflict a catalogue of Mendelssohn's other pieces on our readers would be unfair.† They will agree with us already that he worked zealously, and that versatile and productive are not lying epithets when attached to the name of this gifted composer.

* Walter Scott, who in his Anne of Geierstein, and Quentin Durward exhibited a fancy no less remarkable in painting scenes that he had never witnessed, might have been cited with equal reason.—Ed.

† We could have easily supported the infliction, and our readers too. It is especially in the minute description of those early compositions of Mendelssohn, every one of which must possess a deep interest for the lovers of music, that we find this biography deficient—although in other respects so engrossing and so much more comprehensive than anything else that has been written about Mendelssohn.—Ed.

Messrs. Wessel and Co. announce that an interesting publication will shortly appear, entitled Mélodies Gracieuses—six duettinos for two performers on the pianoforte, composed by J. Baptiste Calkin.

MR. AGUILAR'S SOIRÉES.

Mr. Aguilar's second performance of classical and modern pianoforte music took place at his residence, on Saturday evening, before a fashionable and appreciating audience. The programme was exceedingly interesting. Mr. Aguilar only played one composition of his own—a caprice, (op. 12) which was admirably executed and generally admired. The Sonata Apassionata of Beethoven (Op. 57, in F minor), was the great feature of the programme. Mr. Aguilar's execution of this remarkable work was essentially intellectual; he showed that he understood his author, and could convey his own impressions to his audience. The magnificent prelude and fugue in B minor (from the set of "six preludes and fugues") by Mendelssohn, a song without words (No. 1, Book 5), the fanciful and difficult Presto Scherzando, in F sharp minor, of the same composer, and two charming pieces by Sterndale Bennett—Geneviève and Rondo Piacevole—made up the list of solo pieces, all of which were given by Mr. Aguilar in the true style of the authors—although we should have preferred the Rondo Piacevole a little faster, as Mr. Bennett, for example, himself plays it.

Mr. Jansa, one of our best and most conscientious resident foreign violinists, assisted Mr. Aguilar in a sonata (Mozart's in B flat, for piano and violin), and played two clever impromptus of his own (Nocturne and Toccata) with great neatness and dexterity. Miss Messent was the vocalist, and gave equal satisfaction by the manner in which she sang the fine recitative and air of Mozart, "Zeffiretti Lusinghieri" (Idomeneo), and a very pleasant serenade by Mr. Alfred Mellon, set to Shelley's beautiful words, "I arise from dreams of thee." We cannot forgive the Director of the Orchestral Union, however, for altering the third verse of the immortal poet. Shelley begins with these lines—which Mr. Mellon alters into

"O, lift me from the grass,"

"Oh! take my last fond sigh"—

for reasons which we call upon him to state.

Mr. Aguilar himself accompanied Miss Messent and Mr. Jansa on the pianoforte. The concert was both instructive and agreeable.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The last concert was given by the Directors for the benefit of the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital. It was entitled a "Night with Beethoven and Mozart." The first part was entirely devoted to selections from these two masters: and the second part was of the usual miscellaneous kind. The vocalists were Madame Newton Frodsham, Miss Grace Alleyne, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Miss Fanny Ternan, and Messrs. Augustus Braham and Lawler, and Signor F. Lablache; the instrumentalists, Miss Ellen Day (piano), Mademoiselle Louise Christine (harp), and Mr. Horatio Chipp (violoncello). Mdlle. Rita Favanti was to have appeared, but was prevented by indisposition. Miss Ellen Day has decided talent, and on Wednesday night pleased her Exeter Hall auditors even more than at her first performance. Mdlle. Louise Christine is a good harpist; and there is a peculiar charm about her playing, which, were it even less mechanically correct, would pass muster with a larger and mixed audience. Mdlle. Christine has already become a favourite with the habitués of the Wednesday Evening Concerts. The other artists acquitted themselves with their usual ability.

With a word of strong praise to Mr. Augustus Braham, who sang admirably, we conclude our notice of the benefit concert on Wednesday last, which, in point of attraction, was one of the best of the present season.

Madame Jenny Lind Goldchsmidt has changed her determination. Instead of visiting England this spring, as she intended, she will remain at Dresden, and await the issue of the wars. She is perhaps wise; since, however sweet the voice of the Nightingale, it must needs be drowned in that of the cannon. The spring of 1855, when Europe shall be Cossack or Republican, may afford the enchanting Swede a more peaceable opportunity.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

KING'S SCHOLARSHIPS.—We have no doubt about the truth of what our correspondent, "A Professor and an old Student," asserts; but we cannot afford room for any more letters on the subject.

Mr. ANDREW PARK.—Received, with thanks, and declined with regret.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—It is stated that this theatre will open on the 21st of March, and that Alboni and Lablache are engaged.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4TH, 1854.

WHAT kind of a musical season shall we have? The time is ripe for considering the question. Nevertheless, although future events have as yet cast no shadows before, everything is in darkness. The query, as to whether we are to possess two Italian operas this year, is answered by a counter-query, as to whether we are to possess one. Mr. Lumley would appear to be wholly absorbed in actions at law against Mr. Gye—in re Johanna Wagner—and Mr. Gye to have nothing else to do than to defend them. And all this for a lady about whom opinions very much differ. The most that is positively known is that Grisi and Mario have once more signed with the director of the Royal Italian Opera. Grisi and Mario are great facts, there is no doubt; but they cannot make an opera of themselves. Of the other artists, except Ronconi, who, we believe, renewed his engagement with Mr. Gye last year, nothing can be stated with certainty. Are we to have Alboni? Are we to have Cruvelli? Alboni asks £80 a night, and gets as much at the Italian Opera in Paris. Cruvelli is imprisoned in the "Grand Opera," and cannot go forth during the London season. There are, therefore, strong reasons why we should be deprived of both these celebrated songstresses, and once more submit to an apology for a contralto (a very pretty one, it must be allowed, if the charming mezzo-soprano, Nantier Didiée, reappears); and why we should be satisfied with only one purely dramatic soprano, in the person of the never unwelcome Grisi. What prevents Mr. Lumley from coming boldly into the field is the law of partnership, one of the greatest and most unjust drawbacks upon every kind of wholesome speculation in this country. Were it not for this, Mr. Lumley could get £100,000 sterling for the asking, and set to work again with the ancient energy. But a man who may be willing to risk from £1,000 to £5,000 is not necessarily inclined to risk £100,000, and perhaps more; and thus, as far as Her Majesty's Theatre is concerned, it is to be feared that another year will pass away without fruits; since it is more than probable that no other than Mr. Lumley can open the doors of that venerable establishment to the public, however so inclined.

If the horizon of Italian opera is gloomy that of English opera is gloomier. But lately, Mr. George Case was to open Drury Lane Theatre, with Clara Novello and Sims Reeves. New operas by Macfarren, Frank Mori, etc., were confidently talked of; and in the spring all was to be sunshine. What is the picture now? Mr. Smith, who gives loaves and fishes to the poor (instead of actors to the public), has repudiated his treaty with Mr. Case; and Mr. Case has brought an action for non-fulfilment thereof, before the time fixed for the fulfilment—a palpable mistake, for how can Mr. Case prove that, when the time comes, Mr. Smith will condescend to shirk his engagement? On the other hand, Mr. Smith, who gives loaves and fishes (instead of actors), rests his hopes upon Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke (G. V. B. as he is familiarly advertised by the side of the placards which abuse Douglas Jerrold instead of Horace Mayhew, the real offender)—upon Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke, who, emulating the gift of loaves and fishes to the cockney paupers, distributes blankets to the bumpkins in the provinces—blankets to the bumpkins!

Upon G. V. B. the Drury Lane manager rests his hopes; and as, according to the unquestionable authority of The Field, Mr. Smith has exhibited a receipt for £4000, one year's rent—a thing unprecedented in the modern annals of the establishment—the honourable committee of Drury Lane, and the shareholders who eagerly clutched a dividend of sixty shillings on the occasion, prefer Mr. Smith to any one else, and, preferring Mr. Smith, must be pleased to prefer Mr. G. V. B. So, while Mr. G. V. B. continues to mouth and rant, in defiance of rhyme, reason, and scanning, to enormously packed houses, there is no chance for English opera at Drury Lane Theatre, unless Mr. Jarrett comes to the rescue, with his German company. Shades of Garrick and of Kean, etc.!

Our concerts on the grand scale afford better hopes. The Philharmonic Society, patronised by the Queen, and directed by Mr. Costa—who has no time for rehearsing Elijah at Exeter Hall—is pretty sure to go on as usual in Hanover Square. Among the novelties will doubtless be something from the misty brain of Richard Wagner. The New Philharmonic Society is still alive and undaunted. It brags not, like Dogberry, of its losses; but puts up with them in a spirited manner—"sing-ging" (as Robson would say) to the tune of "A good time coming." This society, which has given the finest orchestral performances ever heard in London, has announced its intention of removing from Exeter Hall to St. Martin's Hall, a resolution which meets with our hearty concurrence. The music-room built by Mr. Hullah is beyond comparison the better of the two—indeed the best in London—and the effect of the New Philharmonic band there can hardly fail to be unprecedented. Lindpaintner is re-engaged, new and comparatively unknown works of interest and importance are to be produced, and there is little doubt that the New Philharmonic Society will maintain its reputation.

Of the Sacred and London Sacred Harmonic Societies, with their Mr. Costa and their Mr. Surman, of the Harmonic Union, with its Benedict, of the Hullah Concerts at St. Martin's Hall, and the Wednesday Evening Concerts at Exeter Hall, we need say nothing more than that they will branch out into the very heart of the season, and mingle harmoniously with the Operas and Philharmonics. The Chamber-Concerts of Sterndale Bennett, Alexander Billet, Lindsay Sloper, etc., will again shortly plunge us into the vortex of sonatas, fugues, and preludes; while the minstrels of the glee and madrigal will cheerfully persist in their four-part monotony. Mr. Ella's Musical Winter Evenings will once more play the avant-coureur to the Musical Union, as Prince Menschikoff the Supercilious, to the Czar; and, unless the Quartet Association can, like the Turks, summon an Omar Pasha to their aid—in the form of some great and undaunted artist, to whom the director of the Musical Union, like Austria, would never allow more than a cadetship—MM. Sainton, Cooper, Hill, and Piatti, being, like the Ottoman Porte, unfurnished with the countenance of Prince Albert, must be compelled to look abroad for strength and fortification.

Of the benefit-concerts we need say nothing. They can say for themselves as much as they will, and enough for their customers. Of the Orchestral Union with Alfred Mellon at its head, we should like to say, as we are led to expect, a great deal; but we have not space at disposal.

To the great foreign virtuosi who intend to pay us a visit this season, we should willingly offer homage; but, up to the present moment, we are not acquainted with their names. Of one only are we sure; and that one, Ernst, is too well known and esteemed in this country to need any special recommendation.

What kind of a musical season we shall have, therefore—as may be gathered from what has been said—is at present an enigma which time only can unravel. We trust and hope it may be a good one—even though, in the Black Sea, there be a collision between the fleets of France and England and of Russia, of Freedom and Slavery, of Right and Wrong. Etc., etc.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"Pedal Exercises," for the organ. W. T. Best (Op. 26). "Twenty-four Studies," for the organ (Op. 28). Ibid.—R. Cocks and Co.

Mr. Best is one of our first authorities on all that concerns organ playing, and the above elementary publications derive additional interest on that account, independently of their musical merits. In a short preface to the first work, the author alludes to the difficulties connected with the use of the pedal—difficulties which a careful study of the rules, and practice of the exercises by which he has illustrated them, are more than likely to enable the young organist to conquer. The first twelve exercises are for the alternate use of the right and the left foot, both in small and extended intervals, and to be executed by the point of each foot only. They are short, useful, and to the "point." Six lessons follow, for the use of the point and heel of each foot in alternation. These are much more difficult, but not of less importance to the student. The major and minor scales come next, with Mr. Best's own footing; and they are followed by six finishing studies, in which the mixed system of pedalling—"the most perfect," as Mr. Best observes—receives ample illustration. The exercises on the appoggiatura, the shake, and the octave, are well worthy attention. The one in which the pedal is phrased throughout (No. 6) may be regarded as a résumé, illustrating what the learner is presumed to have mastered in the course of study provided by Mr. Best. It is a spirited and admirable exercise. We should add, that the comments and remarks of the author are quite as pertinent as his musical examples.

The "Twenty-four Studies" may be accepted as a sequel to the Pedal Exercises, although the chief object of the former is "the alternate and combined use" of the various key-boards. To the musician, without reference to the organist, this work will be more interesting than its predecessor, since it gives a fairer insight into Mr. Best's qualifications as a composer. There is much and happy variety in the Studies, which develop a general feeling for harmony, denoting the author to be well read in the works of John Sebastian Bach. Any attempt at describing or criticising these pieces, one by one, would fail to convey an idea of their character and pretensions, and would, moreover, in all respects be superfluous. The name and reputation of Mr. Best should attract, and will doubtless attract, organ-players to the work. We promise that they will not study it without advantage.

"Andante with Variations" for the organ—(Op. 17).—W. T. Best. "Einleitung und Fuge," do. (Op. 22).—Ibid. Schott and Co.

In the "Andante with Variations" no one can fail to trace the accomplished musician. There is, nevertheless, a certain vagueness, both in the melody and the harmony of the theme, which leaves the mind unsatisfied; and this is scarcely redeemed by any brilliancy and variety to be detected in the variations.

The Einleitung und Fuge (published at Mayence—which explains the German title) is more ambitious than charming, and more attemptive than masterly. Mr. Best decidedly lacks fancy; and it seems equally true that he has not yet attained the profound scholarship indispensable in the construction of fugal movements. The theme of the present fugue (in A minor) begins well, but it breaks off into the old routine, which is not afterwards redeemed by any vast display of ingenuity. There are too many pedal points, on dominant and tonic, in this fugue; and moreover towards the end, a whole passage of nearly twelve bars is given twice, in the same key, and with very slight modifications, which is quite unfugal, if not unfrugal. In spite of this, however, there are enough of interesting points both in the Introduction—we beg pardon, Einleitung—and Fugue, to interest the connoisseur, and to authorize us in recommending the composition to the consideration of our more erudite readers.

FOREIGN.

Paris, 29th January.—Sophie Cruvelli appeared as Valentine on Monday and Friday. Her success goes on increasing, and the receipts have not once descended below the "maximum" of her first appearance. The Vestale continues in rehearsal for Cruvelli, but who is to play Licinius has not yet been decided.—Mdme. Tedesco has made her adieux in the Favorite and the Prophète. Roger was Fernand in the one and Jean of Leyden in the other.—Mdlle. Wertheimber, who is engaged at the Académie Impériale de Musique, will make her début as Fides in the Prophète. She will also perform the principal character in M. Gounod's Nonne Sanglante.—At the Opéra-Comique, Mdlle. Lefèbvre, whose indisposition was assigned as the cause of all sorts of postponements, has reappeared as Angèle in the Domino Noir.—At the Théâtre Italien, on Tuesday, the Sonnambula was played with Mario, Graziani, and Mdme. Frezzolini in the principal characters. The Emperor and Empress were present. Madlle. Emilie de Petrowitz will make her début in a few days as Lucrezia Borgia. She has been engaged as prima donna assoluta of the serious drama. This young cantatrice is the grand-daughter of the celebrated Kara Georges, Hospodar of Servia. After Lucrezia, Madlle. de Petrowitz will sing in Norma, Don Giovanni (Donna Anna), Semiramide, and Otello (Desdemona).—At the Théâtre Lyrique, Mdme. Marie Cabel made her rentrée in the Bijou Perdu. A new opera, the music by M. Clapisson, is in rehearsal. Mdme. Cabel will play the principal character.—Hector Berlioz has been engaged to direct a series of grand concerts to be given at Elberfeld, Carlsruhe, and Dresden. He will be at Elberfeld about the end of January, at Carlsruhe the 15th of February, and at Dresden about Easter.—M. Brandt, from London, is here, and has sung at several réunions.

Milan.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Carnival commenced inauspiciously at several of the theatres in Italy. At Bergamo, Cremona, Brescia, Turin, Novara, and Pavia, the first operas were complete failures. At the two first-mentioned towns, the theatres were closed until another opera could be got ready, no resource having been provided—a common oversight at the beginning of the season. Even here, at the Scala—"the great Leviathan"—they have been in a fix from the same circumstance, Buzzi's new opera, Il Convito di Baldassare, not having realised the expectation which had been formed of it from the merit of his previous opera, Saul. The Convito was produced with great splendour, and the singers did all they could, particularly Clara Novello. The music of the first and second acts is not very effective, and the remainder is very tame; in fact, it was written in too much haste. Buzzi is engaged upon an opera for Venice, to be produced during the next carnival. Macbeth had been in rehearsal, to follow the new opera, when Signora Normanni, id est, Miss Bingley, who has been many years in Italy, and who was to have appeared as Lady Macbeth, was disabled at the full rehearsal by a severe cold, and left the poor director in a dilemma. All the prima-donnas had departed to their several engagements during the carnival. One alone remained—a Signora Gariboldi—an old favourite (certainly "no chicken"); but, finding she was "the only salmon in the market," she demanded 12,000 francs to sing the part. The director exclaimed, "Troppo! troppo!" but the lady smiled and replied, "Non è basta, Caro! Non è basta!" And so from necessity the terms were agreed to. It has been reserved for Clara Novello, however, to create such a furore as has not been known at the Scala for many years, in Verdi's Rigoletto. It was a triumph over the well-known prejudice of the Italians against all except Italian singers, and those entirely educated in their own school and their own country.—A promising soprano, Signora Orrechia, has just appeared at the Carcano here; also a tenor, Signor Pasi, with a fine voice. His singing in L'Elisir d'Amore was highly artistic. Mademoiselle Lotti, who has, perhaps, the finest voice in Italy, is singing at Verona with her usual success. Rumour says she is engaged for London for the forthcoming season.—In ballets there is nothing new. Il Giuocatore continues to please whenever played, and Catti's acting in the part of the Gambler is very impressive. He is beyond all doubt the first ballet actor at present in Italy. We have seen few in England to be at all compared with him.—Augusta Maywood, the ballerina, is making a fortune in Italy. She has just appeared at Verona in Faust, with great success. Her father, a well-known actor at Drury Lane in the days of Elliston and Kean, travels with her. The daughter is American by birth, but the father, it is easy to perceive, is a "bonnie Scot." His performance of Sir Pertinax, in The Man of the World, may still be remembered by some. Uncle Tom has been twisted into every shape for representation in Italy, as well as other places—ballets! comedies! and farces!—and all failures! As Sam says to Andy, "Faculties is different in different peoples." But, with due respect for Uncle Tom, in my very humble opinion, his "faculty" is not dramatic.—I have looked around me and made inquiries about singers, and the only two that I think pretty certain of success in London, are Lotti and the tenor Pasi, who puts me in mind of Mario very much, sings with great feeling, and acts in an easy unexaggerated manner. In fact, he is the man for the other side of the Alps, where shouting is not considered the perfection of singing.

Vienna.—The last quartet meeting of Vieuxtemps took place on the 24th, in the salon of the Musikverein, in presence of a large audience. We gave the programme in our last.—Antonio Rechwalsky has invented a wind instrument of brass and wood, which he designates a B flat bass clarinet. It has four octaves and seventeen keys.

Dresden.—On the 15th ultimo the first representation of Mozart's Idomeneo took place. The principal parts were filled by Mesdames Ney, Bunke, and Krebs-Michalesi, and MM. Tichatschek and Mitterwurzer. Mdlle. Ney produced a great effect in the part of Electra.

Bonn.—In the month of March a grand musical festival is to take place here. The town has voted 15,000 francs towards the expenses.

Leipsic.—The newspapers state that Signor Costa, in London, had happily discovered, amongst some old papers, Mozart's additional instrumentation to Handel's Acis and Galatea. "Our Bibliothèque," says a Leipsic paper, "has for many years possessed the score in the original of Mozart's own writing. M. Schlesinger, of Berlin, has obtained an exact copy."

Frankfort.—The new opera of Tony was played for the first time, on the 15th. It is by the royal composer of Casilda.

Carlsruhe.—At the Grand Ducal Theatre the opera of Casilda, by the Duke of Saxe Coburg, has been performed.

Graz.—Wagner's opera Der Tannhäuser has been given here.

Wurtzburg.—Dr. Eisenhofer, director of our Conservatoire, has received the "Order of Merit" from the King of Bavaria. Eisenhofer is popular as a composer of four-part-songs. He has formed numerous pupils who have acquired distinction.

Turin.—The Opinione, one of the principal journals here, is enthusiastic in the praise of a barytone, Evrard, who is styled "Il Signor Everardi." At Naples he made a fanatismo in the part of Assur in Rossini's Semiramide, which has become as popular as ever with the public and the court. Mdmes. Stoltz and Fodor were Arsace and Semiramide.

Lyons.—The Roi des Halles, of Adolph Adam, has been brought out here with success. Anything Parisian goes down in Lyons.

DRAMATIC.

Drury Lane.—A large audience assembled, on Monday night, at Drury Lane Theatre, to witness the reappearance of Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke, who was announced to perform his "most popular character"—Lucius Junius Brutus, in Howard Payne's tragedy of Brutus; or, the Fall of Tarquin. Mr. Brooke's successes at Drury Lane, during his previous engagement, are fresh in the recollection of his admirers. His provincial "triumphs," during a tournée, are still more recent. Most of the country journals honoured him with lengthy and elaborate criticisms; municipal authorities paid homage to his talents; and dinners, fêtes, and presents were lavished upon him. Nevertheless, Mr Brooke achieved his popularity by other means than by his acting. He distributed money, and gave blankets, to the poor, in the severe weather, and, on several occasions, played gratuitously, on charitable accounts. For this, he is entitled to praise. Whatever his inner motives, Mr. Brooke evinced generosity, and accomplished good.

Mr. E. T. Smith, the present lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, is a bold man. The bills of the performance, on Monday, were headed, "Immense attraction, and novelty never yet surpassed on any stage!" This prodigious attraction and novelty consisted in the reappearance of Mr. G. V. Brooke, as first tragedian, surrounded by, at the best, a very indifferent company—Mr. George Bennett, an old and practised actor, and Miss Fanny Cathcart, a débutante, the daughter of Mr. Cathcart, the well-known tragedian, alone redeeming it from utter inefficiency. The lady is young, but full of promise, which we shall hope to see fulfilled. Of the gentleman, we need say nothing; and, indeed, in spite of his Sadler's Wells reputation, we could not heartily say much.

Mr. Brooke received a most flattering welcome, and had plenty of friends in the house to encourage him. We cannot compliment him on the choice of a play for his reappearance. Brutus is one of the weakest tragedies ever produced on the stage. Nevertheless, had the last scene been written with the least poetic spirit, it could not have failed to be effective, so striking are the situations. But the language is feeble, and the developement of the action powerless. Edmund Kean, by the force of genius, made the play endurable, and even popular. Since his time, however, it has sunk into merited oblivion. Why Mr. Brooke should have represented it is best known to himself. The impression it produced on Monday night will, we imagine, render its revival on any future occasion unadvisable.

The character of Brutus is both a dramatic and historical mistake. Mr. Howard Payne represents his hero in alternations of reason and insanity, thinking, doubtless, that what was lost in concentration might be gained in contrast. But Brutus is thus deprived of a powerful element of success, and nothing is left to the imagination of the spectator, who knows the secret from the commencement. Had the author shown Brutus insane up to the moment of Lucretia's death, his sudden and opportune restoration to reason would have been a fine point and a great surprise, besides being true to history. But we argue to no purpose; the play is unworthy of criticism. It is odd enough that Edmund Kean should have produced so much effect in it. Robson, it is true, made himself famous in burlesque; and Kean might have done the same in his day.

Of Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke there is little to say on the present occasion. Mr. Brooke certainly does not offend as much in Brutus, although he exhibits quite as many faults, as in the characters of Shakspere, and yet we prefer hearing him in Shakspere; since we would rather see an imperfect representation of Shakspere than a perfect one of Mr. Howard Payne. Mr. Brooke's performance is on a level with the merits of the play; it is not elevated, it is not refined, nor has it one spark of nature. Mr. Brooke is a mere declaimer. He possesses a strong voice, which can hardly fail to produce effect in certain passages. His appearance is in his favour, and, in action and deportment, he is not devoid of ease. But his powers are limited. He never awakens sympathy, he never touches the heart. Wanting earnestness and intensity, his passion degenerates into rant. He has no finesse, nor any of those delicate touches which proclaim the instinct and the sense of genius. In short, he is more a scholar than an actor—and yet he is no scholar. His points are pointless, his vocal intonation unmeaning, his repose monotonous, and his passion "Billingsgate." Worse than all for a melodramatic actor of his class, he wants stamina, and he gets out of breath before he can reach a climax. So that he is not even a good "roarer," like Hicks.

In the higher walks of the drama, Mr. Brooke cannot hope to obtain lasting countenance from the thinking part of the British public. Circumstances may sustain him for a while in a position to which his talents do not entitle him; but when opinion has been sifted, and the gloss of novelty wears away, Mr. Gustavus Vasa Brooke must be satisfied to rest upon his natural level of mediocrity.

The play on Monday night, in many respects, was well put upon the stage. The destruction of Tullia's palace by fire was admirable; and the forum, too, was a well-set scene. But, with deference to the classical acquirements of Mr. E. T. Smith, who rivals Mr. Charles Kean in explanatory placards, we submit that glass windows were unknown to the Romans, and that houses after the fashion of Threadneedle Street (Acts 4 and 5) were strange to Roman architecture. The dresses and appointments, however, were new and appropriate; and Mr. Brooke's suit of armour was worth paying half-price to the gallery to look at.

On Tuesday, Mr. Brooke played Master Walter, in the Hunchback; on Thursday in the Stranger; and, on Wednesday and Friday (last night), repeated the part of Lucius Junius Brutus.

Marylebone.—During the successful run of the pantomime, Mr. and Mrs. William Wallack have taken the opportunity of reposing, and have only appeared occasionally. On Thursday night Pizarro was given. Mrs. William Wallack is an immense favourite at the little theatre in Church-street, and deserves to be so. She is an artist of considerable power and energy, and in parts, like Emilia in Othello, has few superiors on the stage, Mr. William Wallack is also much liked. Among the Marylebone company we have pleasure in noticing Mr. Bellair, who performs the juvenile tragedy parts, and, in Shakspere's plays, the characters of Charles Kemble. His Cassio, in Othello, displays many good points: his appearance is favourable, and he looks a perfect gentleman on the stage. With a little more study and experience, we have no doubt but that Mr. Bellair will become one of our best metropolitan actors in his own immediate line.

Strand Theatre.—Mr. Allcroft's benefit takes place this evening, when the Sonnambula will be given, and an Irish farce, in which Mr. Hodson will appear. Mr. Hodson has been performing a round of Irish characters lately, and seems to afford a great deal of amusement to the visitors to the Strand. Next week the performances will be arranged so as to suit the convenience of the juvenile part of the community. The "Toy Pantomime" will commence the performance, and the opera, etc., will follow: this arrangement will satisfy all parties.

Surrey.—An "original" drama in three acts, entitled Eustache, has been produced here. The story is French, of the period of the Empire, and, like everything French, is full of life and incident, although somewhat extravagant. The story is clearly and neatly told. Mr. Creswick is the hero, Eustache, and Mr. Shepherd, Delbois, one of those ruffians of mixed ferocity and humour, who, after having earned their hire and been dismissed, are always returning to disconcert their employer's plans and make jokes on their companions. Miss Clayton looked pretty and acted well, but we suspect that her ability inclines more to the comic than the serious. Mr. Widdicomb made the best of the comic character of a runaway recruit and jealous husband. The piece was very well received by a crowded house. The pantomime does not appear to flag in its attraction.

Woodin's Carpet Bag and Sketch Book.—After an absence of some time, passed in visiting Edinburgh, Dublin, and the principal provincial towns, Mr. Woodin has once again returned to his first patrons, the London public. He opened his second campaign on Thursday evening, at the Regent Gallery, in the Quadrant. The old proverb, "Out of sight out of mind," does not seem applicable in Mr. Woodin's case, for, judging from the closely-packed audience on Thursday, his former admirers have certainly not forgotten him. Several novelties have been introduced into the entertainment. Among them we may mention the opening song, the characters of Professor Fogy and Mr. Bilberry, and some alterations in the rôle of the beefeater, as particularly worthy of notice, and particularly successful. The audience were loud in their manifestations of delight during the whole performance, which they frequently interrupted by loud and continued applause. There is no doubt that Mr. Woodin is, at present, an established fact—one of the lions of the metropolis which every one must see; and there is, moreover, no doubt that, great as his popularity is, he certainly deserves it.

A SAX-PIANOFORTE.

Many questions having been asked about the new style of pianoforte said to have been invented by M. Sax, of Brussels (father of Adolphe Sax of European reputation), we cannot, as we know nothing about it ourselves, do better than lay before our readers a translation of the report of Mons. Fétis to the Class of the Fine Arts in the Académie Royale des Sciences, des Lettres et des Beaux-Arts de Belgique, on the 8th May, 1851, which originally appeared in the Moniteur Belge.

"Gentlemen,—I feel bound to call the attention of this class to an important discovery due to the meditation of a Belgian artist, already known in both hemispheres for his useful exertions in perfecting various instruments. The artist I allude to is Mons. Sax, sen., the head of a family in which the gift of inventing and perfecting appears to be hereditary.

"Ever meditating on the mysteries of acoustics, Mons. Sax has just proved, by a decisive experiment, the existence of a principle as novel as it is important, for the best possible construction of pianos, whether with a view to obtain the greatest volume of sound or to preserve the instrument for the longest possible period.

"Like all men of superior mind and extended views, Mons. Sax generalizes his ideas and follows them up to their first cause. He had long since proved that the powerful quality of the sound emitted from a violin, the sonorous part of which is small in proportion to the whole instrument, is due to the fact that the angle formed by the strings with the surface, by means of the bridge which raises them, is the cause of rendering the surface subject to strong vibrations, which produce the loudness of the sounds. The guitar, on the other hand, proved to him that if chords are stretched parallel to the surface, they are incapable of imparting vibrations to the whole, and that, therefore, only feeble sounds can be obtained from an instrument constructed on this principle. Hence, Mons. Sax came to the conclusion that the sounds emitted from a piano would be much more powerful than at present, if the height of the bridge were properly increased.

"He did not, however, endeavour to deny the inevitable risk of destroying the sounding-board under the formidable pressure of all the strings—which, in a grand piano, must equal 20,000 kilogrammes, if we take into consideration the great augmentation of the strain produced by the angle of the strings, as it would be necessary for the bridge in the new system to bear the proportion of 4 to 1 compared to the pianos built in the manner now adopted. Thanks to a most happy idea, not only has M. Sax avoided this risk, but, in the most complete manner, resolved a problem which has hitherto been considered as admitting of no solution; he has freed the sounding-board from the strain of the strings, and, consequently, succeeded in giving the instrument the necessary amount of solidity, and introducing improvements without having recourse to the usual method of iron bars. The following is the mode of proceeding, as simple and rational as it is successful, invented by this skilful acoustician. A straight line, drawn from the points of support of the strings to the extremities of the instrument, extends perfectly parallel to the sounding-board in all grand pianos. The points of support of the wires are connected, as we are all aware, with the sleepers. The problem to be resolved was: how to prevent the immense strain of the strings, raised out of the plane in which they were by a considerable elevation of the bridge, from immediately destroying the slender sounding board by which they were supported. The solution sought was: how to do away with this strain and throw it upon the points where the strings are fastened. As soon as the solution was reduced to this simple condition, it was immediately effected by Mons. Sax, who expressed it in the following formula: In order to destroy the pressure of the strings upon the bridge, and of the latter upon the sounding-board, two equal forces must be made to act in opposite directions. If, therefore, a string exerts upon the bridge a certain strain proportioned to its tension and the angle it describes, another, describing an equal angle in the opposite direction, will sustain the bridge in its proper position, and both of them being again conducted to the horizontal plane towards the place where they are struck by the hammer, will exert no strain save at the points where they are made fast. What is true of two strings is also true of all contained in the instrument, if they are divided into two sets, and made to act in different directions.

"Now, this being the case, no sort of pressure is exerted on the sounding-board, and therefore the system of crossbars, adopted in the construction of our present pianos, is not only no longer necessary, but must be immediately got rid of, for the system of crossbars on the sounding-boards of all instruments adopted as a means of solidity, has, up to this moment, been merely an unavoidable calamity, being evidently an obstacle to the elasticity of the board and consequently to the free propagation of the vibrations. This is the reason why, if you place your hand on the sounding-board of a piano, at the instant that a note is struck, you will find that there are certain points of the board which do not vibrate. The vibrations are only partial.

"Another very important result of the isolation in which Mons. Sax places the sounding-board, as far as the action of the strings upon the bridge is concerned, is that the sounding-board will, in future, be free from the contractions produced by the present state of matters, which contractions are of such a kind, that, after the elapse of a certain number of years, we remark that the tone of the best pianos has undergone a very considerable alteration, because, by degrees, the strings which propagate the vibrations have contracted, the sounding-board has become drawn together, and the tone become thin and dry.

"If this were not the case, a piano, instead of deteriorating in a few years, would be improved by time; for the sounding-board of this instrument ought, like that of the violin, to acquire more elasticity by frequent use.

"There are two distinct things in a piano, namely, the volume of sound, contained in the sonorous body of the instrument, and the mechanism. * * * * * This being premised, it is evident that the mechanism, like everything else subjected to friction, must deteriorate by use, but the tone, both in volume and quality, ought to be improved by the elasticity of the sounding-board. It is, therefore, plain, that a fine grand piano, well constructed, would always remain in its primitive state, provided the mechanism were simply renewed; but such is not the case, because the system hitherto pursued must necessarily involve the progressive deterioration of the vibratory qualities of the instrument as well as of those connected with the touch.

"Such, therefore, are the results which Mons. Sax proposed to obtain theoretically. Let us now see what he has actually and practically obtained. He was not a pianoforte-maker, nor had he anything that was necessary for the business. He adopted the most simple method; that was: to apply his system to a little old upright piano, by Lichtenthal, an instrument with an abrupt low tone, mechanism completely worn out, and furnished with hammers that were too short and which shook about without exactitude or the slightest firmness; and lastly, with a keyboard made up of keys in a continual state of oscillation, and chattering under the touch. It was with this instrument that the artist determined to realise his plans. Having removed the old sounding-board, he supplied its place with another, only half as thick as those generally in use. He used no kinds of bars in it. He then fixed his bridge on the principles which I have already explained, stretched his strings, and re-adjusted, as well as he could, Lichtenthal's old mechanism. One of the clever sons of this man of genius then sat down to play upon this piano, constructed at such a small outlay. Immediately he did so, the persons who were passing in the street, stood still and endeavoured to discover where the grand orchestra was which they heard.

"Several artists hastened to try the new instrument themselves, and were struck with admiration. What especially astonished them was the great distance to which the vigorous and pure sounds were carried, and the powers of the bass notes, in a little upright piano of the smallest dimensions. These results were obtained at once without any experiments or alterations, and with that certainty which a great principle inspires in the heart of every man of superior intelligence.

"The principle of Mons. Sax was complete, and its various results are the natural consequences of the principle. By the simple observation of the fact: that the wires parallel to the plane of the sounding-board impart to the latter merely weak vibratory oscillations, and that energetic vibrations can only be produced by strings that form with the sounding-board a more or less acute angle, Mons. Sax has discovered the secret of obtaining the greatest possible amount of sonority. Thanks to the no less luminous notion of maintaining the equilibrium of two forces between two points of support, he has relieved the sounding-board of the weight of the wires, so that, if the board could be withdrawn, the bridge would still remain suspended, and still support its burden. Being perfectly free and lightened of the superincumbent weight, the sounding-board is freed also from the system of crossbars which checked its vibrations, and the latter become so strong that if the hand is placed upon any part of the surface it can feel them most plainly, whatever the note struck. From the circumstance of its elasticity having full play, the sounding-board can no longer warp or become deteriorated. On the contrary, its vibratory powers must continue gradually to improve, and from this it follows, as a necessary consequence, that pianos will no more wear out so rapidly, but that age will only tend to augment the volume and purity of their tone.

"Moved by these considerations, of great interest to art and trade, I have the honour to propose that this class give Mons. Sax its support with the Government, in order that some national recompense should be awarded him for his various admirable labours, and especially for the inventions of which I have just given an analysis. It is very important that this discovery should be public property, for if the Belgian manufacturers applied it to the construction either of grand or upright pianos, they could advantageously enter into competition with the best French and German makers. The recompense awarded to Mons. Sax might be joined with the proviso that he should give up to the Belgian makers the rights he enjoys in virtue of his patent."

If Sax can make Belgium a pianoforte manufacturing country, so much the better. We shall be glad to verify M. Fétis' report by trial.

RÉUNION DES ARTS.—The soirée on Wednesday evening was well attended, and the musical performances not devoid of interest. The concert opened with Thalberg's trio in A major (Op. 69), for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The trio was interesting, being performed on this occasion for the first time. It was further interesting as being Thalberg's, and especially brilliant in the pianoforte part. It was well executed by Messrs. Kiallmark, Ries, and Paque. The other instrumental feature of the first part was the pianoforte solo of Mademoiselle Madeleine Graever, which was received with marked favour. Mademoiselle Graever has a light touch, and executes with great neatness and finish. She also displays considerable taste and feeling. The only instrumental piece in the second part was a solo on the violin by Herr Ries. He played Vieuxtemps' fantasia on I Lombardi. The vocal music was assigned to Mademoiselle Cesarini, Madame Ferrari, and Messrs. Burdini and Ferrari. Mademoiselle Cesarini joined Signor Burdini in Donizetti's duet, "Ah, se potessi," and sang the aria, "Benigno il cielo." In both she gave evidence of no ordinary talent. In the duet she was well assisted by Signor Burdini. Madame Ferrari introduced Adam's Tyrolienne, "Le Retour à la Montagne," which she sang with much point. Mr. Grattan Cooke played the oboe obbligato. Signor and Madame Ferrari gave Balfe's duet, "O'er Shepherd's Pipe." The attendance was good. The next soirée is announced for Wednesday, February 15th.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed by this society, on Monday night, under the direction of Mr. Surman. The principal singers were the Misses Birch, M. Wells, Mrs. Lockey, and Messrs. Lockey, H. Phillips, G. Perren, Seymour, Mattacks, and J. B. Husks. Exeter Hall was crowded.

PROVINCIAL.

BATH.—MR. SIMMS'S CONCERTS.—On Saturday, Mr. Henry Simms gave two concerts at the Rooms, at which Madame Amedei and Miss Arabella Goddard made their first appearance in Bath; M. Sainton, Madame and Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Land, completed the "troop." Madame Amedei sustained the expectations which had been formed of her here. We admired her especially in Meyerbeer's aria, "Ah, mon fils," into which she threw a pathos which proved her capable of high achievements in the vocal art. From the favourable criticisms which the metropolitan press had universally awarded to Miss Arabella Goddard, we were prepared for the brilliant display which she made on Saturday. She was enthusiastically received by an audience capable of forming a correct judgment of her capabilities, and their decision was highly flattering. The applause was hearty and unanimous. Her mastery over the mechanism of the instrument is perfect, whilst the mind which guides and regulates every passage gives to the lady's performance a charm which takes it out of the everyday catalogue of pianoforte playing, and invests it with a peculiar grace such as cannot fail to delight all who hear her. M. Sainton's fantasia on Lucrezia Borgia was a complete triumph over difficulties, and left every one astonished at the dexterity of the executant. Nor must we omit to mention as a most delightful and classical performance, Beethoven's grand duet for violin and pianoforte, rendered by Miss Goddard and M. Sainton with such breath of conception, such exquisite appreciation of the author's meaning. Mr. and Madame Weiss sung several pieces with applause; and Mr. Land conducted with his usual ability. The programme of the Evening Concert—which was fashionably attended—began with a brilliant duet of Thalberg and De Beriot, played by Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton. Mad. Amedei sang an aria from Semiramide, which was delightedly and generally acknowledged; and Mad. Weiss sustained a prominent position in the concert. The various pieces which were to constitute the tests by which Miss Goddard's mastery of the pianoforte might be judged, were admirably chosen, and their beauties elicited, and their difficulties surmounted, with triumphant effect. Mr. Weiss was again in great favour with the audience. This gentleman wins no applause that is not a genuine response to the claims of natural endowments and artistic culture. M. Sainton's fantasia on the violin—the theme, "The Standard Bearer"—was played with an ease and grace which lent it an additional charm.—Bath and Cheltenham Gazette.

LEICESTER.—(From our own correspondent.)—The performance of The Messiah on Wednesday evening at the Concerts for the People was attended by an audience numbering nearly 1300. The principal vocalists were Miss Poole, Miss Lascelles, Mrs. Oldershaw, and Mr. Frank Bodda; Mr. Gill conducted the oratorio, which went throughout with precision and effect. These concerts have promoted a taste for music in this town which did not before exist, and Mr. Nicholson well merits the patronage bestowed upon his exertions DEVONPORT.—The concert at the Mechanics' Institute, on Wednesday, presented a combination of talent rarely met with out of the metropolis. Messrs. King and Radford were the entrepreneurs. Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather on Wednesday night, the hall of the Institute was filled in every part. The performers who appeared on Wednesday were nearly all strangers here, so that, in addition to the musical ability, there was the charm of novelty. The concert was calculated to please the most fastidious. Whether we regard the brilliant execution and the resonant touch of Miss Arabella Goddard—the sweet warbling of Madame Amedei—the masterly execution of M. Sainton, or the talents of Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, there was scope for the gratification of all. The solos afforded the highest satisfaction and several were encored. The president, Edward St. Aubyn, Esq., expressed himself highly gratified.

GLASGOW.—The first of the winter series of Subscription Concerts took place in the City Hall, under the direction of Mr. Julian Adams. The attendance was scanty, owing to the inclemency of the night. Mr. Julian Adams was warmly greeted on his appearance in the orchestra. The band is not quite equal to those of former seasons; it comprises, however, the names of several artists of metropolitan eminence. The vocal portions were intrusted to Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison. The lady laboured under a severe attack of cold, and gave some ballads—in lieu of the operatic morceaux, for which she had been announced. The second concert drew a more numerous attendance. Mdlle Rita Favanti, the "star" of the evening, was greeted with enthusiasm. She sang, among other things, "Casta Diva," from Norma, and "Non più mesta," from Cenerentola. The last was encored, and she was recalled after both. The next feature of the evening was a fine performance of Mons. Prospère on the ophicleide. Mr. Wallace played a solo on the cornet-à-pistons. The overture to Fra Diavalo and the andante from Haydn's Surprise symphony were well played.

MR. J. ALFRED NOVELLO'S MUSICAL CIRCULAR for FEBRUARY, 1854.—On or before the 6th of February will be ready, handsomely bound in whole scarlet cloth, gilt, Novello's original octavo edition of HAYDN'S CREATION, price 3s.; HANDEL'S MESSIAH, 4s.; HANDEL'S JUDAS MACCABÆUS, 4s; HANDEL'S SAMSON, 4s. When the octavo editions of the Messiah and Creation were first printed in 1846, nothing of the kind had ever been attempted, and the success of the publications was thought hopeless when they appeared. It might have been so, but that an extended use for such books may be said to have been invented at the same time, namely, the use of such books by the audience, instead of being confined as previously to the performers. Novello's octavo editions were also the first type works which had the words (or text) of a proportionate size to the music, so that both could be conveniently read at the same distance from the eye. These causes combined to give the octavos a success far beyond that sanguinely expected by their designer, and the result was further experiments in the production of other books of more limited popularity, and some twenty-two complete oratorios have been issued from Dean-street, occupying more than 2,700 pages, besides other octavo collections of Glees, Anthems, etc., etc. A new sort of books and a new especial use for them having been thus invented, there are those persons who have not scrupled to pick out the more popular works for imitation, and avail themselves of the newly created want to aid their mean endeavours to supersede the originator. These servile copies are put forth at similar prices to what Novello's octavos were charged when his books were still an experiment; and so far the public have nothing to thank the imitators for—one rich firm, which is prominent in this shabby proceeding, might entitle itself to some credit were it to reduce the high price at which it publishes the few theoretical works that are not shams, and so place these useful books within reach of those with limited purses. No such benefit is offered by reprinting imitations of Novello's Octavo Oratorios, which were already accessible, and the competition diminishes the fund with which new works might be undertaken. The imitators will hardly get credit, even by following the reduction now announced in the Messiah, to 4s.; Judas Maccabeus, to 4s.; Samson, to 4s.; and Creation, to 3s. J. Alfred Novello believes that many of those amongst the public who have watched the progress of these inventions will patronize his editions in preference to any of the imitations, and he hopes to deserve and repay such patronage by enlarging the series by the addition of works important to the Art, but less attractive to the music-seller from their limited demand. J. Alfred Novello will be ready to make arrangements to send a number of copies for sale to any Society on the night of performance of any particular Oratorio, so that the audience can purchase copies in the room; but it is suggested that the auditor who has previously obtained, and studied the work some days previously, will generally be much more capable of its intelligent enjoyment. Trusting to be favoured with sympathy and support in this new effort to meet a competition, which, under all the circumstances, must be considered unfair, it is satisfactory to be able to offer these intrinsically valuable volumes in a form and at a price which will make each purchase an individual benefit, at the same time that it supports one, who hopes he may claim the title of a faithful labourer in the cause of music.

THESEUS receives the exiled Theban with hospitable courtesy; hears of the prediction respecting the death of Œdipus and of the contention between his sons; accepts the proffered dowry of the ashes of his guest, as a propitiation of fortune for his state; and promises the protection of his sovereign power to the wanderers, to whom he accords his kingly welcome.

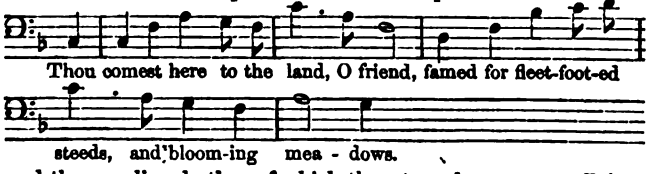
III.

We now come to the first of the Odes, in which, not declamatory expression only, but continuously melodic musical beauty excites our interest.

The subservient Chorus, assured by their king's proffered aid and his cordial reception of Œdipus, now welcome with as much warmth as they have before slighted him, indeed repulsed him with coldness, and they sing the glories and the beauties of the land to which they bid him welcome. Such is the subject of this Ode, and in the broad, clear, melodious, simple, energetic, and nervous character of the music, this subject, the pride of patriotism, the praise of native land, is nobly embodied.

The symphony for wind instruments, accompanying Theseus' entrance, appended to the last piece of music, is repeated for his departure, and forms an essential feature of the present piece, being not merely prefixed to it as it was appended to the last, but incorporated in its form and essentially in its substance. The last four bars are particularly to be noticed as recurring in another key, in the vocal parts, when the words to which they are set define the feeling they must here be purposed to illustrate.

The first Strophe consists of a long unbroken melody, accompanied with great simplicity, but with such pertinent application of the few unordinary harmonies that are employed, as to educe from them the utmost possible effect. It opens thus:—



and the peculiar rhythm, of which these two phrases are sufficient indication, may well be supposed to endow it with such individuality as will surely distinguish it in the memory. Peculiarity, or, to speak better, versatility, and, consequently, ceaseless variety of rhythm is an eminent characteristic of Mozart, whose constant novelty of metre is constant success: no one has more frequently departed from the hackneyed conventionalisms of four-bar phraseology, and no one has produced so many universally appreciable and ever-popular melodies—nay, take the epithet of the most unsophisticated terminology, tunes. Hence we find that it is not needful to refer to the most limited perceptivity to certify a general impression, and a little further penetration will satisfy us that when a melody is, by rhythmical or some other peculiarity, excepted from our daily anticipations, indeed from the class of common-place, it is certain to fix itself the more rootedly, if not the more rapidly, upon our recollection, for this exceptionality. I mean not, by citing the composer of Don Juan as an instance, to urge that Mendelssohn has followed Mozart as a model, though any, the greatest, even Mendelssohn, might without derogation acknowledge his example; but, I mean, that Mozart, in whose music everything that is admirable is to be found, has this excellence, namely, of originality of rhythm, in common with the composer of A Midsummer Night's Dream; and such coincidence of practice may justify the said originality in the later musician, to those measurers of merit whom time has taught to reverence even what they cannot understand in the characteristics of Mozart, but who assume the right of contemporaneity, which implies fellowship, to criticise what they cannot judge (excuse my employment of the former term in its conventional, and certainly unauthentic signification) in the music of Mendelssohn.

The melody thus commenced, goes on and on and on with a fluency that is most admirable. I have just been deprecating the system of fault-finding, or, rather, fault-seeking, miscalled criticism, by which the minnows in the streams of art attempt to approach the leviathan, and thus establish a like fellowship in space, with that in time, which is, of a truth, their only community with him. What then will you say to me—the words, the most sincere words, still wet upon the paper—for entering, grammar-wise, straightway into the discussion of a passage that I think objectionable? Think what you will: this is my principle; blind reverence is a miserable beggar, whose dog with a string is dotage, whose alms are the superfluities of good or evil, which indifferent, perhaps mocking strangers may cast into his cap; observant enthusiasm is an independent gentleman, whose steed is freshness, and whose gatherings are the best of everything which all yield to him in tribute; honest himself, he exacts honesty from others, and penetrating, as though his eyes were microscopes, one cannot mix one husk of chaff with his grain, and escape his instant detection. To do justice to a beauty, one must feel that it is a beauty, and to feel that it is a beauty one must have the quickest sense of whatever roughens the exquisite surface of perfection. I have before apologised respectively to the Editor, and the readers of the Musical World, for taking up their valuable space and time in animadversion upon technicalities. As before, I have now one single note to except from my else unqualified admiration of this Chorus; here it is—

The B natural in the second chord, is, to my feeling, unavailable for this harmony, in the key of D minor; and, besides the irrelative effect of its introduction in the first bar, its more appropriate employment in the third bar, where it belongs to the dominant harmony of the key of C, is anticipated by that introduction, and thus robbed both of its brightness and its clearness, since the ear is now uncertain whether to expect the satisfactory modulation that ensues, or a repetition of the previous progression, of which the tonality is obscure and indefinite. Having vindicated my right to admire, by acknowledging my incapability of pleasure from the one passage that is worse than neutral to my sense, I may proceed, in good faith with myself and with the reader, to the expressions of praise, which will only be limited by the limits of language and the limits of my——but I will not pretend to a modesty that the fact of my writing too distinctly disproves.

The Antistrophe consists of a repetition of the music of the Strophe, with the addition of a moving figure of accompaniment, which is alternated between the wind and string instruments. Whether this figure was suggested by the Coloniate's description of the nightingales, whose song fills the air of their most favoured country, and being thus suggested reflects the suggestion from the composer to his hearers; or, whether it be one of those strokes of unpremeditated art which surpass the chemistry of criticism, and—pure carbon of the imagination, like the diamond—resist ultimate analysis, seeming to be beautiful only because they are beautiful, matters little: the idea is exquisite, and delighted admiration owes one of the moment-lives of her manifold existence to its quickening influence.

The Second Strophe extols the olive, indigenous to the Athenian territory, and counting its luxuriant beauties among the richest treasures afforded by the fertile soil, honours Jove and Minerva, from whom the capital is named, as its ever-watching protectors. We have here a change of movement to which the continual motion in triplets of the violins gives much animation, but the marked accent of the musical phrase still more.

Notice the particularly bright effect of the E flat in the upper melody of the third bar; again, the delicious phrase for the violoncello, viola, and bassoon in unison, that successfully contends with the continuation of this melody for prominence, surpassing it, as it does, in interest, and thus taking, can one say, an unfair advantage of its rival, rather than opponent, to force its way to our attention through the channels of our heart. But what need to praise that which all must admire?—what need to describe that which all must feel? Bar by bar new and still greater beauties are unfolded, and the olive, whose branch betokens peace, and whose fruit embodies plenty, seems to fill with its luscious oil the artist's thought, which thus overflows with its genial richness. The opening phrase of the first movement is now introduced with admirable brightness of effect, and with true poetical purpose. It is not a sensuous delight in the grace of the tree and the sweetness of its fruit that is here expressed, but a national glory in the bounty of nature, of which this valued plant is a most liberal manifestation; and thus, in singing its praises, a recurrence to the musical idea which opens the present Ode is charmingly appropriate. Concentrating the enthusiasm which has been gradually kindling into the blaze of one expression, "guarded and watched by Minerva!" the utmost force is given to these words by their being set to the marked phrase comprised in the last four bars of the opening symphony (the music for the entrance and the retirement of Theseus), which, occurring now in the key of B flat, lies most admirably for the voices, and brings out their utmost resonance.

The Antistrophe passes to a grander theme, the praise of Neptune, whose waves submit to the glorious burthen of the Athenian barks. The music of the relative Strophe is recapitulated, but with great modification, resulting from the immediate return to the key of F in the passage for tenor instruments before cited, which induces the transposition or greater alteration of all that ensues.

The coda is especially exciting. The separate choirs, which have been hitherto for the most part divided, singing respectively Strophe and Antistrophe, are now brought together in rapid responses upon the opening phrase of the Ode. The vigorous animation of this antiphonal distribution of the parts is just such an effect as only could crown the climax, which, carrying our interest upwards with its ascent, here reaches its summit. Now we have a passage formed upon harmonies (the first inversion of the chord of the major ninth of the supertonic, for instance) his frequent use of which leads us to associate particularly with the thought of Mendelssohn, though they are to be found, not unfrequently, in the music of Handel, and even in the less imaginative if not less inspired writing of Bach. The fortissimo of the whole orchestra, ceasing suddenly, leaves the voices and the soft wind instruments upon a second inversion of the harmony of the tonic; and the voices, all in unison, conclude with this singularly beautiful cadence:

in which every note of the vocal melody and the accompanying melody has its excellence, but, exceeding the excellence of all the rest, is the most exquisite point of the entry of the basses upon the A, which has a depth, a softness of effect, equal to the veneration it expresses.

The original tempo is resumed in the concluding symphony, which is a recurrence of a part of the often-mentioned introductory symphony, and of a very lovely instrumental passage which has intervened between the several vocal divisions of the composition; and we are thus brought round, as in a circle, to the expression of love and peace with which the ode opens, and which, however coloured by the glowing hues of the enthusiasm its utterance excites, is the prevailing and characteristic sentiment of the entire composition.

G. A. MACFARREN.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

(From the original of Alexander Oulibicheff.)*

CHAPTER V.

1769–1771.

The approach of Passion Week called our travellers to Rome, where they arrived on the 11th April, 1770. I have already mentioned how much stress the Holy See laid upon the fact of retaining exclusive possession of the works annually produced in Passion Week, and published only at a recent period under the title—"Musica sacra, quæ cantatur quot annis per hebdomadam sanctam, Romæ in sacello pontificio."† For a long time, there is reason to believe, the singers were prohibited, under a threat of excommunication, from copying these works, taking their parts away with them, or shewing them to any one. In spite of this prohibition, however, our hero succeeded in obtaining a copy of one of the most celebrated of these compositions, the Miserere, by Allegri. And how did he effect this? By means which any one else was at liberty to employ if he could. He wrote it down from memory, after hearing it only once, on Maunday Thursday, the day of his arrival. The work being repeated on Good Friday, Mozart took his manuscript with him in his hat, under cover of which he supplied whatever he had previously omitted, in order to render his copy as correct as possible, and when, many years subsequently, it was compared with the original, which Burney obtained from Santarelli, there was not, according to the English historian, a single note wanting.

Although this anecdote has been very long and very generally known, it struck me as so little worthy of credit, that, I frankly own, I looked upon it merely as a hyperbolical flourish in Mozart's biography, knowing how eager people are to exaggerate things which already have a touch of the wonderful. Herr von Nissen's work, however, convinced me, since the fact is there mentioned in a letter from Leopold Mozart to his wife. Nevertheless, I did not give up my opinion easily, but, had I continued to doubt, I must have admitted one of two things: either that Leopold Mozart invented a vapid story simply to amuse himself and mystify his wife, thereby incurring the risk of passing for a barefaced charlatan, in case his letter were shown to others, and he not in a position to establish its truth; or that Herr von Nissen, the compiler of the correspondence, was an impostor. Neither of these suppositions is admissible, firstly, because they would convey an insult to the memory of two honourable men, and, secondly, because it is impossible to adduce any proofs in support of them. We must, also, not forget that the circumstance was generally admitted before the publication of the correspondence. When, therefore, the best authenticated traditions agree, in this manner, with documents, from their nature beyond suspicion—I mean family letters never intended to be printed, and whose genuineness is altogether unassailable—historical truth must result from connecting such a chain of evidence, or where are we to look for it? The passage concerning the story of the Miserere, in Leopold Mozart's letter, is to the following effect. After first speaking of the insurmountable obstacles which stand in the way of any one wishing to obtain leave to take copies of the works in question, he says: "In spite of all this, we have already got Allegri's Miserere. Wolfgang wrote it down, and we should have sent it with this letter to Salzburg, had not our presence there been necessary for its performance. I think that with works of this description the style of execution has more to do with success than the merits of the music. Besides, we do not wish this secret of ours to become known to any but yourselves, ut non incurremus mediate vel immediate in censuram ecclesiæ."* The extraordinary reserve evident in the communication of Leopold Mozart shows him not only a prudent diplomatist but a true Catholic, who so far speaks out in his letters as to express surprise on several occasions at the number of worthy people he found among the Lutherans, not forgetting, however, to urge his wife, and even others, to have masses said for their souls in some church or other which he names.

But it appears that the son's imprudence soon rendered all the father's caution of no avail. The miraculous theft was bruited about Rome, and people endeavoured to get at the truth of the matter, which the offender himself placed beyond all doubt, by playing the Miserere note for note to Christofori, who had sung it a few days previously in St. Peter's. Christofori was perfectly bewildered, a fact which the reader will find very natural, if he only remembers that Allegri's music, written in the old church style, presents difficulties of a very different description from those of a mere operatic composition, and how few are there capable of taking even the latter down from ear! I here give the first verse of the Miserere, with the notes, which will render the matter clearer than words would do:

* This translation, which has been made expressly for the Musical World, is copyright.

† The sacred music sung annually during Passion Week in the pontifical chapel at Rome.

* That we may not, either directly or indirectly, incur the censure of the church.

I believe I am not saying too much when I assert, that, were we to deny Mozart all merit, both as virtuoso and composer, and only allow him that of having written down from ear, without a fault, the Miserere, we should still be compelled to recognise him as a musical genius of the highest order.

From Rome, Wolfgang proceeded with his father to Naples. The only fact worthy of notice during his stay is his visit to the Conservatory della Pietà. His pianoforte-playing, which he had brought to a state of perfection until then unknown in Italy, gave rise to all sorts of conjectures among the pupils. At last, they imagined they had discovered the secret of his great skill, namely, a ring that he wore on one of the fingers of his left hand. They gave their visitor to understand that he could deceive them no longer, since they felt assured it was the magic ring which enabled him to overcome all difficulties. Upon this, Mozart took off the talisman and went on playing without it. The admiration of those who were formerly incredulous now knew no bounds.

During the whole period of his travels, Wolfgang wrote regularly to his sister. His letters are, for the most part, so strange, that, if they had another signature, we should only look upon them as the effusions of a mind far under that of any ordinary child of fourteen years of age, who had received the slightest education. They contain a mixture of phrases written in German, Italian, French, and the Salzburg provincial dialect, without connection, and, very frequently, without meaning. To give my readers an idea of this epistolary style, I will lay before them the conclusion of a letter dated from Naples, and written in a more connected manner than usual. It is as follows:

"Write to me and do not be so lazy. *Altrimenti avrete qualche bastonate di me. Quel plaisir! je te casserai la tête. . . . . Mädli las da saga, wo bist dan gwesa he? The opera here is by Jomelli; it is fine, but too learned and too old-fashioned for the stage. The singing of De Amicis is incomparable, as is also that of Aprile, who has sung at Milan. The dances are miserably pompous. The theatre is beautiful. The King has been brought up in the coarse Neapolitan manner, and always stands on a stool during the opera, in order to appear a little taller than the Queen. The Queen is handsome and polite, for she has saluted me at least six times upon the Molo."

It is very evident that, when engaged in this kind of writing, Mozart was thinking of anything but what he wrote. The occupation was to his mind, in all but music, still that of a child, what running and jumping are to the physical faculties of other boys of his age. It would have been a most troublesome task for him, in writing to his sister, to communicate his feelings or relate a fact seriously. His sole object in addressing her was amusement. Half Italian by disposition, he was uncommonly merry and lively, and felt himself irresistibly attracted by anything like a joke. His overflowing spirits would force a passage for themselves in some manner or other, and, as the staid demeanour of his father and the numerous artists with whom he came in contact, in the presence of personages of distinction, afforded him no opportunity of indulging his mirth, he profited by his correspondence with Nannerl to let it have full vent. All his fun, antics, burlesque phrases, and absurdities prove that his thoughts were, in fact, running in quite a different direction, and that, had he been able to do so, he would have been running about in the woods and green fields. The poor child diverted himself in his imagination! At no period of his life, however, was Mozart fond of letter-writing. But, when subsequently compelled to communicate to his father matters of great interest to both, he gave proofs, although quite unwittingly, that he could put his thoughts upon paper, if not with elegance, at least with clearness, sometimes with a peculiar impressiveness, and almost always with originality. If, however, the question was a purely musical one, then, in truth, he was no longer the same person! On reaching the epoch to which we refer, our readers will not fail to observe in Mozart's letters, despite his usual negligence of style, a musical thinker and a critic of the first rank.

Passing through Rome on his return, Wolfgang received the Papal Order of the Spur, with which Gluck had also been invested some years before. Unlike the composer of Orpheus, however, Mozart never afterwards wore it nor made any use of his title of Chevalier.

The cities of Italy vied with each other in marks of respect to the young composer. The Philharmonic Academy of Bologna, which, as I have already stated, had unanimously elected him a member, now appointed him to the post of capellmeister.

About the end of October, our travellers returned to Milan, where Mozart was destined to begin his ever memorable dramatic career with the serious opera of Mithridate Re di Ponto. As long as the triumphs of the Cavaliere filarmonico—as the Italians called him—had been confined to the interior of the academies and concert-rooms, our composer, improviser, and learned contrapuntist, appears to have awakened no sentiments among the Italians but those of the most glowing enthusiasm and warmest good-will. Envy slumbered, or, at least, never ventured to give signs of existence. It awoke, however, now that a foreigner, hardly fourteen years old, put forth pretensions to stage triumphs, which, appealing to all classes of society, were, perhaps, the only ones earnestly sought after in Italy. First, a cry was raised that it was shameful and absurd to think of entrusting the libretto of an Italian opera to a beardless composer, who was, moreover, a German. It was silly, they said, to expect from a child the knowledge of chiar' oscuro requisite for the stage. An officious friend expressed to Signora Bernasconi, the prima donna, his apprehensions about the result of the performance, which might compromise her reputation as a singer. We know that the prima donna in Italy is a tyrannical power from which the maestro has all to hope so long as he obeys, and all to dread if he prove rebellious. This friend, in his great zeal, had brought with him a whole bundle of new airs, which he begged the Signora, for Heaven's sake and her own, to sing instead of those composed by the boy. Fortunately, however, it is a very difficult task to deceive women with regard to matters in which their self-love is concerned. Signora Bernasconi had already seen the airs destined for her by Mozart, and felt satisfied that her sovereign will had never been better understood and accomplished. The maestro had written a part so important, so brilliant, and so perfectly suited to the lady's peculiar powers, that he was freely pardoned for not quite forgetting melody and instrumentation. Mozart was accustomed, at that period, to fit his airs as exactly to the capabilities of singers as a good tailor his clothes to his customers, to adopt Mozart's own words. The intrigue failed completely with the prima donna, and was not more successful with the principal male singer, Santorini, who, also, was thoroughly contented with his part, and confident of public approbation. Several other happy omens helped to tranquillize the elder Mozart, while the son appears never to have known anything of the fever which usually rages in the bosom of a composer, the day previous to a first representation. The face of the copyist beamed with pleasure, which was held a good sign, since people of this calling possess a marvellous gift of calculating beforehand the perquisites which a new opera is likely to bring in. If we can believe Leopold Mozart, the copies and secret sale of the pieces which made a furore, realised for the copyist a far greater sum than that received by the composer. At the first band rehearsal, the maestro's approaching triumph might have been read in the long faces of those who had so alarmed Leopold Mozart with their malicious prophecies. The singers and members of the orchestra declared unanimously that the music was clear, intelligible, and easy to play. The last was a great point for the performers in an Italian theatre at that period. The success of the opera was complete. Almost all the different pieces were tumultuously applauded, and several encored, both which facts were exceptions to the usual custom of the theatre at Milan, where it was the received custom to listen to the music of a new opera in silence. The cry of "Evviva il maestro! Evviva il maestrino!" (Long live the composer! Long live the little composer!) resounded continually through the house, and, on the subsequent evenings, the opera took its course alle stelle (to the stars), as the Italians express it.

The Gazetta di Milano, of the 2nd January, 1771, in speaking of Mithridate, gives us an interesting specimen of the manner in which musical criticisms were then written:—

"Last Wednesday, the Teatro Ducale opened with the production of a drama, entitled Mithridates, King of Pontus, which was received with general applause, as well on account of the tasteful scenery as of the excellence of the music and the skill of the performers. Several of the airs sung by Signora Bernasconi express passion in a lively manner, and move the hearts of the spectators. The young Capellmeister, who is not yet fifteen years of age, studies the beautiful in nature, and expresses it with a rare grace."

In spite of the expression, "studies the beautiful in nature," my readers must not imagine that Mithridate is a masterpiece, in the present acceptation of the word. This is out of the question, and the unanimous praise of the singers and musicians, the rapid and general success of the opera, and the article in the Milan paper, prove most clearly that our hero yoked his Pegasus to a cart, and followed the deep ruts through which so many of his predecessors had already driven. Mithridate has absolutely nothing in common with Mozart's classical works. It is neither more nor less than an Italian opera on the old pattern; one of those which do not live, leave no impression behind them, and have no claim to do either; one of those, in short, which owe their production to the fortuitous association of a prima donna, with a first male singer; and their whole success to the individual powers of these important personages, for, and by means of, whom, exclusively, they are allowed to exist, only to perish so soon as the singers in question retire to make room for other works composed for other artists. Gluck was the first who adapted the character of his music to the spirit of his poem, and sought the elements of success in the proper illustration of the poet's meaning, thus placing the singers in their true position. He was the master; they, the servants. From his time, lyrical dramas ceased to be of necessity ephemeral. Under the pens of men of genius, they acquired an intrinsic value which invested them with an element of permanency they never before enjoyed. The copyists no longer enriched themselves by the sale of particular pieces. The entire operas were in demand, and published in consequence.

However incomplete and undramatic the system then adopted by the Italians in the composition of an opera seria may now appear, when the hero sang soprano, and, with the exception of the airs allotted to the principal characters, the music, to which no one listened, was nothing better than a stopgap, great success was only to be obtained by some really striking beauties. That of Mithridate was due to several melodies, full of spirit and charm, while the whole work rose far above the mass of tragic operas such as were then composed in Italy. This, at least, is the opinion of all those critics, who, more fortunate than myself, have succeeded in obtaining a score of Mithridate. If their decision is based upon truth, a fact which I do not doubt, we are authorized in coming to the conclusion, that, previous to his fourteenth year, or, in other words, from his very first appearance in his new character, Mozart assumed a position equal to that attained by the cleverest musicians in the branch of art to which the majority of composers devoted themselves in the most musical country of the world.

The management of the theatre at Milan could not give the young maestro a better proof of their satisfaction than by commissioning him to write a second opera for the Carnival of 1773. Mozart had only to choose, for the managers of the principal theatres in Italy made him the most advantageous offers. He decided, however, in favour of the public he already knew, and by which he had been so favourably received.

Before our travellers left Milan, they met with a musical curiosity, which Leopold Mozart describes in one of his letters. Two beggars, a man and a woman, were singing in the street. The Mozarts, who heard them from a certain distance, at first thought that each was singing a different air. On approaching, however, they found, to their great surprise, that the two were singing a duet all in fifths. Thus were the traditions of the eleventh century still preserved in the streets of Milan.

From Milan, our travellers proceeded to Venice, where they passed a month in one continuous round of festivities, loaded with presents and receiving every day new marks of flattery and respect. The nobility came for them to their lodgings, and took them home in their own gondolas. Among the families that distinguished themselves in this way are to be found some of the most celebrated names of the Venetian aristocracy, such as the Cornaro, Grimani, Moncenigo, Dolfini, Baliero, etc.

After an absence of fifteen months, Mozart returned, for a short period, to his native town, taking back with him a store of fresh knowledge and a reputation which the homage of a people, considered as the most skilled in art of all European nations, had increased, and almost established beyond further controversy.

DRAMATIC.

HAYMARKET.—"Ballad-Opera" some twenty or thirty years ago constituted one of the principal attractions at Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres. In the same performance might be seen Macready, Braham, Sinclair, Miss Stephens, Miss Foote, Liston, Emery, etc. Great pains were expended upon the scenery and appointments, and a numerous orchestra and chorus were provided. Accordingly, we find that such ballad operas as Rob Roy, Guy Mannering, The Slave, etc., became stock-pieces, and held possession of the stage for many years. No small part of the attraction of these melodramas was derived from the music of Bishop, then in the zenith of his fame, whose glees, songs, and concerted pieces enjoyed universal esteem. But Bishop was not satisfied with writing occasional music to plays. He composed operas, and attempted to improve the scores of Mozart and Rossini, which did not add to his reputation, nor advance the interests of the art. Indirectly, however, he effected much good. The introduction of the works of the above-named composers helped to originate a taste for better music, and to weaken the influence of ballad-opera. Others, as well as Bishop, aided in bringing this about. Mr. Rophino Lacy adapted Rossini's Cenerentola for the English stage, with alterations, innovations, and interpolations, which, in his mistaken appreciation, were improvements. Although this was not the case, the music of the English Cinderella was too good not to please, and the opera had a long and successful run. Subsequently, the same gentleman fitted music from several operas of Rossini to a drama founded on Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, under the name of The Maid of Judah, which even surpassed Cinderella in attraction. The next advance made in operatic music was the translation, in their integrity, of works of the Italian and German composers. Der Freischütz, we believe, was the first opera, of a continental master, which was given (still with an interpolation or two) according to the original score of the composer. Its success was unparallelled. Oberon soon after was written expressly for Covent Garden, and a new impulse given to operatic music in this country. We pass over the disgraceful attempts made occasionally at Drury Lane and Covent Garden to alter the scores of Rossini and Auber, for the purpose of placing a tragic actor in the principal singer's part. Gustavus the Third had to be "arranged" in order that Mr. Warde might exhibit his histrionic powers in the King; and the music of Rossini's grandest work was used as a series of flourishes to show off Macready as the hero of Sheridan Knowles' William Tell. Mr. Bunn gave the last direct blow to the old ballad-opera. He engaged native composers to write original works for Drury Lane and Covent Garden; and produced, for the first time on the English stage, foreign operas as the composers wrote them. From that time may be dated the downfall of a class of amusements which delighted our predecessors, but which the progress of music has now almost entirely banished from our principal theatres.

Whatever objection we may have in general to the old ballad-opera, whose decadence we have briefly recorded above, we have not a word to offer against the revival of Guy Mannering at the Haymarket on Monday night; more especially since Mr. Buckstone did not attempt to make the music the principal feature, but relied rather on his acting company for the realization of the characters and incidents taken from Scott's wonderful story. Miss Cushman's Meg Merrilies alone would have warranted the reproduction. Mr. Buckstone, however, did not depend entirely upon Miss Cushman. He put forth his whole strength, and achieved a decided success. The cast of Guy Mannering was excellent in almost every point. Mr. Compton was Dominie Sampson; Mr. Rogers, Dandie Dinmont; Mr. Howe, Dirk Hatterick; Mr. W. Farren, Colonel Mannering; Mrs. L. S. Buckingham, Julia Mannering; Miss Julia Harland, Lucy Bertram; Miss Ellen Chaplin, Flora; and Mrs. Stanley, Mrs. M'Candlish. Mr. H. Corri was the principal gipsy, and Mr. and Mrs. Caulfield strengthened the chorus of gipsies. Of the above, we may award unqualified praise to Mr. Compton and Mr. Rogers. Mr. Compton did not indeed produce so much laughter in Dominie Sampsom as Liston, the original; but we question if Liston played the part with so much truthfulness, and simplicity. Mr. Compton was really pathetic in the scene where Lucy Bertram desires to part from the Dominie, and the profound attention of the audience was his best applause.

Mr. Rogers, who is rather diminutive for the athletic Liddlesdale farmer, nevertheless sustained the character of Dandie Dinmont with a thorough appreciation of the author's intention. This gentleman is always artistic; he understands his business perfectly, and is one of Mr. Buckstone's most sterling actors.

Mr. Elliott Galer—the new tenor, who was introduced to the English public by Mr. Stammers at the St. James's Theatre—made his first appearance at the Haymarket as Henry Bertram. Henry Bertram is exactly the character to suit a novice, and Mr. Elliott Galer laboured under no disadvantage in the part. This gentleman has a pleasing voice; but we cannot commend his method.

Miss Julia Harland was ladylike and unpretending in Lucy Bertram, and sang her songs neatly; and Mrs. L. S. Buckingham, although no singer, got through the music respectably. Miss Ellen Chaplin was excellent as Flora, Lucy Bertram's waiting-woman.

The Meg Merrilies of Miss Cushman is entirely original in conception and execution. All other actresses have represented her as a middle-aged woman, vigorous in body, sound in mind—a sort of Helen Macgregor in low life, with measured step and graceful action, dignified and stately, pompous and grandiloquent, an entirely conventional personage, unideal and unromantic. Such a character is certainly not the Meg Merrilies of Walter Scott. It is evident from the story, that, at the period of Henry Bertram's return from India, Meg Merrilies must have been between sixty and seventy years of age. Some time previous to the murder of Kennedy, when Henry Bertram was stolen, she had a grown-up son transported, and more than twenty years had elapsed since then. Indeed, the whole tenor of the narration tends to show that Meg Merrilies was far advanced in life at the period when the drama begins. Miss Cushman not only differs from all her predecessors in her estimation of the gipsy's age, but in her entire conception of the character. With her, Meg Merrilies is worn in mind as well as body, and a certain wild insanity directs her actions and governs her speech. Infuriated by circumstances, and enthusiastic by nature, she fancies herself possessed of the gift of prophecy, and treats all who come within her influence with sovereign contempt, as though she disdained to hold communion with man. One earthly feeling alone declares her kindred with humanity—her attachment to Harry Bertram, whom in infancy she has fondled at her knee, whom she has loved from a child, and whose restoration to the inheritance of his ancestors she lives only to fulfil. This reading is in the highest sense poetical, and Miss Cushman carries it out with wonderful art. Nothing can exceed the wildness of her looks, nor the terrible meaning of her actions and attitudes, which, though necessarily constrained and angular, have all the appearance of truth, and are eminently picturesque. When she rushes on the stage, in her first scene, and stands transfixed, as it were, into stone, gazing on Henry Bertram, with her grey locks dishevelled, her arm uplifted, her eyes flashing a wild and unearthly light, she presents one of the most striking pictures that can possibly be imagined. She looks, indeed, a Pythoness standing

> "On her tripod, agonized, and full
> Of inspiration gather'd from distress."

The whole of this scene is played with fearful intensity and grandeur. But, in the midst of her wildness and sublime passion, Miss Cushman does not lose sight of nature. In this scene she exhibited an exquisite touch of pathos, when taking leave of Henry Bertram, which appealed to every one, and brought down a tremendous burst of applause. We could call attention to many fine points in the scene with Dominie Sampson, especially where she fortells, in a high strain of eloquence and with an energy not to be surpassed, the re-establishment of the Bertram family in their ancestral home. Here Miss Cushman approached the sublime. Most exquisite, too, was her lament over the days gone by, and her apostrophe to the old willow tree in the glen—which sheltered her youth, and beneath whose shadow many a time and oft she had dangled her little darling Henry—was affecting in the extreme. We should not omit her singing of the ballad, "O slumber, my darling," in the first scene. Simple, and given without an effort, the expression was so genuine, the feeling so intense, the words so distinctly pronounced, and, indeed, the intonation so true, as, for a moment, to suggest the conclusion that Miss Cushman was as great a singer as an actress. At all events, she seemed inspired in her singing. It was perfect in its way, and no living artist could have rendered it more naturally, or more effectively.

The scene in the cave where Meg Merrilies is shot, is, of course, the crowning triumph of Miss Cushman's performance. Description must fail to do justice to the terrible reality of the dying scene. The variety of passions that agitate the old gipsy's mind at the moment she is struck by the bullet, the struggle to keep down her agonies and the knowledge of her approaching dissolution, her joy at finding Henry Bertram declared lord of Ellangowan, her wild efforts to join in the loud huzzas that proclaim him, and the final battle with exhausted nature, fighting to the utterance even with death, constituted one of the most overpowering dramatic exhibitions ever witnessed. Many will call the acting of Miss Cushman in this scene "melo-dramatic." So indeed it is. So was Edmund Kean's in the death scenes of Richard the Third, A New Way to Pay Old Debts, and the Iron Chest. So was Macready's in those of Macbeth, Werner, King Lear, and Hamlet. And so they ought to be. Edmund Kean said, with truth, "that every great tragedian must necessarily be a great melo-dramatic actor," and furnished an admirable illustration of his dogma in his own person. In conclusion, when all is over, and we would as tersely as possible give expression to our pent-up feelings respecting Miss Cushman's Meg Merrilies, we may indeed exclaim with Dominie Sampson—"PRO-DIGIOUS!"

STRAND.—The novelty this week has been the appearance of Miss H. Noel, a lady not unknown we believe, in London, as an artist of pleasing and varied attainments; and the vivacity and ease with which she played in the little extravaganza Hunting a Turtle, showed a talent which we hope to see developed in something better suited to call it forth. Miss Noel's personal qualifications are considerable. She has handsome and strongly-marked features, and a voice clear and well-toned. The pantomime continues its run.

ALTERING SHELLEY.

To the Editor of the Musical World.

SIR,—In your Journal of Saturday last, I find myself charged with the alteration of words, which were merely adapted by me at the suggestion of Mr. J. Hudson, comedian, who doubtless changed the line you quote, to suit the character and situation of the drama in which originally the serenade was introduced.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

134, Long Acre, Feb. 5th, 1854. ALFRED MELLON.

[Has not Mr. Mellon read Shelley—the most musical of poets?—ED.]

LUMLEY v. GYE.—This cause is to be tried in the Court of Queen's Bench on Monday, the 20th inst. The action is brought by Mr. Lumley against Mr. Gye, to recover compensation for the loss of Mdlle. Johanna Wagner's services. Damages are laid at £30,000. For the plaintiff Sir F. Thesiger, Sir F. Kelly, Messrs. Huddlestone, Cowling, and Haddestone; for the defendant the Attorney-General, and Messrs. Willis and Creasy are retained. A special jury has been nominated by Messrs. Lewis and Lewis, for the plaintiff, and will be reduced immediately.

M. SAINVILLE, the celebrated comic actor at the Palais-Royal, died on the 31st ult., at Pau, aged 48.

ANOTHER CHARITABLE MANAGER.

NOT to be outdone by the lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, Mr. Cooke, of Astley's, makes an offering to the poor, through the medium of their box. We quote from the papers:

"His Lordship received a check for 10*l.* for the poor-box, in a note, of which the following is a copy:—

"Feb. 3rd.

"My Lord,—It is with regret I read of the present low funds of the poor-box. I beg to hand to your Lordship the enclosed check, requesting your Lordship's kind acknowledgment in the Times, not with a view of egotism, but with a hope it may induce some of my brother managers, who, like myself have been blessed with a prosperous festive season, to contribute their mite to this benevolent fund.

"Your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

"WILLIAM COOKE.

"Astley's Royal Amphitheatre."

We suggest that Messrs. Kean, Webster, and Wigan should now step forward—as managers, to give soup, and as actors, to give coals. Mr. Robson might also give candles. Until the Italian Operas open, we refrain from advising Messrs. Lumley and Gye on the managerial-charity movement.

YANKEE DOODLE.

THE origin of this tune, so celebrated as a national air of the Revolution, is almost a mystery to the people of the present day. Long before the Revolution, the air was universally known as "Lady Fisher," a favourite New England jig. It was the practice, as with "Yankee Doodle" now, to sing it to impromptu verses—as, for example:—

"Lydia Locket lost her pocket,
Lydia Fisher found it—
Not a bit of money in it,
Only binding round it."

Before the war, the English, in contempt of the simplicity of Yankee manners, were accustomed to sing airs set to words invented for the occasion, ridiculing and deriding the New Englanders. "Yankee Doodle" was a kind of parody of "Lydia Fisher." The English officers, under civil and military appointments, countenanced these slurs. When the battles of Concord and Lexington began the war, the English, advancing in triumph, played "God save the King;" while the Americans when they made the retreat so disastrous to the invaders, struck up "Yankee Doodle," in answer to their oppressors.

From that time, "Yankee Doodle" was adopted throughout the American colonies, as the national air of the sons of liberty, while the "Methodists" accepted it as an appropriate nickname. Judge Martin, in the history of North Carolina, has given another account of the origin of "Yankee Doodle." He says it was invented at Albany, in 1755, and attributes it to a British officer, who exercised his pleasantry on the costume of the Americans, then assembling to join the expedition of General Johnson and Governor Shirley. The tune and words, says a writer in the Columbian Gazette, at Washington, were known as early as the time of Cromwell, to whom they were applied in a song called "Yankee Doodle."

"Yankee Doodle came to town,
Upon a little pony,
With a feather in his hat,
Upon a macaroni."

Cromwell went to Oxford on a small horse, with a single feather, fastened in a sort of knot called a "macaroni." That such an early origin may be the true one seems probable from the fact that, about the time strife was engendered at Boston, muskets were sometimes conveyed to the country in loads of manure, etc., which fact seems to be alluded to in the verse:

"Yankee Doodle came to town,
For to buy a firelock;
We will tar and feather him,
And so we will John Hancock."

HARMONIC UNION.—Handel's Acis and Galatea is announced for performance at Exeter Hall, on Monday, when Mozart's accompaniments are to be introduced for the first time in this country.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11TH, 1854.

IN the year 1850 a concert was given at Exeter Hall, for which Mdlle. Jenny Lind (now Mdme. Otto Goldschmidt) afforded her services gratuitously, in conjunction with some English singers of repute. More than one circumstance connected with this concert has caused it to be remembered by those immediately concerned. The performance consisted of Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah. There was a grand orchestra, a powerful chorus, and a conductor of eminence—Mr. Benedict. The performance, on the whole, was the best ever given in England (and probably elsewhere), of that immortal masterpiece. An incident occurred which is worth recalling, if only as a memento of Mdlle. Lind's artistic morality, and of her sincerity in the pursuit of the object for which the concert had been instituted. Two well-known English singers, who proffered their services, or rather solicited the honour of assisting on the occasion, did not think it necessary to attend rehearsals. Like a celebrated conductor, either they had no time, or they considered that a work so easy and familiar as Elijah would go just as well without preparation. Not so Mdlle. Lind. She, on the contrary, insisted that rehearsals were necessary, and further, that the presence of the chief singers was as indispensable as that of the orchestra and chorus. We remember well, that she came to the minute—before the minute, indeed—to every rehearsal, with or without chorus, at Mr. Benedict's private residence and at Exeter Hall. When, at a full rehearsal, the two well-known English singers failed to appear, Mdlle. Jenny Lind declared positively that she would not sing with them at night; and as she was the great attraction of the concert her will was law, and not to be disobeyed. Accordingly, two other well-known English singers were invited, and, eagerly accepting the invitation, were forthwith installed in the place of the first "well-known," who, like a celebrated conductor, had not time to attend rehearsals. The sequel need not be recapitulated; it was a painful one; and we shall not regret if Oblivion has laid her finger on it.

"What next?"—our readers will ask. Quid tum postea? It was the occasion of the concert that was sacred; and this, more than the abstract claims of Elijah on the respect of all who call themselves musicians, excited the lively interest of the Swedish songstress, and forced her, against her nature, to appear unamiable and tyrannical to her fellow artists. That she had reason on her side, our readers will presently own.

The occasion, we have said, was a sacred one. The concert at Exeter Hall was projected by a committee of amateurs and professors, for the purpose of laying the foundation of a fund, to be devoted, in the best way that might afterwards be decided, to raising a memorial, through which the sense entertained by musical England of the genius and influence of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy should be perpetuated. A few were for a monument, others not for a monument; but all concurred in the propriety of some manifestation of the kind. The committee having been formed (it is not requisite here to mention the names of the gentlemen who composed it), it was speedily resolved that a concert should be given, and that application should be made to Jenny Lind—whose veneration for Mendelssohn was notorious—to grant her name and services. It was calculated that this would be an auspicious beginning, and would be the means of placing the "Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund" on a solid foundation. The belief was warranted. Jenny Lind consented, without a word of further explanation; the concert was given, and nearly £1200 sterling realised.

This first step effected, and effected with such éclat, the committee, after voting a letter of thanks to Mdlle. Lind, set to work about considering what should be done with the money in hand. At the end of much discussion, the monument was abandoned to the Sacred Harmonic Society (who gloriously carried out their original scheme, by possessing themselves of a small bust in plaster of Paris, which was invisible at a hundred paces); and the more congenial notion of a "Mendelssohn Scholarship," for gratuitous education in music, was suggested and adopted. The money was at once to be funded, and the interest allowed to accumulate, until the necessary arrangements could be made. In the mean time arose the question as to the locale of the scholarship. Of course, in a very short period, the proposition that London should be the place, and the Royal Academy of Music endowed with the privilege, was put aside as absurd and untenable. The only reasons that could be urged in support of it, were, that the money was English money, that the idea of the concert was suggested and that the concert took place in London, that Mendelssohn had been thoroughly appreciated in England before he was accredited in Germany, and that his most glorious artistic successes had been achieved, and his greatest works produced, in this country. These were of course insufficient, and the superior claims of Leipsic were established, with very little difficulty—of Leipsic, where they have taken Mendelssohn down from his pedestal, to put Schumann in his place, and where the four "eminent professors," who have been entrusted with preparing his MSS. for publication, think it a good year's work to select half-a-dozen songs with words, and as many without, for committal to the hands of the engraver!

However, Leipsic was adopted. The "scholarship" was to be founded in the Leipsic Conservatory of Music, of which Mendelssohn had been "Principal;" and, after some little delay, the £1,200 (Jenny Lind's virtual subscription) was sent, as we understand, to the city of the Gewandhaus. Having done which, the committee rubbed their hands, and ——fell asleep.

Four years have elapsed. The committee of the "Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund" have not been dissolved; and yet they have never met since. How is that to be explained? The undertaking was surely not meant to stop with the Jenny Lind subscription—to be suddenly arrested, as though, instead of a promising beginning, a death-blow had been given to all their hopes. And yet it would almost seem so, since, although still undissolved, the committee have never re-assembled. Has their ardour cooled, now that seven years have elapsed since music died with Mendelssohn? If not, what?

Where is the money funded? To how much, the interest having been allowed to accumulate, does it now amount?—and what is to be done with it? The Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund Committee, it is clear, if not dissolved, have at least suspended functions. Their "occupation's gone"—not so, we trust, the money.

But seriously, the question is a grave one. Madlle. Lind has been literally duped. Would she, in the zenith of her popularity, when her services were purchased at any price, have consented to accord them gratuitously for the sake of having the proceeds of her attraction "funded," without a definite purpose, and for the ultimate benefit of no one knows whom? Assuredly not. Unless, therefore, a satisfactory account is rendered of the progress of the Mendelssohn Testimonial Fund, and of the present aspect of Mdlle. Lind's £1,200, Mdlle. Lind, we repeat, has been duped. It behoves the committee—among whom, by the way, we can remember the names of Sir George Smart, Mr. Benedict, Mr. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Klingemann, Mr. Chorley, and Mr. Buxton (what is the use of concealing them?)—to call a meeting and inquire into the matter without further delay.

We shall return to the subject.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"Sabbath Evenings," Seven Sacred Pieces for the pianoforte or organ. Composed by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. In Three Books. Wessel and Co.

No. 1 and 2 are arrangements of two vocal motets, founded on themes that probably belong to the Lutheran chorales. As their origin will not be traced by the majority of purchasers, we are of opinion that the publishers should, on that account, if on no other, have stated the source from which they derived them. The fact that they are Mendelssohn's, however, is enough to invest them with a peculiar interest, had they no other claims to notice. No. 1, entitled "In deep Distress," forms, in its present shape, a kind of suite de pièces, comprising five movements, chorale, fugue, adagio, chorale, chorale—all but the adagio being in the key of F minor. The chorale is first given in plain four-part harmony, and then made the subject of a fugue, also in four parts. These constitute the first and second movements. The chorale a fine tune (something in the character of "To Thee, O Lord, I yield my Spirit," in St. Paul, and in the same key) is richly harmonized. The fugue, without being elaborate, is extremely interesting. That it should be masterly is only what might have been expected from Mendelssohn. The adagio, a flowing movement in A flat, 3-8 time, serves as a relief to what follows and precedes it; but as the 4th movement is merely an elaboration of the first, the subject of the chorale being introduced in augmentation, while the 5th and last is the tune itself, repeated with different harmony, its exact relationship to the rest of the suite, which is all in one key and founded upon one subject, is difficult to explain. It will at once be observed, even by those who have never seen or heard the motets, that from the manner in which the parts are distributed the whole of these movements might be sung by voices. Not that they will be found the less welcome on that account.

No. 2—"In the Midst of Life"—bears equally strong evidence of having been composed for voices, with organ or wind instrument accompaniments. It begins with a solemn chorale in C minor, which is twice interrupted by an agitato movement in F minor, marked vivace, and at the end developed to some length as a coda. We have nothing to offer about this piece beyond the simple assertion that it is fine music, and must be very impressive in its original shape.

No. 3—"Ave Maria"—arranged for two performers on the pianoforte, is the most beautiful, though the least elaborate of the three numbers. The opening, in A major, is lovely; the episode, in F sharp minor, with a moving bass in a style peculiarly Mendelssohnian, is lovely; and the whole is a gem. Every musician should possess it—in its original form, if possible—if not, in its present shape as a pianoforte duet.

All three numbers were probably composed for the Berlin Chapel.

"Novello's Original Octavo Editions of Sacred Oratorios." In vocal score. With a separate accompaniment for organ or piano. Arranged by Vincent Novello. J. Alfred Novello.

We have received the first four numbers of a new edition, or rather a new issue, of Mr. Novello's Octavo Oratorios. They consist of The Messiah, Judas Maccabæus, Samson, and The Creation. The present issue, considerably reduced in price, is handsomely bound in scarlet cloth. Mr. Novello first printed his octavo edition of Oratorios in 1846. Nothing of the kind had been previously attempted, and the evident utility and unprecedented cheapness of the edition at once ensured a large sale. Another edition of the same oratorios having been published, and at the same price as that of Novello, he boldly challenged competition by a further reduction, and, as there is no deterioration in the quality, there can be little doubt of the result.

The new edition of the Sacred Oratorios has many recommendations. Its portable form, the clearness of the printing, and its neat appearance, all combine with its cheapness to render it attractive. The reduction of the instrumental accompaniments for the pianoforte has been skilfully made by Mr. Novello, although, to render them easy, a great many figures and passages which appear in the original scores have been omitted.

"The Omni." An entire New Dance, for all the World. By M. Layland. Addison and Hollier.

We might find fault with Mr. Layland's English (his entire), but we have no objection to his "Omni Dance," which is agreeable and very well-written. For the figure, or figures, we must refer the reader to the author's explanations, which are given at length. The "Omni Dance" is a long piece, the various parts or figures in which are frequently repeated, the two prevailing accents being those of the march and polka. It betrays an evidence of good musicianship, and a general taste for harmony, not often to be remarked in ordinary dance music.

"The Pacha's Polka." "Zara"—Valse à deux-temps. By Carl Höchst. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.

"The Pacha's Polka"—we fear the Generalissimo of the Turkish army will have much to answer for before the war is over—is very lively, which is a great feature in a polka, and has an excellent part for the cornet-à-pistons, which is another. Moreover, there is no pretence about it, and it is extremely easy to play.

The Valse à deux-temps is even better than the polka, and quite as easy. The first and third numbers are remarkably tuneful. There is a cornet part to this, too. Nothing can be simpler or better suited to beginners.

The Emperor of the French has sent, through his ambassador, the sum of one thousand francs towards the fund in aid of a monument to C. M. Von Weber, to be erected at Eutin, the birth-place of the composer.

Beethoven's Mass in D.—We have heard it reported that the Sacred Harmonic Society and the old Philharmonic Society intend joining their forces together, in order to give a grand public performance of the above unfathomable composition. "Too many cooks, etc."

The Misses Pyne's Piano.—At the concert given at Wigton, on the 18th ult., the Misses Pyne were not a little surprised to be set down to the identical pianoforte which formerly belonged to them, and upon which Miss Louisa Pyne played the first piece she was ever taught. This incident so affected her that she shed tears on leaving the room.

The Queen's Piper.—Sandy M'Kay, her Majesty's piper, has gone out of his mind, and there is little hope of his recovery. He wrote a few days since a letter to Colonel Phipps, in which he stated he was in possession of documents proving him to be the lawful heir to the throne; but, as he had no wish to dethrone Queen Victoria, he demanded an interview. This was granted, and, on Sandy making his appearance at the Castle, he was put under restraint. M'Kay was the first piper in Scotland. His duty was to play before the Queen and Royal suite at dinner, and at the dancing of the Scotch reels.

Rome.—Elisa Valasco; o, Lorenzo di Medici, a new opera by Pacini, has been produced with indifferent success. Barbieri-Nini sings the principal part.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT'S SOIRÉES.

Mr. Sterndale Bennett gave his first performance of "classical pianoforte music" for the present season, in the Hanover-Square Rooms. There was a crowded and fashionable audience, which, under the influence of a new system of lighting (the patent of Mr. Leslie, whose method of ventilation was also adopted), looked unusually brilliant. But while the dresses of the ladies, and the ladies themselves, could bear the unwonted light triumphantly, it was different with the walls and faded paraphernalia of the rooms, which came out from the ordeal, dark and dingy.

Mr. Bennett's programmes are always worth quoting, and the present one is not less so than any of its precursors:

Part First.—Quintet (Op. 41) in F minor—Dussek; Preludes and Fugues—Handel and Mendelssohn; Preghiera, Mrs. Lockey—Winter; Sonata in F major, Op. 5, Pianoforte and Violoncello—Beethoven.

Part Second.—Preludes and Lessons, Op. 33, Pianoforte—Bennett; Sonata (A major), Pianoforte and Violin—Mozart; Songs, Mrs. Lockey—W. S. Bennett; Sonata, Pianoforte (No. 2, Op. 27)—Beethoven.

Dussek's quintet, Mozart's sonata, and the violoncello sonata by Beethoven (an early work) are somewhat too much of a family; and this said, there is no other point open to objection in the above very interesting selection. The works of Dussek are too good to be neglected, as they are at the present time, and Mr. Bennett must be praised for reviving so fine a specimen of the master, no less than for its admirable performance by himself and his coadjutors Messrs. Blagrove (violin), Dando (viola), Piatti (violoncello), and Reynolds (double-bass.) The quintet pleased so well, that the quartet in E flat, or the trio in C, of the same composer, might be introduced, with a certainty of success, at one of the future concerts. The preludes and fugues were Handel's in D minor (from the Suites des Pièces), and Mendelssohn's in D major (from the Six Preludes and Fugues.) The theme of Handel's fugue begins like the old air, "Charlie is my darling." It is the least elaborate of the five which appear in the Suites des Pièces. We have heard nothing more finished than Mr. Bennett's execution of this fugue. Such tone and pure legato has perhaps not been heard since the days of Cramer and Dussek. We entirely differ from the intelligent critic of the Daily News, about Mendelssohn's prelude and fugue in D major, which, in direct contradistinction to his opinion, we consider, not merely as one of Mendelssohn's happiest essays in the particular style of composition to which they belong, but as equal in beauty, originality, and ingenious workmanship to any of Bach's or Handel's. The extraordinary length and development of the allegro, in Beethoven's early sonata, must strike every one with astonishment. It shows how soon one great characteristic of his after matured style appeared in his compositions. (The three pianoforte sonatas dedicated to Haydn, and the first set of trios, may be cited as similar instances.) The execution of the sonata by Mr. Bennett, and his accomplished co-adjutor, Sig. Piatti, was beyond reproach.

From the Preludes and Lessons—those graceful trifles which Mr. Bennett composed expressly for the use of the Queen's College, London—he selected No. 19 (Aria), No. 20 (Caprice), No. 22 (The Year's last Hour), and No. 23 (Armonioso Brillante), and played them so charmingly that the audience called him back, and he was obliged to give three more. We have only one fault to find with these lessons—viz., that they are too short for their style; and whenever we hear any of them we feel inclined to say—like Grizzle to the ghost of King Arthur—"If no more, why so much?"

The most faultless performance of the evening, on the part of Mr. Bennett, was the sonata, for pianoforte and violin, the finest Mozart has written, with the first movement of which Beethoven was as much taken as Weber with the last—witness their respective obligations, as acknowledged in their works. Mr. Blagrove's pure tone and admirably correct execution were thoroughly suited in the allegro and presto; but in the andante a little more of what is romantically designated "soul" would have been welcome. The theme, though simple, must not be coldly played. The sonata in E flat (quasi fantasia) from Beethoven's Op. 27, which opens with one of the composer's most expressive melodies, and concludes with one of his most spirited finales, is very rarely played in public, although, in spite of the anti-sonata form of its first part, it is a work of singular originality and beauty. The minuet, too, is quaint and capricious; and the recurrence of the adagio, just before the termination of the finale, is an idea of which later composers have taken frequent advantage. Every one was delighted to hear this sonata; and few will complain, if, at one of the next soirées, Mr. Bennett were to play the sonata in F sharp (Op. 78) or that in F major (Op. 54), which are quite as seldom heard as the one introduced with so much success on Tuesday evening.

The vocal music was as unexceptionable as was the singing of Mrs. Lockey. Winter's "O, Giove" has lost much of its ancient charm; but it is a fine melody for all that. The two songs by Mr. Bennett were, "Musing on the roaring Ocean," (from the Six Songs), of which the music is worthy of the burning words of Burns; and a MS. song, "To a Flower," a touching illustration of one of the charming lyrics of Barry Cornwall. The last was greatly admired, and Mrs. Lockey was compelled to repeat it.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The concert of last Wednesday comprised some novelties. The directors on this, the occasion of their benefit night, introduced, for the first time, two young ladies and one elderly gentleman. The ladies were Miss Maria Simpson and Miss Lucy Ledger; the gentleman, Mr. T. Young. To the Wednesday Evening Concerts we are indebted for hearing many singers and instrumentalists, who probably, but for them, would have remained unknown. At these performances, untried artists have a chance of testing their ability; there is nothing exclusive in their management. Of the three new appearances of Wednesday last, we prefer Miss Lucy Ledger, although she was so nervous as scarcely to be able to sing a note. Under such circumstances it was hardly judicious in the débutante to accompany herself on the pianoforte; but, notwithstanding Miss Lucy Ledger's nervousness, a pleasing and agreeable style was apparent. Miss Maria Simpson was not nervous and did not accompany herself on the pianoforte; she was consequently heard to greater advantage than Miss Lucy Ledger and produced a greater effect. She was moreover honoured with an encore. We beg Mr. T. Young's pardon if we have set him down erroneously as a "first appearance." He has a tenor voice of agreeable quality, and sings with taste. He was encored in one of Moore's melodies; he also sang Parry's ballad "Fair and faithful, too" with great applause.

The Concert opened with a selection from the works of Auber. The band played the overture to the Crown Diamonds, Mr. Augustus Braham sang the barcarole from Masaniello, with chorus, and "My sister dear," from Masaniello—not from La Muette de Portici. Miss Grace Alleyne sang "On yonder Rock reclining," from Fra Diavolo, and Elvira's recitative and aria from Masaniello. Both these favourite artists acquitted themselves well. Miss Louisa Pyne was encored in "Ah, je veux briser ma chaîne," from the Crown Diamonds, which she sang with great brilliancy and facility. Mr. Leffler gave "When Time hath bereft thee," from Gustavus (not Auber's), and the selection from the great French composer terminated with a chorus from Fra Diavolo. Herr Meyer Lutz is not a pianist of much force. He plays in time and executes neatly, but is wanting in tone, breadth, and power. He performed the Allegretto and Finale from Chopin's second pianoforte concerto, in F. Of the rest of the performers we must speak briefly. Madame F. Lablache sang an aria of Mercadante, and, with her husband, the comic duet "Oh! guardate che figura." Miss Stabbach surprised us by her vigorous reading of Verdi's "Ernani, involami," which, nevertheless, is always ineffective in a concert room. Madame Newton Frodsham sang Pacini's "Sommo cielo" (Schiava in Bagdad) admirably, and was loudly applauded. Miss Louise Christine performed a solo on the harp with great success; and Mr. Viotti Collins, a solo on the violin. The most interesting novelty, however, was a clever new overture, in F. sharp minor, by Mr. G. Cusins, which might have been better performed.

Meanwhile the directors have given new life and impetus to their present series, by the engagement, for three nights, of Mr. Sims Reeves, who will make his first appearance on Wednesday next.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE second performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah took place on Thursday night, at Exeter Hall, before an overflowing audience. The singers were Misses Louisa Pyne, Dolby, and Bertha Street, Mrs. Lockey, Messrs. Herberte, A. Novello, Smythson, Walker, and Signor Belletti. This was, in many respects, the finest execution of Mendelssohn's great work that we have ever heard in London. The choruses, for the most part, were surprisingly well sung. The only novelty in the vocal department was the début of Mr. Herberte, who, supplying the place of Mr. Sims Reeves at a few hours' notice, had no easy task to achieve. Mr. Herberte, however, proved himself a good musician, and a singer of considerable taste and acquirement. His voice is an agreeable, if not a powerful tenor. He pleased the audience, and satisfied the connoisseurs that he had not undertaken a task beyond his means. Sig. Belletti, on this occasion, sang the whole of the music of Elijah, and acquitted himself extremely well. If he perseveres in the study of sacred music, he will be a valuable addition to the Exeter Hall Concerts—more especially during the absence of Herr Formes. The other singers exhibited their accustomed talent. The unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine Eyes," by Miss L. Pyne, Miss Dolby, and Mrs. Lockey, though taken too slow, was as perfect an example of concerted singing as we ever listened to.

As the first performance of Elijah this season was very faulty, the excellence of that of Thursday night was the more gratifying. A rehearsal of the chorus, under the direction of Mr. Costa (for the first time, we believe, these three years), took place in the interval between the two concerts. Here was the secret. Elijah is announced for repetition on Friday, the 17th inst.

FOREIGN.

PARIS (Feb. 5).—At the Académie Impériale de Musique, Sophie Cruvelli, in the Huguenots, continues to attract crowded houses. The rehearsals of the Vestale continue, but nothing is yet decided as to who is to play the part of Licinius. The question has been submitted to three arbitrators, selected from among our most eminent artists. Rossini's Moïse is also in rehearsal for the début of the Italian tenor, Brignoli.—At the Opéra-Comique, the new work by Scribe and Meyerbeer is almost ready for production.—At the Théâtre Italien, the management does not relax in its endeavours, but produces a new work, or rather an old one, every week. On Thursday, the Gazza Ladra was performed, with Alboni in Ninetta, which she has already played in Paris and in London. Tamburini was the father, and Gardoni played the young soldier. Signor Dalle Aste, a new basso, made his début as the Podestà, with decided success. This gentleman sang once in London, at the concert of Miss Arabella Goddard, in the Hanover Square Rooms, two seasons ago. The singing of Alboni was nothing short of perfection. On Sunday, the Puritani was played, with Signor Graziani for the first time in the part of Ricardo. On Tuesday, Mdlle. Petrowich made her début in Lucrezia Borgia.

We hear that Mdlle. Clauss, on her (imaginary) road to St. Petersburgh, has given concerts at Cologne, Düsseldorf, Elberfeld, and Bonn, with great success. At the court of Hanover, she played twice, and received the most flattering testimonials from the King and Queen. After the second concert, Mdlle. Clauss was summoned into the apartments of the Queen, who presented her with a magnificent bracelet, enriched with diamonds. Mdme. Clara Schumann (late Wieck) played at the same concert. From Hanover Mdlle. Clauss proceeds to Leipsic, where she is to perform the concerto in C minor of Beethoven, some of Heller's studies, and other pieces. The Misses Dulcken lately played at the Théâtre Italien, for the benefit of Mdme. Aldegonde. M. and Mdme. Deloffre have recommenced their soirées. A musical and dramatic soiré has been given by Mdlle. Stella Colas who was assisted by M. Samson of the Comédie Française, M.M. Roger, Alard, Goria &c. Although Mdlle. Stella Colas is but fifteen years of age, her talent as a tragedian is extraordinary. She recited the dream of Lucrèce, by Ponsard, and the fourth and fifth scenes of Les Horaces. Méry has written some verses about her, in which he predicts that she will be a future Rachel. M. Fétis is in Paris.

The second concert of the Société Sainte-Cécile, on Sunday, Jan. 29th, was very numerously attended. The performances commenced with the overture to Euryanthe, followed by Haydn's Storm and Calm, which was sung by Mdlle. Dussy, of the Académie Impériale, Mdlle. Vogler, and Messrs. Mercier, Guyot, and chorus, the conductor being Mons. Wekerlin. After this, a serenade for stringed instruments, by M. Gouvy, and the finale to Euryanthe were given, the concert concluding with Beethoven's symphony in A major (No. 7).

The Société des Concerts des Jeunes Artistes lately gave their third concert in the Salle Herz, as usual. Beethoven's symphony in C major (No. 1), and an overture by M. Demersmann, were the principal instrumental pieces. Mdlle. Dobré was the vocalist.

MARSEILLES.—A melancholy accident attended the last representation of the Prophète. In the fifth act, a young dancer, Mdlle. Marra, was on the stage, when the fire caught her dress, which was of gauze. In her fright the unfortunate young girl ran against a part of the scenery from which the flames were emitted, and was soon enveloped in them. Some of her comrades approached and threw their cloaks over her; but it was too late. Mdlle. Marra did not survive her injuries, and died very shortly after. Her funeral took place amidst general mourning. The theatre was closed on the occasion.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, (January 14th.)—Another honourable distinction is intended in our city for the King of Wurtemberg's capellmeister, Herr Lindpaintner. The committee of the Lower Rheniah Music-Festival, who, in 1851, had already engaged the services of Herr Lindpaintner, have resolved—"that, remembering the distinguished talent displayed by that eminent musician in conducting the last music-festival, and in particular the beneficial influence he exercised upon all the executants, Herr Lindpaintner shall again be invited to direct the festival of 1854." The offer has been accepted, and, at the termination of his engagement with the New Philharmonic Concerts in London, Herr Lindpaintner will proceed to Aix-la-Chapelle.

BRUSSELS.—The second concert of the Conservatoire took place on Sunday, January 29th, a week later than originally intended, the officers of the regiment of Guides having announced a Matinée Musicale for the same day and the same hour as those fixed on for the concert of the Conservatory. This deprived Mons. Fétis of some of his best wind instruments, and the concert was, therefore, postponed until the 29th of January. The principal features of the programme were the overture to Leonora, and Félicien David's Désert. Mdlle. Rosa Kastner, the pianist, has not yet appeared in public, although here about a month. She has, however, played at several private réunions, and will shortly give a soirée of vocal and instrumental music.

VIENNA.—In celebration of Mozart's birthday his opera of Don Juan was performed, instead of Belmonte und Constans, (Il Seraglio) as originally intended. Mesdames La Grua, and Wildauer, and Messieurs Beck, Staudigl, and Draxler were the principle singers.—A concert was given at the Academy of Music on the 25th of January, on which occasion the 27th psalm by Reissiger, and a tenor solo, with chorus, "Gott behütet alle Frommen," by Lindpaintner, attracted general attention. Mdlle. Hauris sang a lied by Eckert, "Tausendschön," and Mdlle. Beyer the favourite melody of Curschmann, "Der Kleine Hans," (No, I will not bear it any longer.)—At the Hof-Theater Nicolai's opera, "Die Lustigen Weiber" (Merry Wives of Windsor), has been revived.—A new mass composed by Edouard Grudak, a pupil of the Academy of Music, is said to possess considerable merit.

NAPLES.—Among the papers left by Bellini, a hitherto unknown opera, entitled Adelson and Salvina, has lately been discovered and pronounced genuine by the Conservatory. It will shortly be published here as well as in England and France.—Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung.

ST. PETERSBURG, 9th January.—M. Ciardi, principal flautist to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, has made his début at a concert given by the Philharmonic Society for the benefit of the widows and orphans of its members.—The Prophète becomes more and more successful at the opera. Tamberlik's Jean of Leyden continues to excite enthusiasm. The part of Fides is hardly suited to the powers of Madame La Grange.

BOSTON.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Jullien's benefit and that of Mademoiselle Anna Zerr, concluded the second series of the "Jullien Concerts" given in this town. Jullien has fairly won the favour of the Bostonians, no less by his talents than by his bonhommie, and his kindness to every one with whom he comes in contact. The spacious Music Hall was crowded to excess on the occasion of Jullien's benefit. There was not standing room. Even the orchestra seats were encroached on by the public, and the artists had barely room to play. But good nature and a mutual wish to accommodate prevailed. The members of the City Guard and their ladies occupied the eastern wing of the second balcony. "The Sleigh Polka," dedicated to that corps by Jullien, constituted one of the attractions of the evening. "The American Quadrille" created the usual excitement, and the whole audience rose as the "National Anthem" was performed, the ladies joining with all their might in the clapping and cheering. The farewell burst of applause to Jullien at the end was loud and vehement. The receipts on Jullien's night, I understand, were as large as any ever received at any concert in the Music Hall.

PRAGUE.—On the 27th of January a Vocal Mass by Rohführer, a Graduale by Liszt, and an Offertorium by Lohr, were performed at St. Clement's Church.

MUNICH, (24th of Jan.)—The Hof-Capelle gave its first concert for the season at the Odéon. Beethoven's Mass in D was the principal feature.

NICE.—The Bishop of Nice has revived the action which he commenced thirteen years ago against the executors of the late Paganini, whom he has summoned before a commission of three Archbishops, to decide whether Paganini ought to lie interred in holy ground.

STRASBURGH.—On Sunday Le Père Gaillard, a comic opera by M. Reber, was performed for the first time. The interest excited by this work is explained by the fact of M. Reber having been born at Strasburgh.

PESTH.—Madlle. Agnes Bury, the soprano, who made so favourable an impression last year in England, is at the opera here.

ROUEN.—We have had a good season here. Puget has confirmed his success of last year. Mdmes. Lelèbvre, Widemann, and M. Poultier, the tenor, complete the company.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—(From our own Correspondent).—The first subscription concert of our Philharmonic Society, for the present season, took place on Tuesday, and was attended by a numerous and fashionable audience. The artistes were Miss Arabella Goddard, Mdme. Amedei, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, Mr. D. Land, and M. Sainton. So much had been said of Miss Goddard and Mdme. Amedei, that their appearance excited unusual curiosity, and the expectations of the audience were realized. Miss Arabella Goddard, although only eighteen years of age, is decidedly our most rising pianist. In her are united the severe and pure style of Charles Hallé and the execution of the Thalberg school. Her tone is full and round, her touch firm, yet, when necessary, of fairy-like delicacy, while her manual dexterity is prodigious. On the present occasion, her qualifications were severely tested in Beethoven's sonata, for violin and piano, dedicated to Kreutzer, the same master's "Choral Fantasia," a fantasia by Wallace, and the "Sultan's March" of Rossini, arranged by Benedict. In the first she displayed a thorough acquaintance with all the varied difficulties of the composition, and frequently excited the applause of the audience. In the "Choral Fantasia," she completely succeeded in realizing the highly-poetical fancies of the composer, and gave her part of the music with a brilliancy of colouring and executive skill, which fully bore out the words sung by the chorus in praise of music. The fantasia was admirably given by all concerned—the chorus singing with a delicacy which gave unmitigated satisfaction. After Wallace's fantasia (on airs from Maritana), Miss Goddard, being rapturously encored, played a brilliant piece by Stephen Heller, "On Song's bright Pinions," founded on one of Mendelssohn's songs. Her last performance, the "Sultan's March" was also loudly redemanded, but this time the young pianist was content to return to the orchestra and curtsey her acknowledgments. In fine, Miss Goddard succeeded in making an unmistakeable impression on the Liverpool public—the most cold and apathetic in the kingdom. We cannot assert that Madame Amedei is equal to Alboni: but we have not for many years heard a more rich contralto voice than hers. This lady, said to be an Englishwoman, is certainly a charming singer, and will be a great acquisition to our operatic stage. She sang the duet "Bella Imago," from Semiramide, with Mr. Weiss, "Se m' abandonni," from Mercadante's Nicotri, "Ah, mon fils," from the Prophète; and an English ballad by Mr. Land. M. Sainton is a violinist of the first rank, a careful and conscientious player—his tone delicate, and his execution finished. In the Beethoven duet with Miss Goddard, his performance frequently provoked applause, but his own fantasia on themes from Lucrezia Borgia came too late in the evening. Mr. and Mrs. Weiss delighted the audience with some favourite songs and, with the other vocalists, joined in several concerted pieces. The chorus, in addition to the "Choral Fantasia," sang "All hail, our Queen Victoria!" The band played Weber's Jubilee Overture, an overture by Lindpaintner, and Marliani's to Xarcarilla. The concert did not terminate till half-past eleven o'clock.

Ibid.—MR. E. W. THOMAS brought his second series of shilling concerts at the Philharmonic to a conclusion on Saturday week. Notwithstanding the slack attendance the first fortnight, the receipts have left him a handsome surplus after the payment of all expenses.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The sixth concert of the Classical Chamber-Music Society, took place on Thursday, the 2nd inst., in the Town Hall, and was brilliantly attended. The following was the programme:—

Part First.—Quintet—(D Minor, Op. 130)—Spohr. Sonata—Pianoforte—(D, Op. 10, No. 3)—Beethoven.

Part Second.—Quartet—(E Flat, No. 2, Op. 12)—Mendelssohn. Air Varié—Pianoforte and Violoncello—(D)—Mendelssohn. Nocturne—Pianoforte—(E Flat, Op. 9)—Chopin. Berceuse—Pianoforte—(D Flat, Op. 57)—Chopin. Study—Pianoforte—(A Minor, Op. 45)—Thalberg.

The above selection differed from its predecessors in having no trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello—and containing a pianoforte quintet, and a quartet for stringed instruments. To make these as perfect as possible, Hallé secured in addition to Molique, as first fiddle, and Piatti as violoncello, Mr. J. Carrodus (a pupil of Molique), as second violin, and Mr. Baetens of our Concert Hall orchestra, as tenor. The playing of the four in the quintet was beyond all praise, while a more perfect stringed quartet has rarely been heard in Manchester. Mr. Carrodus, who is apparently quite a youth, made his first appearance here; and it is no slight praise to say that he executed his part in a style worthy of the artists with whom he was associated. Mr. Baetens was even better than usual. Except Hill, he is the best tenor-player we have heard in Manchester. Spohr's most recent quintet is replete with freshness and originality. The quartet of Mendelssohn is a wonderful work, even without the consideration that it was composed before he was fifteen years of age! The second movement, the canzonetta in G minor, so Mendelssohnian, and therefore so beautiful, was enthusiastically encored. Hallé played finely in Spohr's quintet, and the solo sonata of Beethoven was a masterly performance. The duet by Mendelssohn—which was given at the second concert this season, was now repeated "by desire"—it was charmingly played by Hallé and Piatti, who seemed no less to understand the author than each other. Hallé's final selection of solo pieces was less interesting than usual, although his performance was entitled to unqualified approval.

MANCHESTER.—At Mr. Weston's last Saturday Evening Concerts, Mr. De France made his first appearance. This gentleman was one of the principal soloists of the Bernaise party, which made so successful an impression, about two years ago, in the Free-trade Hall.

BIRMINGHAM.—(From a Correspondent.)—An extra concert was given at the Town Hall, by the Choral Festival Society, on Friday, February 3rd, on which occasion Madame Amedei, Madame Weiss, Miss Arabella Goddard, Mr. G. Tedder, Mr. Land, Mr. Weiss, and M. Sainton appeared. The feature of the evening was Frank Mori's Fridolin, the merits of which you have so often discussed that it would be superfluous in me to say more than that Mesdames Amedei and Weiss, with Messrs. G. Tedder and Weiss, were most successful, and warmly applauded for their exertions. The choruses, under the able tuition of Mr. Stimpson, proved very efficient, and the London Orchestra, engaged for this occasion, gave proofs of how valuable is the aid of an institution which, by its admirable training and consequent efficiency, can, with one rehearsal, do justice to a work exhibiting as many difficulties of execution as an opera. The production of Fridolin reflects credit upon the directors (who, I need not remind your readers, are entitled to lasting gratitude for having given Mendelssohn's Elijah to England), and I have little doubt that, from the great success it achieved, the society will be stimulated to continue in the same praiseworthy spirit. Want of space obliges me to be brief in my notice of the rest of the concert. Miss Arabella Goddard played Moscheles' spiritual fantasia, The Recollections of Ireland, with orchestral accompaniments, with such taste and brilliancy as to call forth an unanimous encore. But why did the young and accomplished pianist omit the cadenza, where the three airs are so admirably worked together? Upon her reappearing she substituted one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words"—the lovely "duet" in A flat—Book 3. Madame Amedei met with a similar compliment in the Brindisi from Lucrezia Borgia, which she sang with very great effect. Mr. G. Tedder, in the "Thorn," was also encored, and by his expressive singing well merited the honour. Mr. Weiss was extremely successful in Macfarren's characteristic song, "When Bacchus invented the Bowl," from Don Quixote, and Mrs. Weiss was equally happy in more than one piece. Nor must I forget to mention Mendelssohn's violin concerto, performed by M. Sainton in such a manner as to stamp him one of the most accomplished violinists of the day—if that were not already done long since. The orchestra was conducted by Frank Mori with a decision and judgment which fully warranted the flattering reception he encountered on appearing in the orchestra. Both as a composer and a conductor, Mr. Mori may be said to have gained a legitimate triumph in Birmingham.

BRIGHTON.—The first concert of the fourth season of the Amateur Symphony Society took place at the Pavilion Rooms, on Thursday evening, the 2nd instant, before a large audience. The overture to Die Zauberflöte was given with precision, and much applauded. Haydn's symphony, No. 1, (in C) of the Salaman set, was a creditable performance. The andante, especially, was entitled to praise. Meyerbeer's March, from the Camp of Silesia, was more effective than when played at a previous concert. Beethoven's symphony, No. 2, (in D) followed. There were some new performers among the wind instruments, and a few more rehearsals would have been an improvement. The concert finished with the overture to Cenerentola, and the company separated much pleased. The subscriptions have increased to nearly 150. Mr. Gutteridge is the leader, and Mr. Oury conductor of the band. Mr. Frederick Wright is agent to the society.

GLASGOW.—(From our own Correspondent).—Mr. Wood's operatic troupe continue at Glasgow the success they achieved in Edinburgh. I was present at the performance of Lucrezia Borgia last Tuesday. The attendance, if not so fashionable, was as numerous as at Edinburgh. The theatre is more commodious, and better adapted for sound than that of the capital. Madame Caradori produced a great impression in Lucrezia. She has grown already into high favour with the connoisseurs, who consider her, next to Grisi, the best tragic actress of the operatic stage who has appeared in Glasgow. Formes, also, has won distinguished honours. In Duke Alfonso his singing and acting were the theme of universal admiration. All the papers speak loudly in his praise, and the Daily Mail soars into the loftiest regions of eulogy. Reichardt, too, came in for his share of the applause bestowed on the performance. Gennaro is the best part in which he has yet appeared. He looks the character well, sings the music with much taste, and acts with genuine feeling. Mr. Wood has spared no expense in the general getting up of the opera, and the band and chorus are numerous and efficient. The operatic speculation cannot fail to be a prosperous one.

HARROW.—On Thursday week there was a performance of sacred music in the Harrow Speech Room. Messrs. Mann and Atkinson of the Norwich choir sang the tenor and base songs. Mr. Atkinson, in Pergolesi's air "O Lord have mercy," was much praised; and Mr. Mann was encored in Mendelssohn's "If with all your hearts." The singing of the little choristers, who were brought forward through the kindness of Dr. Buck of Norwich, was excellent, and showed to what a state a child's voice may be advanced by that judicious and careful treatment which has enabled Dr. Buck to render the Norwich choir so eminent. Mr. Staton, organist of the parish church, played a solo on the pianoforte, and his duet (Hummel's in A flat) with Mrs. Bunnett was exceedingly well performed. At the close they received very warm applause. The choruses were supplied from the Sacred Harmonic Society.

BATTLE, SUSSEX.—February 1st, 1854.—The first meeting of the season of the Battle Subscription Concerts took place at the George Hotel, on Friday evening the 27th ultimo, under the direction of Mr. Albert Dawes. The vocalists were Mr. George Buckland and Miss Annie Buckland. The orchestra played the overtures to Tancredi, Impresario, and Guy Mannering. Mr. Albert Dawes performed a solo on the violin, and a duet for piano and flute with Mr. Funnel. The above concerts bid fair to be successful, the list of subscribers containing many of the names of the principal families in the town.

BRISTOL.—On Thursday the 26th ult., the Bristol Madrigal Society held their annual Ladies' Night at the Victoria Rooms, and drew together a large concourse of people. The orchestra numbered 20 trebles, 12 altos, 26 tenors, and 26 basses, or thereabouts, the additions being from the choirs of Oxford, Windsor, and Exeter.—In the morning there were two musical services given at the cathedral, in which the boys and singers from distant choirs, brought here for the concert, took part. Some call these services the Ante-Madrigal. The choir, nave, and side aisles were full, and numbers were assembled in the triforium or gallery round the interior walls. Amongst the adults who took part in the service were Drs. Corfe, of Oxford, and Elvey of Windsor, Mr. Blyth, organist of Magdalen, Oxford, Mr. Amott, organist, of Gloucester, Mr. W. Done, organist, of Worcester, and Mr Trimnell, organist, of Chesterfield, besides several of their choirs. The anthem was "O where shall wisdom be found?" (Boyce); the Te Deum and Benedictus, were Gibbons', in F.

TAUNTON.—Our last Subscription Concert brought us a new pianist, Mr. Macoo, who played Hummel's rondo in A, with orchestral accompaniments, in a very artistic style. In the second part Mr. Macoo performed a notturno of his own. The concert was well attended. At the previous concert, Miss Dolby was engaged. She is a great favourite here; but the snow kept the people at home.

BATH.—People's Concerts.—The Concert on Monday evening week again filled the Guildhall. The gentleman amateur sang "Nina," and "Good bye, sweetheart." He received two encores. Miss Harriet Cox, who made her first appearance, has a voice of good quality, and manages it with skill. Mrs. Darby, Mr. Hellier, Mr. Young and the members of the chorus exerted themselves. The German Band played.

BILSTON.—On Wednesday, the 25th ult., Mr. Paget, of Atherstone, gave an evening concert of vocal music in St. Mary's School-room, under the patronage of the vicar, the Rev. J. B. Owen. He was assisted by Mrs. Bull, of the Birmingham Town-hall Concerts, and Mrs. Paget, R.A.M. The programme provided was varied, and the performance good. Mrs. Bull was encored in Mercadante's cavatina, "Soave immagine," and Glover's duet, "We come to thee, Savoy," by the two ladies, received the same compliment. Mr. J. Hayward, of Wolverhampton, presided at the pianoforte with his usual ability. The audience was not so large as was expected, though Mr. Paget has on many occasions given his services for the benefit of various institutions here, and his singing is admired.

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—A picture of Sebastopol, which shows the advantage of its situation, has been added by the proprietors of this gallery, to the panorama of the Ocean Mail. It is, at the present time, a very interesting subject, and is well treated by the artist. The sketch is taken from the north side of the bay, which gives a fine view of both the harbour and the city. There could not have been a more appropriate and opportune subject than a picture of Sebastopol, and we have no doubt it will prove attractive.

WORCESTER.—The concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on Monday evening, the 23rd ult., at the Music Hall, which was filled in every part by a brilliant audience. The artistes were Miss Arabella Goddard, Mdme. Amedei, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, and M. Sainton. The concert was one of the most interesting ever given in Worcester. Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton achieved the same success which has everywhere attended their recent performances in the provinces. The singers were also received with high favour. Mdme. Amedei made a decided sensation. One of the novelties of the evening was an overture, composed by Mr. D'Egville, sen., called Sabrina, which was well played and loudly applauded. Mr. Land accompanied the vocal music on the piano.

HANLEY.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. G. Simpson gave a concert on Monday at the Town Hall, which was filled in every part. The performers included the Beale party, now on a provincial tour. Madame Amedei justified the praises bestowed upon her by the London press. The aria "Ah, quel giorno" displayed her beautiful organ to great advantage, and the encore she received was well deserved. Miss Arabella Goddard more than realized the expectations of the "critics" here, while her unassuming manners and pretty face won the hearts of the audience. Her reception was most flattering. She played four times —a duet for piano and violin with M. Sainton, a fantasia by Wallace, Thalberg's "Moïse," and the "Sultan's March" of Rossini, arranged by Benedict. She was encored no less than three times, when she substituted Heller's "On Song's bright Pinions," and Brinley Richards' "Rule Britannia." Mr. and Mrs. Weiss added to the attractions of the concert by their artistic singing of several favourite airs. The lady was encored in "Home, sweet Home," the gentleman in Mendelssohn's "I'm a Roamer," and in Schubert's lied "In silent Woe." Mr. Land sang a ballad by Lover, and was also encored. Last not least, M. Sainton, besides the duet with Miss Goddard, introduced a brilliant fantasia of his own, ("The Standard Bearer") which was again encored. In fact, almost everything was encored, except a very pretty four-part song, "The Villagers' Evening Song" by Frank Mori, which deserved the compliment almost as much as anything. It was sung by Mrs. Weiss, Mdme. Amedei, Mr. Land and Mr. Weiss. Mr. Land was the conductor at the pianoforte.

WOLFGANG'S apprenticeship was now completed. The works of the old contrapuntists, Bach and Handel, had made him thoroughly acquainted with the secrets of the art, and the more recent Italian composers had taught him how great a charm there was in vocal music. The schools of the different nations possessing a musical reputation, of which he had been a disciple, and the taste and principles of which he had successively studied, were already beginning to blend together in his mind, and form a style ultimately destined to delight the world as his own.

For a long time, his father had abandoned the character of teacher for that of mere travelling companion, and the age in which the young composer lived had already told him all it could tell him about music. Henceforth, Mozart had to learn from himself alone.

On reaching Salzburg, near the end of March, Wolfgang found a letter from Count Firmian, whose acquaintance he had made during his stay in Milan, ordering him, at the command of the Empress Maria Theresa, to compose a theatrical Serenade,† for the festival to be held on the occasion of the nuptials of the Archduke Ferdinand with the Hereditary Princess of Modena. In charging Mozart with this task, the Empress appears to have been actuated by a desire to pit the youngest of the then existing composers against the father of the maestri, Hasse, who had been ordered to write an opera for the same occasion. Mozart hastened to obey so honourable a summons, and, in the month of August, once more set out with his father for Milan, where the marriage was to be solemnized. The rooms, which had been engaged for him beforehand, were admirably adapted for composing a work in a hurry. Above him lived a professor of the violoncello, and beneath him another; his next door neighbour was a teacher of singing, who received his pupils in his own rooms, and, opposite, dwelt an oboist. All of these remained at home, and practised most industriously, the whole day long. "This is agreeable for a composer," writes Mozart, "and brings him ideas."* In the serenade, which was in two parts, and entitled Ascagno in Alba, there were dances introduced, which made it last as long as the work of Hasse, so that the difference between the Serenade and opera was only in name. Properly speaking, Ascagno was no more than a mythological opera, consisting of several airs, and recitatives, with or without accompaniment, eight choruses, and dance music. In spite of his musical neighbours, Mozart had completed his task in less than three weeks. Ascagno was praised to the skies. "The serenade has quite killed the opera," says Leopold Mozart, expressing his regret (for which I will not vouch), at the defeat of the celebrated veteran Hasse.† In the beginning of December, father and son left Milan. The two years following our travellers' return home are rather barren of important events. As there are here several gaps in the thread of the biography, partly because the information afforded by the correspondence is sometimes defective and sometimes altogether wanting, I must confine myself to the simple enumeration, in chronological order, of the few facts occurring during this period.

On the 14th March, 1772, Hieronymus, a descendant of the princely house of Colloredo Wallsee and Möls, was appointed Archbishop of Salzburg, and commissioned Mozart to set to music a serenade of Metastasio, Il Sogno di Scipione (Scipio's Dream), for the ceremony of the enthronement. I have designated by name, surname, and titles the new lord, given by fate to Salzburg, because, in common with all opponents of great men, he merits this sad distinction. In subsequent chapters, we shall see how he treated the flock of which he was the shepherd, and what value he put upon the fortunate chance that enabled him to reckon Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart among his retainers.

In the autumn of the same year, Mozart returned to Milan, for the purpose of fulfilling his engagement with the manager of the theatre. The plot of his new opera, like that of his previous one, was taken from Roman history. Mithridates was followed by Lucius Sylla, a far more dangerous enemy of the Republic. It was not possible for the Dictator, with the assistance of the patroness chance had given him, to fail in yoking the city of Milan to his triumphal car. This patroness was Signora de Amicis, one of the greatest singers, if not the greatest, of that day, to judge from the extraordinary praise bestowed upon her by Leopold Mozart in his letters, and by Burney in his History of Music. According to Burney, Signora de Amicis never moved without transporting the spectators by the grace of her action, and never sang a note without charming them. More can hardly be said in so few words. Mozart wrote an air for her, full of new and exceedingly difficult passages, which had the honour of becoming her favourite song. It was afterwards attempted by a great many other singers, some of whom, by their success, afforded a proof of their talent, while the majority only exhibited the magnitude of their pretensions—which is nearly always the case when "favourite airs" are in question.

The Roman Dictator triumphed during six-and-twenty successive representations, under the protecting ægis of Signora de Amicis; after which it was gloriously laid upon the shelf.

Herr von Nissen's work contains the following remarks àpropos of the opera, Lucius Sylla:

"Mithridate and Lucio Sylla differ in no remarkable degree from the ordinary operas of that period, in regard either to plan or instrumentation. Their passionate airs and the life and spirit of their melodies alone raise them above the common level. Like most Italian operas, they maintain the principle of three-part music, and offer but few instances of that skilful and harmonious construction which we admire in Mozart's later works. A remarkable feature in the choruses of these two operas, as in his earlier masses, is a certain stiffness, an anxious clinging to set rules, which we should have expected to find in the music of a dry old pedant, rather than in that of one whose genius was just budding into life."

For my own part, I must own that I am not surprised at this. It was of great importance for Mozart, who, at the age of sixteen, was entering upon the most dangerous branch of his art, to give proofs of a degree of knowledge sufficient to justify so early an appearance in the public career of composer. Before presuming to reject admitted rules, a musician must first show that he is acquainted with and capable of following them. Rules, which constitute the authority of experience, are guarantees of success, founded upon the example of our predecessors who owed to them their reputation. They define the limits of the theoretical and practical science of an epoch. He who would venture to set them aside—persuaded that he can compose better than others by composing in a different manner—allows himself a latitude which others dare not claim, and must know either a great deal or nothing at all. Was it, then, likely that a boy of sixteen, whose ideas were merely efforts of the memory, should hope to make successful innovations in an art so difficult and branching out into such a great variety of directions?

In the spring of 1773, both father and son returned home, after Leopold had vainly endeavoured to obtain some appointment at Florence, either for himself or for Wolfgang. In the summer of the same year, they went to Vienna, and remained two months for the purpose of carrying out some plans with the nature of which I am unacquainted, but which, however, were not successful. Nothing certain, at least, can be gathered from Leopold Mozart's letters, which are couched in a more diplomatic style even than usual. We can only surmise that, dissatisfied with his position at Salzburg, he endeavoured to obtain a place for himself or his son in Vienna, and, not succeeding in either, returned home once more, in a depressed state of mind, and passed a whole year in retirement. As my readers will easily believe, Wolfgang did not spend this time in idleness. On the contrary, he made such good use of it that, in the winter of 1774, we find our travellers again on their road to Munich, laden with a whole bundle of new works, some entirely finished, and others merely begun. Among them were two masses, an offertorium, the music of an evening service De Dominica, and that of a comic opera, all intended for the orchestra or the theatre of Maximilian Joseph, Elector of Bavaria.

The opera, entitled La Bella Finta Giardiniera (The Beautiful Garden-Girl in Disguise), was produced on the 14th January, 1775, and received with an enthusiasm for which even the recollection of the warm reception bestowed on him by the Italians had not prepared the composer. Thunders of applause and cries of "Viva il maestro" resounded through the house for a long time after each piece; and, after the curtain fell, the uproar lasted until the commencement of the ballet, which followed the opera. The Elector and his family took part in the general expressions of approval. Wolfgang recounts the whole particulars of the first representation, in a letter to his sister.

La Finta Giardiniera has not kept possession of the stage: it is long since forgotten, and unknown, even by name, to any but connoisseurs. I am not acquainted with it myself, nor does the plan of my work admit the analysis of any of those compositions which now only possess historical interest. For musicians who are desirous of tracing the gradual development of our hero's genius, however, the study of this opera must necessarily possess an attraction. Some critics pretend to recognise in it the first dawn of originality, the first rays of that brilliant constellation destined, soon afterwards, to shine so resplendently, when Idomeneo appeared in the dramatic hemisphere. What, in my opinion, seems to be clear, and to reconcile conflicting opinions, is that La Finta Giardiniera bears marks of a state of transition and uncertainty, resulting from the struggle going on between the entirely new ideas which were fermenting in the brain of the composer, and habit, which still kept him back to his old errors. Perhaps the reader will be more successful than myself in forming a correct estimate, from the following quotations:—

"La Finta Giardiniera, originally composed for the Emperor Joseph II. (qy?) belongs to those works which immediately heralded the classical period of Mozart. It is far superior to Mithridates and Sylla, and betrays an original tone and regularity of form that leave more than one Italian opera in the shade. Mozart's talent is more directly evident in this than in any of his previous compositions, and the style is remarkable for peculiar softness and rare tenderness."

In another place, we read:—

"When Mozart wrote La Finta Giardiniera, he took, as his model, some rustic opera of Piccini or Guglielmi. It contains a delicious romance in C Major, with an obbligato accompaniment for the flute, which has become a thoroughly national melody in many parts of Germany."

Elsewhere we find:—

"In the opera of La Finta Giardiniera, we seem to see first indicated the buds of that musical talent which afterwards burst into full-blown flowers in Idomeneo."

Immediately following this, we read:—

"In the year 1789, this opera, under the title of Die Verstellte Gärtnerinn, was produced at Frankfort, but was completely unsuccessful. The piece is, to a certain extent, vapid and tiresome, and the style almost always stiff and artificial. While Mozart appears to rise above the comprehension of ordinary dilettanti, majestic in certain passages, capricious in others, and invariably rich and ingenious in his harmony, the music throughout is nevertheless better suited to connoisseurs, able to appreciate its delicacy, than to amateurs, who allow themselves to be carried away by their natural feelings, and who found an immediate opinion upon their first impressions."

This is all we find about La Finta Giardiniera in the compilation of Herr Von Nissen, and it is due to him to state that whatever was to be collected he obtained. Further questions arise, as to how it came to pass that a work composed for the Emperor Joseph II. was first produced in Munich; how music remarkable for such "peculiar softness and rare tenderness," could, at the same time, be so heavy and pedantic as to baffle the comprehension of dillettanti: how music so difficult to be understood could be modelled on "some rustic opera of Piccini or Guglielmi," both of whom are so easy to understand; and, lastly, how the impression made upon the Munich dillettanti in 1775, was so very different from the impression produced upon the Frankfort dillettanti in 1789. These are questions which every one must feel inclined to put to Herr Von Nissen; although there is very little chance that he would be able to answer them.

THE MENDELSSOHN CONCERT.

SIR,—Having been obviously alluded to in the leading article of last Saturday's MUSICAL WORLD, I feel it due to myself to state that I was in attendance at three out of the four rehearsals for the Mendelssohn Scholarship Concert, although, from circumstances which were fully explained in the Morning Post, on or about the 19th of December, 1848, and into which I am now unwilling to enter, I did not take my place in the orchestra. I trust you will favour me by giving insertion to the above, and remain,

Sir, Your obedient servant.
CHARLOTTE HELEN DOLBY.

FOREIGN COPYRIGHT.—The important question, whether a foreigner has any right to protection in this country for his literary or musical compositions, is now being argued before the House of Lords, in the case of Boosey and Jefferys. The case was opened on Thursday morning by Serjeant Byles for the appellant (Jefferys), the reply being made yesterday by Sir Fitzroy Kelly. It is expected that the judgment of the House will be delivered on Monday. The matter excites much interest among the book and music trade.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—We have been informed that the Directors of the Wednesday Evening Concerts are about to follow the example of the New Philharmonic Society, and will shortly remove, from Exeter Hall, to Mr. Hullah's New Music Room, in Long Acre.

NOVEL PATENT.—We read the following in the newspapers:

Among the new patents announced in Friday night's Gazette, is one to "Adolphus T. Wagner, of Berlin, in the kingdom of Prussia, professor of music, for indicating persons' thoughts by the agency of nervous electricity."

What a pity Mr. Adolphus T. Wagner did not communicate his secret to Mr. Lumley and Mr. Gye, when those managers were simultaneously in treaty with Mdlle. Johanna. With electricity to back them they might have read the lady's thoughts, something to this effect: Out of which of you can I get the most? In that case they could have demanded their passports of Dr. Bacher, and broken off all further diplomatic relations with the Wagners, father and child.

MRS. FIDDES (late Miss Harriet Cawse) is singing at a theatre in the capital of the Sandwich Islands.

HARMONIC UNION.

Of all the secular works of Handel the most beautiful is Acis and Galatea. The story was twice used by him as a vehicle for music—at Naples, where, in 1710, by desire of a certain Spanish Princess, he composed a pastoral under the title of Aci, Galatea e Polifeme (or, according to the copy existing in the Queen's Library, Galatea, Acigi e Polifeno), and in London, where, nine years later, he wrote the masque of Acis and Galatea, to words attributed to Gay and others, for his friend and patron, the Duke of Chandos, at whose place of Cannons it was first performed in 1724. There is no resemblance between the Italian version and the English; and, while the former is forgotten, the latter is almost as familiar to musicians, and in its particular way as highly esteemed, as the Messiah itself. Acis and Galatea is the most exquisite of musical pastorals. The subject was eminently favourable; and, though the off-hand manner in which the Shepherdess, Galatea, allows herself to be consoled for the death of her devoted Acis—whom the giant, Polyphemus, in a fit of jealousy, kills with a rock—somewhat weakens our sympathy for the fate of the ill-starred lovers, the music of Handel would cause even greater discrepancies to be overlooked. The love songs of Acis, "Where shall I seek my charming Fair?" and "Love in her Eyes sits playing," are unsurpassed by Mozart himself, and unequalled by any one else. The uncontrollable passion of Polyphemus is described with a not less masterly hand, and "O ruddier than the Cherry" has yet to find a rival as a "monster" love song. Galatea is painted more delicately. Her love, like that of the heroines of the Spanish and Italian pastorals, is half real and half coquetry; and this mixed feeling is most charmingly developed in the air, "As when the Dove laments her Love." The choruses, "Oh! the Pleasures of the Plains," and "Happy, happy, happy we," are redolent of pastoral life; while "Wretched Lovers" (where the shepherds bewail the approaching fate of Acis and Galatea), in which occurs the celebrated passage, descriptive of the giant Polyphemus, who is about to wreak his vengeance on one of them—

"See what ample strides he takes, is among the most strikingly dramatic and powerful of all the choruses of Handel.

Acis and Galatea has been frequently performed in London and in other parts of England. At Drury-lane Theatre, under the management of Mr. Macready, it was produced, with great success, as a dramatic piece, the effect of which was materially aided by the beautiful scenery of Mr. Stanfield. On that occasion, additional orchestral accompaniments (and, in some cases, additional music) were provided by the late Mr. T. Cooke. Handel wrote the music for a very small orchestra—how small may be guessed from the facts that the overture is scored for first and second violins, two oboes and basses—and that, except in the chorus, "Wretched Lovers," there is no viola part in the orchestra, and no alto part in the voices. Although it was known that Mozart had written additional accompaniments to Acis and Galatea, as well as to Alexander's Feast and the Messiah, no advantage had ever previously been taken of them in this country. Had Mr. Macready been aware of it, he would doubtless have spared Mr. T. Cooke his pains. Mozart's additional accompaniments were used on Monday night for the first time, at the suggestion of Mr. Benedict, who managed to obtain one of the very few copies in existence; and it was this which gave a more than ordinary interest to the performance. What Mozart has done may be stated in a very few words. He has added a viola part, and, by judicious employment of the wood and brass instruments, has supplied what Handel (as he did with his oratorios) used to supply himself, on the organ or harpsichord. That no effect produced by an organ or harpsichord, in however skilful hands, could equal what Mozart has obtained by filling up the score, may well be imagined; and it is reasonable to hope that Handel's Acis and Galatea, like his Messiah and Alexander's Feast, will be henceforth inseparable from Mozart's additional accompaniments. As in the Messiah, it must be admitted that in some instances Mozart—doubtless carried away by a love for the task in which he was engaged—has gone beyond bounds, and (especially in his use of clarionets and bassoons) made Handel appear more like Mozart than like himself—an oversight which nothing but the exceeding beauty of what has been added could have excused.

The performance on Monday night was on the whole highly creditable to the Harmonic Union, and to Mr. Benedict its able and accomplished conductor. The choruses, as far as "Wretched Lovers," were extremely well executed: and it was only in the somewhat difficult one, in F minor, "Mourn, all ye Muses," that the intonation of the singers began to be uncertain, and their precision equivocal. The two last—"Cease, Galatea," and "Galatea, dry thy Tears"—were open to the same objections. As far as the tempi were concerned, we thought the first two last choruses of the first part—"Oh! the Pleasures of the Plains," and "Happy, happy, happy we"—were too slow. The vocal solo parts were filled with great efficiency. Miss Stabbach and Miss Thirlwall shared the part of Galatea between them, and both young ladies accomplished their duties in a praiseworthy manner. Miss Stabbach was especially successful in the lovely air, "As when the Dove." It was, nevertheless, a mistake to divide the music of the principal soprano character, which should always be allotted to one singer. The part of Damon, though written for a tenor, was, in Handel's time, sung as treble, by a boy. It was entrusted on Monday night to Mr. Suchet Champion, who had evidently made himself well acquainted with the music. The two principal male parts, Acis and Polyphemus, were supported by Signor Belletti and Mr. Sims Reeves. Signor Belletti's success was unequivocal. He sang the recitatives exceedingly well, and the second song of the giant—"Cease to Beauty to be sueing," one of the most magnificent of Handel's airs—allowing for his foreign accent, to perfection. But it was not to these that he owed his triumph. The famous song of Polyphemus, "O ruddier than the Cherry," was the signal for one of those uproarious demonstrations which are a sure sign that the feelings of a whole crowd have been aroused. We never heard a more unanimous encore. And yet—while, as far as mere vocalisation was concerned, Signor Belletti was beyond reproach, and while, at the same time, he infused a remarkable degree of spirit into the air—in regard to musical declamation and the absolute intentions of Handel, this was the least meritorious of Signor Belletti's efforts. Constrained, no doubt, by the difficulty of the language, he sang the whole staccato, which in a great degree robbed the music of its character and the words of their signification. This clever and deservedly popular singer must not be induced, by the applause of the multitude, to relax in his endeavours at acquiring a thorough command of the new style of music in which he has already made such marked progress. Much as he has done, he has a great deal more to achieve. The most unexceptionable, and the most thoroughly "Handelian" singing of the evening was that of Mr. Sims Reeves, who gave the varied and beautiful music of Acis as, probably, it has never been given till now, in England or elsewhere. The two languishing apostrophes of the love-sick shepherd, "Where shall I seek?" and "Love in her Eyes," were delivered with a truthful and passionate expression, which realised all that could have been imagined by the composer. These, however, not belonging to the "ad captandum" style, were less warmly appreciated than the more stirring and boisterous "Love sounds the Alarm," where Acis, in despair, sets his rival, Polyphemus, at defiance. This well known air, declaimed by Mr. Sims Reeves with a power and energy that could hardly be surpassed, brought down an encore of the same tumultuous character as that accorded to Signor Belletti, in "O ruddier than the Cherry." The performance of Acis and Galatea was altogether most gratifying; and Mr. Benedict, the conductor, was not less entitled to praise for his exertions than any who were concerned in its success. With Mozart's additional accompaniments, it will now inevitably become a stock piece.

After Handel's "Masque," Mr. W. Rea, organist to the Harmonic Union, played Mr. Sterndale Bennett's beautiful Caprice in E major, for pianoforte and orchestra, with great and well-merited applause. Mr. Rea is a pianist of more than ordinary talent, and his performance of this very elaborate and difficult composition was equally remarkable for good taste and fluent execution. The second part began with a new MS. symphony in G minor, by Mr. C. E. Stephens, which, though not distinguished by a profusion of original ideas, is the work of a thoughtful and well-intending musician, who aims at emulating the best models. The symphony was given with unfailing spirit and precision by the orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The best movement is the finale, a kind of tarantella. In the minuet there are two trios—just one too many. The concert terminated, at an unusually late hour, with the overture and music to the Ruins of Athens, by Beethoven, in which Miss Stabbach and Signor Belletti sang the principal vocal parts. The hall was very full, and, in consequence of its great success, Acis and Galatea is to be repeated forthwith, in conjunction with Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The last performance was remarkable for the first appearance at the Wednesday Evening Concerts of Mr. Sims Reeves, who, as we have already stated, is engaged for three nights. Mr. Reeves, was welcomed by the audience in the most enthusiastic manner. The scena "O, I can bear my Fate no longer," from Der Freischütz, is suited to Mr. Sims Reeves' large and energetic style, and was given with fine dramatic vigour. The aria "Through the Forest," was perfectly sung, and the whole was loudly applauded. Verdi's popular ballata, "La donna è mobile," requires singing of a very opposite character, to which Mr. Sims Reeves proved himself quite equal. He sang it with so much taste as to provoke a vehement encore. His reading of this popular song is different from Mario's. In Mr. Hatton's graceful ballad, "Good bye, Sweetheart," Mr. Reeves was again unanimously called back, and substituted the unpretending ballad of "My Pretty Jane," accompanying himself on the pianoforte. The audience were charmed, and would fain have encored this as well, but the lateness of the hour prevented them from insisting. Mr. Sims Reeves' success was as decided as ever.

The choice of songs made by Mr. Sims Reeves might proffer a suggestion to our native vocalists, who, at the Wednesday Evening Concerts, seem bitten with the mania of singing everything but what directly suits their vocal powers. On the present occasion, this infatuation was carried to a singular extent. In addition to Mr. Sims Reeves, the vocalists were Misses Stabbach, Thirlwall, Rebecca Isaacs, Laura Baxter, Ransford, and Hemming, and Messrs. Donald King and Leffler. The selections were from the works of Weber, Rossini, Auber, Donizetti, and Adolphe Adam. The most successful was Miss Stabbach, who gave a pure and correct reading of the "Come è bello" from Lucrezia Borgia.

Miss Hemming made her first appearance in public, and was most favourably received. She sang a very pleasing ballad, by Mr. F. Praeger, and exhibited a voice of charming quality, and a pure method. Miss Hemming has good looks, also, which added in no small degree to the impression she made.

The band, in the first part, played Spontini's overture to the Vestale, and the andante and finale to Haydn's Surprise Symphony. Mademoiselle Madeleine Graver performed Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in D minor, with equal ease and intelligence, and was deservedly applauded. There is a vast deal of promise about this young pianist, who must endeavour to conquer the habit of playing too fast. In the second part a duo concertante for violin and violoncello was so well executed by Messrs. Viotti and George Collins as to elicit an encore; when Mr. George Collins performed a solo on the violoncello. The rest of the concert calls for no notice, except an instrumental pot-pourri on airs from Purcell's Tempest, executed to perfection on the clarionet, oboe, and bassoon, by Messrs. Lazarus, Barret, and Baumann.

Re-Union des Arts.—On Wednesday evening, the second soirée of the second season was given by the members of this Society. The selection of music was remarkable neither in interest nor variety. Mdlle. Louise Christine played a solo on the harp, by Alvars, which every harpist has played in public and private for the last ten years. Mr. Osborne performed a new morceau on the pianoforte, "A Summer's Eve," composed, no doubt, for his pupils. The usual company was present, and the usual hospitable M.C's., Messrs. Kiallmark, Goffrie, and Co., were there to receive them.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S SOIRÉES.

Mr. Lindsay Sloper follows in the same track as Mr. Sterndale Bennett, and considers music an intellectual, not a frivolous recreation. His Annual Chamber Concerts are, therefore, always anticipated with interest by amateurs. The first for the present season took place on Tuesday evening, at the New Beethoven Rooms, in presence of a very full audience. The programme was excellent. Part I. opened with Spohr's Duo concertante in G (Op. 95), for pianoforte and violin, and finished with Beethoven's solo sonata in D minor (No. 2, Op. 29). The first, one of Spohr's best works of the kind, was brilliantly executed by Mr. Sloper and Herr Molique. The profound work of Beethoven was played con amore by the pianist. Part II. began with Weber's sonata in E flat (Op. 47), for pianoforte and clarionet, which, though not one of the capital efforts of the master, possessed quite sufficient interest to warrant Mr. Sloper in introducing it. Moreover, there is so little good music for the clarionet; and, besides, it is such a pleasure to hear the mellow tone and fluent execution of Mr. Lazarus in a piece of the length and importance of a sonata. The pianoforte part is difficult; but Mr. Sloper does not recognise difficulties. It was a fine performance on both hands. Mr. Sloper, at the end of the concert, introduced three graceful morceaux de salon of his own—a romance called A River Scene, a Bolero, and a caprice entitled May Lilies. These were charming and charmingly played; but we trust Mr. Sloper, who has always made a rigid stand for the healthy influence of music, is not about to fall into the "flower and water" style now so predominant. May Lilies is a somewhat ominous title.

Besides the duo of Spohr, Herr Molique played two of his beautiful Melodies—the Andante in G (Op. 41), and the Allegro moderato in A minor (Op. 36). How he played them, those who are acquainted with the refined and consummate talent of the Stuttgart violinist need not be reminded.

The vocal music was contributed by Sig. and Mad. Ferrari, Mr. Benson, and Miss Dolby. Mr. Benson sings Hatton's ballad, "I love all Things the Seasons bring," extremely well, and the ballad itself is a good one; but we think it is time he should fix upon another, for chamber concerts. Mad. Ferrari, in Cherubini's "Ave Maria," accompanied by Mr. Lazarus in the clarionet obbligato, showed herself a true artist; and Sig. Ferrari, in the aria, "Si, tra i ceppi," from Handel's Berenice, displayed his usual intelligence. The fantasia of Mr. Sloper, for voice and pianoforte, called "The Lady and the Nightingale," has been already described. The idea is excellent, although, as the Daily News says, it is simply a cantata with an elaborate pianoforte accompaniment. Miss Dolby sang it superbly, Mr. Sloper, of course, playing the pianoforte part, as he did in all the pieces, vocal and instrumental, where an accompaniment was required—a proceeding which we consider unadvisable, inasmuch as the fatigue arising from constant exertion must in a degree militate against the vigour and consequent effect of the solo performances.

Quartet Concerts, Crosby Hall.—The third of Mr. Dando's subscription concerts took place on Monday evening. Mr. W. H. Cummings was the vocalist and Mr. Osborne was at the pianoforte. The opening quartet was Haydn's in D major, No. 63. The same composer's canzonet, "O, tuneful Voice," was nicely given by Mr. Cummings. Osborne's trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in C major, Op. 52, followed. Mr. Osborne, being present, of course presided at the pianoforte; the trio was most favourably received, and is the work of a thorough musician. Mozart's "grand trio," in E flat, was finely played. Beethoven's sonata in C minor, Op. 10, was played by Mr. Osborne with feeling and expression. Mr. Cummings sang a couple of songs in the second act, "The Blind Boy" (J. L. Hatton) and "I dream of thee at Morn" (Williams). The concert concluded with Onslow's quintet, No. 12, one of the best of his works of the kind. The next concert, announced to take place on the 27th, will be devoted to Beethoven alone. The quartet playing, of Mr. Dando and his associates is as complete and satisfactory as ever.

MR. AGUILAR'S SOIREES.

The third and last of these entertainments took place on Saturday, at Mr. Aguilar's residence. The programme was of the usual quality:—

Sonata in C minor, Mozart; Aria, "Dove Sono," Mozart; Suite de Pièces (No. 5), Handel; Duet, "I would that my love," Mendelssohn; Trio (Op. 70, No. 1), Beethoven; Ballad, "Forget it not," Macfarren; Caprice (Op. 33, No. 3), Mendelssohn; Nocturne (Op. 55, No. 2), Polonaise (Op. 53), Chopin.

We can give Mr. Aguilar no higher praise than to say that he was successful in all the pieces he had set down for himself. Perhaps his most remarkable and satisfactory performance was in Mozart's impassioned sonata, which is heard much too seldom. The fifth of Handel's Suites (that in E major, with the air and variations known as the "Harmonious Blacksmith"), is one of the most melodious, and certainly the most effective of them all. Beethoven's superb trio showed Mr. Aguilar in a favourable light as a performer of the highest order of classical music; while Mendelssohn's magnificent Caprice in B flat minor (one of the three dedicated to Mr. Klingemann), and Chopin's Nocturne and Polonaise, played with equal facility, proved his conversancy with two very opposite styles of pianoforte music. Mr. Aguilar was most ably assisted in the Trio by Herr Jansa and Mr. Lovell Phillips. Some vocal music agreeably varied the programme. The singers were Mrs. Arthur Stone and Miss Laura Baxter. The rooms were crowded, and the audience, while remarkably attentive, were liberal in their applause.

Salaman's Amateur Choral Meetings.—The idea of originating and establishing a series of amateur meetings, for the purpose of studying the choral and operatic works of the great masters, was highly creditable to Mr. Charles Salaman. The manner in which the performances are given is also entitled to great praise. It is really surprising to hear profound and elaborate works executed by a number of non-professional singers, with so much skill and musical feeling, and with an ardour and zeal scarcely to be surpassed. Much of this is owing, doubtless, to Mr. Charles Salaman, who spares neither time nor pains in instilling into the minds of his disciples a real love and taste for the best music. The fifth meeting of the present season (the fourth) took place, on Wednesday, at Mr. Salaman's residence. Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed, and, on the whole, remarkably well, allowance, of course, being made for the pianoforte accompaniment, which is compelled to act as substitute for the orchestra. The number of singers (including soloists) was between fifty and sixty. The choruses were, for the most part, very carefully sung. We must give especial praise to the sopranos, who, indeed, would render good service were they transferred to the choirs at Exeter Hall. The solo performances of the ladies were highly praiseworthy. The young lady who sang the part of the youth in the first part, has a voice of rare quality, not powerful, but just in intonation, and clear as a bell. Her pianissimo is delicious. The great air, "Hear ye, O Israel," in Part II., was finely sung by the same lady, who we presume to be the prima donna of Mr. Salaman's troupe of amateurs. The contralto lady has also a good voice, and was perfectly at home in the duet, "Zion spreadeth her Hands," and the air, "Oh rest in the Lord." The gentlemen are not as vocally endowed as the ladies, but appear to have studied with not less assiduity, while they sing nearly as well. Mr. Charles Salaman had an arduous task in accompanying the oratorio on the piano. The duties of conductor also devolved on him, so that he was fully occupied during the performance. The rooms were crowded, and the performance was listened to with great attention.

Beaumont Institution, Mile End.—The Third Concert of the season was given on Monday evening. Madame Newton Frodsham, Miss Rhemmeiogh, (pupil of Mr. Sims Reeves), Miss Dolby, Mr. Augustus Braham and Mr. Henri Drayton, were the vocalists—Miss L. Taylor (Concertina), Mr. V. Collins (Violin) and Mr. Distin, senr. (Trumpet), the instrumentalists. Madame Newton Frodsham was encored in Bishop's "Peace inviting," with trumpet obbligato by Mr. Distin—also in a new ballad, by Samuel Lover—"My own old Man." Miss Dolby received the same compliment in Lady Dufferin's new song, "O, Bay of Dublin." The concert was well attended.

MADEMOISELLE CLAUSS.

This young and talented pianist is at present at Berlin. She lately gave concerts at Elberfeld and Bonn, both of which were very successful; and, on her way from one place to the other, she again performed at Düsseldorf and Cologne. At Leipsic she appeared at two of the Gewandhaus Subscription Concerts, and at a soirée musicale. The first concert occurring on the evening before Mendelssohn's birthday (Feb. 3rd), she played a concerto by that lamented composer. At the second, she gave one of Beethoven's. Mdlle. Clauss intends to remain a fortnight or three weeks at Berlin, at the expiration of which time her further progress is still undecided. If the Emperor of Russia says "Peace!" he will be recompensed by hearing "little Wilhelmina" play some of the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn; if he says "War!" she will not go to Petersburgh, and the Czar will be robbed of that pleasure. He had better make haste and decide.

FOREIGN.

Paris, (Feb. 16).—(From our own Correspondent).—The long and anxiously expected Etoile du Nord, the new comic opera of Meyerbeer and Scribe, is positively to come out to-night. No further delay, on any plea whatever, will be sanctioned by M. Perrin, who has been losing money for the last three months, and cannot afford to lose any more. A brilliant success is anticipated. Some go so far as to say that L'Etoile du Nord is superior to anything that Meyerbeer has previously composed. I believe that he has made use of two or three pieces from the Camp de Silésie, an opera of which he seems determined to let Paris know nothing. Among other things, the march, and the air of Vielka, with accompaniments for two flutes (which Jenny Lind used to sing so often), are spoken of as forming part of the music of L'Etoile du Nord. Mdlle. Caroline Duprez has the principal rôle. Every place in the theatre has been secured long since; and it is expected that such an audience will assemble within the walls of the Opéra Comique as was never witnessed there before. The Emperor and the Empress have signified their intention of being present.—In the Rue Lepelletier nothing is talked of but Spontini's tragic opera, La Vestale, which is being revived with the utmost pomp and circumstance for Sophie Cruvelli, who continues to draw great receipts to the treasury of the Grand Opera, much to the satisfaction of M. Nestor Roqueplan, whose good star, thanks to the young and gifted Teuton, is once more in the ascendant. With regard to the distribution of parts in La Vestale, your readers are aware that M. Roger refused the part of Licinius, but, urged on all sides to accept it, he agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. A decision, without appeal, was to be pronounced by Messrs. Ponchard, Duprez, and Ambroise Thomas, when a letter from Madame Spontini, widow of the composer, induced M. Roger to change his resolution, without awaiting the decision of the referees. So that the matter is definitely arranged, much to the chagrin (so says scandal), of M. Gueymard, who is very jealous of M. Roger, and of whom M. Roger is very jealous. I subjoin a translation of Madame Spontini's letter:—

"Sir,—Excuse my temerity; in spite of your refusal to sing the part of Licinius, which has so much distressed me, I again entreat you to revoke your fatal decision! Had Spontini himself been able to ask you, in the name of art and as a mark of respect for his age, to make what you term a sacrifice (although I do not admit it to be one), you would not have had the heart to refuse compliance with his entreaties. Grant, then, sir, the same sweet satisfaction to his dear memory and my tender solicitude. It is needless for me to tell you, sir, that the public, who like and admire you, will be much gratified by your complaisance; besides, while it is agreeable to oblige your friends, it is noble to oblige your enemies, if, indeed, you think you have any. You will, therefore, fulfil a double duty; your recompense, sir, will be the enthusiasm of the public and your own satisfaction at having rendered a tribute of respect to the memory of an illustrious composer. One word, sir, one word, which will overwhelm me with joy, and satisfy the impatience of the public—this is what I expect from your generous nature; do not belie my expectations.—Receive, etc.,

"Veuve Spontini, Countess of Saint Andrea."

At the Italian Opera there has been nothing new, but the début of Mdlle. Petrowich in Lucrezia Borgia. I was not present on that occasion, but from what I have heard, there appears to have been a cabal against the new German prima donna, from whom such great things had been anticipated. As much indeed is insinuated in the feuilleton of P. A. Fiorentino (Constitutionnel), from which the following is an extract.

"The début of Mdlle. Petrowich had excited a degree of public curiosity at once very lively and very dangerous. Never had an artiste been more talked about previous to making her first appearance in the natural and ordinary course of things. She was known to be the granddaughter of a celebrated Hospodar. This afforded great scope for the imagination. The question of the Danubian Principalities, before, during, and after their occupation by the Russians, was newly discussed, and so many reports were circulated, and so many stories related, that the most simple and everyday occurrences assumed the importance of political events. It almost appeared, indeed, as though the Eastern question had assumed a novel and unforeseen aspect. In the midst of a host of romantic details, however, connected with the past, present, and future of Mdlle. Petrowich, there was one positive and indisputable fact, viz., that this was not Mdlle. Petrowich's first appearance on the stage. She had already sung in Italy and at Vienna, and played Lucrezia Borgia ten nights consecutively at Dresden* with Moriani, who is assuredly an admirable Gennaro. She came to Paris, furnished with the best recommendations. Romani and Bonola, two competent judges, guaranteed her success, and predicted that a brilliant career was in store for her. Lastly, those who have heard her at the piano, when she is not overcome by anxiety, declare that she possesses a magnificent voice, and the greatest capabilities for the stage. The Parisian public, especially when its curiosity has been too much excited beforehand, must inevitably produce on certain temperaments a profound and terrible impression—an impression which bewilders some, while others it strikes dumb, and petrifies. For my part, I confess, in all humility, that, if suddenly pushed on before the foot lights, I should be incapable of saying so much as "good evening, ladies and gentlemen." Alarmed and paralysed by the imposing and icy-cold audience, of whom she had been told almost as many incredible stories as the public on its side had been told of her, Madlle Petrowich was not sufficiently calm and collected in some parts of the opera to enable me to derive any opinion of her talent from this her first appearance."

It is to be hoped that Mdlle. Petrowich will be afforded a chance of conquering her nervousness, and redeeming her laurels.

There are plenty of concerts going on, but few of any special interest. Your young countryman, Mr. John Thomas, the harpist, gave one in the Salle Herz last week, and made his first appearance before a Parisian audience with decided success. He performed three pieces by Parish Alvars, and was greatly applauded in all of them. Mr. Thomas was assisted by M. Lefort, and Signor Ferranti, who contributed several vocal morceaux. The concert of the new boy-pianist, Theodore Ritter, of whom such extraordinary things are prognosticated, comes off this week. I have heard this child compared to Charles Filtsch; but there are so many prodigies now-a-days that I never believe anything until I have the opportunity of judging for myself. Meanwhile Vieuxtemps and Jules Schulhoff (the pianist) are shortly expected in Paris, and we shall, doubtless, have concerts on their account. I am informed that Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss, instead of going to St. Petersburgh, will remain for some time at Berlin, and then return to England, viâ Paris, for the London season.

M. Blumenthal, the pianist, is here, en route for London. Previous to his departure he will give a concert. Ferdinand Hiller is now in Paris, and will probably remain during the winter. M. Henri Herz has just finished a new concerto (the fifth), which he will play at his own concert next month.

Vienna (Feb. 9th).—The third Concert Spirituel took place in the room of the Musikverein. A new overture by Ferdinand Hiller, entitled Phædra, was performed; Herr Dachs played

* M. Fiorentino might have added that Mdlle. Petrowich had appeared in London, at Drury Lane Theatre, as Leonora in Beethoven's Fidelio, with Herr Formes, "assuredly an admirable" Pizarro.—Ed.

Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat; and the overture to Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser, with a chorus from the same opera, was introduced for the first time in Vienna. A Künstlerball (artists' ball) is to take place on the 15th, under the direction of Strauss, at the Sofienbadsaale. There has been nothing new at the Opera. The Huguenots and the Zigenerinn (Balfe's Bohemian Girl), have attracted the best audiences of the week. There have been a great many concerts, the most interesting of which was that of Léopold de Meyer on the 5th. Having entirely recovered from his long illness, this extraordinary player has regained all his mechanical dexterity, and has even added to the elegance which was always a characteristic of his style. He played several new compositions, among others a new galop, and a fantasia quite as showy and difficult as the Patineurs of Liszt.

IBID.—On the 31st of January, a concert was given in the Schubert-Salon, by Heinrich Schmit, solo-violoncellist at the Imperial Theatre of Moscow. Fräulein Liebhart and Herr Staudigl varied the concert with some of Schubert's lieder.—On the 2nd inst., a Madame Burovich-Bossi gave a concert in the Rooms of the Musikverein. According to the Neue Weiner-Musik-Zeitung, the whole affair was a miserable failure.—On the 2nd, J. A. Pacher, a pianist and composer, gave a musical soirée in the Schubert-Salon, and introduced several of his pupils to the public. The concert opened with a symphony of Beethoven, played by Messrs. Pacher, Graff, and Rörer. Fräulein Betty Bury sang some songs of Mendelssohn, Fuchs, and Schubert.—On the 2nd, a concert was also given in the Theater an der Wien, for the benefit of the "Krippen." The principal instrumental and vocal selections were: Suppé's Dalmatian Overture, Mozart's overture to the Gärtnerinn aus Liebe (*La Finta Giadiniera), the romance from the Favorita, sung by Herr Steger, the romance from Euryanthe, and the rondo-finale from Cenerentola, sung by Fräulein La Grua, Proch's song An die Sterne, and G. Hölzl's Auf der Reise (encored), sung by the composer himself, and Weber's Concert-stück for the piano, played by Fräulein Standach.—Spontini's opera of the Vestalin will be produced at the Hofopern-Theater, in the beginning of next month, with Madame Marlow as the Vestal, Madame Herrmann as the High Priestess, Herr Draxler as the High Priest, and Herr Steger as Licinius.

MANHEIM (8th February).—Ernst, accompanied by Mdlle. Siona Lévy, arrived here lately from Stuttgardt, where he had given three concerts with great success. His concert and soirée at the theatre here were brilliantly attended, and the performances of the great violinist created a veritable furore. Ernst will leave immediately for Frankfort, whence he will proceed to London.

CARLSRUHE (9th February).—The directors of the theatre have lately devoted an evening to the works of Mendelssohn, on which occasion the one act opera, Die Heimkehr (Son and Stranger), the overture to Fingal's Cave, the finale from the unfinished opera of Lorely, and solos by Madame Howitz, were performed. The entertainment excited the utmost possible interest.

BERLIN.—A Matinée Musicale was given on the 29th ult., in the Concert Room of the Opera, in aid of certain charitable institutions. The person who attracted most general notice was Madame von Boek (late Schröder-Devrient), who, although she has virtually retired from the profession of which, for many years, she was so distinguished an ornament, came forward to give her assistance on this especial occasion. She sang some of Schubert's songs, much to the satisfaction of the audience, who warmly applauded her. Mesdames Tuczek, Köster, and Johanna Wagner were the other vocalists.

GENOA.—The box, enclosing the violin which Paganini bequeathed to his native city, has been opened in presence of the Syndic. It is a Guarnerius del gesu, of such a powerful tone that Paganini called it his "cannon." Camillo Sivori, who was present at the opening, tried several pieces on this violin, which enabled the assembly to appreciate its quality.

FLORENCE.—A concert has been given by Mr. Allan Irving in the Palazzo Orlandini. The Duke of Wellington was present. Mr. Irving is a pupil of Romani. Madlles Parodi and D'Havry assisted, with several other artists. The concert was fashionably attended.

* Vide the present number of Oulibicheff's Life of Mozart.—ED.

LEIPSIC.—(From our Correspondent).—Two French musicians—Louis Lacombe and Théodore Gouvy—have been here, giving symphonies and other works of their own composition. They have both received a very cordial reception from the "hard and pedantic" Saxons, in whose estimation (says M. Berlioz), "there is but one Bach, and Mendelssohn is his prophet." (For Mendelssohn read Schumann now.) The 15th, 16th, and 17th Subscription Concerts have taken place at the Gewandhaus. Mdlle. Clauss, the pianist, played at the two last, and made quite a sensation. They call her "a second Clara Wieck"—I suppose because she has played a quintet and a concerto, by Robert Schumann, in several German towns. I dare say the young artist herself is quite satisfied to be called Wilhelmina Clauss. We hear news at Leipsic of an opera having been just completed by Franz Liszt, which will be produced at Weimar.

PESTH.—Verdi's Rigoletto is very attractive at the theatre, and is the only opera that draws.

RIMINI.—The Trovatore of Verdi, executed by Mesdames Franchini-Mazzaroni and Marietta Armandi, and MM. Staffolini and Conti, has been received by the public of Rimini with enthusiasm. It is the last opera of its composer.

THE THEATRES IN PARIS.

BRESSANT, the well-known comedian of the Gymnase, has commenced his career at the Théâtre Français by two successes, as Clitandre in Molière's Femmes Savantes, and as Ancenis in a new one-act comedietta by Scribe, entitled Mon Etoile. This last production of the celebrated dramatist was completely successful.—Ponsard's comedy of L'Honneur et l'Argent has been revived at the Odéon.—Francis Berton, son-in-law of M. Samson, and formerly engaged at the Théâtre Français, has returned from St. Petersburg and taken Bressant's place, as Paul Aubry, in Diane de Lys, at the Gymnase. A piece in one act, by Messrs. Meyer and Fournier, was produced at this theatre, with success, last week. It is called La Partie de Piquet.—A vaudeville, entitled Les Erreurs du bel Age, by Messrs. Xavier, Varin, and Dumoutier, has been favourably received at the Vaudeville. Arnal and Numa sustain the principal characters.—The Palais-Royal has just produced two new pieces—Une Soubrette de Qualité, and L'Homme à la Tuile. This theatre has sustained a great loss by the death of Sainville, so suddenly snatched away from his numerous private friends and public admirers. He was buried last week, at Passy, and followed to the grave by an immense concourse of his fellow-actors and acquaintances.—Report speaks highly of a new piece called Louis XVI., shortly to be produced at the Porte Saint-Martin. The management has also accepted a piece entitled Schamyl.—A fairy tale will shortly be brought out at the Ambigu, under the name of Les Contes de la Mère l'Oie.—La Poudre de Perlinpinpin is drawing large audiences to the Théâtre National (Cirque).—The principal attraction at the Délassements-Comiques is the Orphelines du Faubourg, by Messrs. Thirion and Bedeau, and, at the Théâtre-Beaumarchais, Les Rôdeurs du Pont-Neuf, by Paul Foucher.

HACKNEY.—The lovers of music in the neighbourhood of Stamford Hill, Clapton and Hackney, gave the fourth of a series of Subscription Concerts, under the direction of Mr. George Forbes, on Tuesday evening last. The company were greatly disappointed by the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves, for whom an apology was made on the grounds that Mrs. Sims Reeves was severely ill and he could not leave her. Mr. Frank Bodda was also absent, but no excuse was made for him. The vocal performers, consequently, were Miss Messent, Miss Ursula Barclay—Mr. Herberte in lieu of Mr. Reeves, and Signor Nappi in lieu of Mr. Bodda; while the instrumentalists were Mr. George Forbes (Pianoforte), Herr Goffrie (Violin), and Mr. Paque (Violoncello). The concert had one great excellence—it was not too long. Two encores were awarded—one to Miss Messent, in Lover's "What shall I do," and the other to Mr. Herberte in "Good-bye, Sweetheart." Great credit is due to the conductor, Mr. Forbes, who deserves praise for his ability as an accompanyist.

CHESTER.—The sum of £1,100 has already been subscribed towards the proposed conversion of the Chester theatre into a music hall.

BY ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

WE have received the following interesting intelligence by the Submarine and European Telegraph :—

PARIS, Friday, Feb. 17.

Meyerbeer's opera, L'Etoile du Nord, was received with immense enthusiasm yesterday evening. The encores were numerous. At the fall of the curtain, the composer and the whole of the company were called forward, the Emperor, who was present, assisting in the tumultuous applause.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH, 1854.

THE report of the Jury on musical instruments at the Crystal Palace, in New York, has been published. The Jury was composed of the following gentlemen :—Messrs. W. Norris, G. F. Bristow, E. Girac, L. Meignen, T. Eisfield, A. Boucher, R. S. Willis, W. H. Fry, Maretzek, and Jullien. Chairman, Mr. Norris; Secretary, Mr. Bristow; Reporter, Mr. Fry.

The report of Mr. Fry is a curious document. It is to a report in ordinary what Santa Claus is to an ordinary symphony. Nevertheless, since it may be presumed to represent the opinions and embody the decisions of the Jury, we must receive it with respect—fine language, and all. In the examination of the various instruments, we are informed, "a disciplined mode of action was determined upon." Nice experiments in acoustics being rendered impossible by the "multitudinous noises of thousands of observers or idlers," and by "hydraulic echoes, martial strains," and so forth, nocturnal meetings were instituted; and, after the building was closed, the committee, doubtless with the aid of sherry-cobbler, mint julep, gin-sling, and cigars, "oftentimes," says Mr. Fry, "pursued their labours, hard on to morning's dawn." From such a course of perseverance, great results were naturally anticipated; and great results ensued. "Undisturbedly and temperately" (sic) they (the committee) "examined every instrument practically, theoretically, and historically—looking to its positive outworkings," etc. After all this various examination, the first decisive step was the unanimous adoption of "a scale of adjectives," of which we can well understand the necessity in an American report. This scale was intended to limit the number of epithets applicable to those qualities supposed to constitute merits or defects in the instruments under investigation. Each of the committee-men, with his "scale of adjectives," took notes apart; and, wonderful to relate, when these notes were compared, there was found to be no difference of opinion on any one point—which "gratifying circumstance," says Mr. Fry, "will account for the absence of any minority report."

There being no "minority report," it is almost superfluous to add that the prize was unanimously awarded to "Erard's Grand Piano." Such was the case in the London Crystal Palace; such will be the case in the Paris Crystal Palace; and such, most probably, in all future crystal palaces, even to the time when Pekin and Jeddo shall have established their Great Industrial Exhibition. At Pekin and Jeddo the prize will be unanimously awarded to "Erard's Grand Piano."

It is but fair to give some of Mr. Fry's reasons, or rather some of the reasons which Mr. Fry insinuates to have proceeded from the united wisdom of the committee, for this undivided verdict. "Music," says our Reporter, "is not a plastic art;"—nevertheless, "it may pourtray sonorously passion and emotion." The great point is the "humanity-like quality of its tones." It must "deal in the symbolism of the heart," etc. We may here observe that Mr. Fry does not consider himself bound, in his descriptive passages, by the "scale of adjectives" which the committee unanimously adopted. On the contrary, in the general summing-up, we shall see that he far exceeds even the rhapsodical use of them so congenial to the more enthusiastic of his countrymen. From the position assumed by the committee, that "the highest quality of any instrument fabricated by man is its resemblance to God's great musical production, the eloquent singing voice," Mr. Fry deduces the natural triumph of Erard. The passage is too exquisite for curtailment; and we reprint the whole of it.

"This proposition being clear, the committee, guided in their estimate of the chief artistic value of an instrument as consisting in the vocality of its tone, award unanimously the prize to Erard's Grand Piano. And, in doing so, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the decided opinion of the committee on this very important matter, let me state that their appreciation of Erard's Grand Pianos is complete and irrefragable; that they deem these instruments not only the best, but much the best, in the great vocal quality indispensable to the first class; and that, under the hands of a modern master whose digital dexterity and diversified grasp can compress distant octaves into sonorous juxtaposition and shade to the extent allowed by the piano, whatever note, such an instrument partakes, in a measure, of the eloquent and heroic temper of a chorus and an orchestra, and opens a new era in the transcendental possibilities of pianoism. This fact should be impressed on our American makers, in order that they may strive to reach, as speedily as possible, the apex of distinction thus accorded to the great French maker. It may be remarked, in connection with this matter, that the superiority of Erard's pianos arises from his superiority as a musician. Instructed in the rules of high art, and with the delicate and noble sense of a master of sound, he comes to the work of pianoforte-making better fortified than any other man. He feels and knows what are the highest lyrical requirements of a piano: and, the advanced ingenuities of the age seconding his efforts, he is enabled to take, incomparably, the first rank, as maker of poetically-toned pianofortes."

After this apostrophe to the "master of sound," and

"maker of poetically-toned pianos," who has "opened a new era in the transcendental possibilities of pianoism," even the unanimous committee, primed with their scale of adjectives, would scarcely have dreamed that an objection was at hand, to make tail (faire queue) to all this rhodomontade of nauseous and intolerable flattery? That there is an objection, however, may be gleaned from the following—an objection, with a qualification which devours it complacently:—

"The committee, however, came to a conclusion in regard to Erard's pianos, that owing to a single great deficiency, which shall be explained in its proper place, their use in the United States must be extremely limited; but, with this qualification, they are of opinion, that American pianoforte-makers should study high musical art, as Erard has done, if they would rival him: by that they mean, Musical Method, Style, and Philosophy."

To get to the nature of this objection, we have to skip more than a page of Mr. Fry's report—for which we are by no means sorry, nor, we surmise, are our readers. Subjoined are the paragraphs, in which it is plainly stated:—

"The committee, desirous of omitting nothing that would test the value of the instruments in question, determined to ascertain their quality of remaining in tune for a given time under equal circumstances. It may be remarked, that this quality is always of great value to an instrument, especially under the American climate, whose peculiarities demand a particular tenacity of such accordance; and if we consider the number of places, either villages or rural portions of our immensely extended territory, where it is very difficult or impossible to find a good tuner, the value of such harmonious durability in a piano becomes one of the chief elements in determining the purchase of an instrument. The plan which was adopted to test their tenacity of good tune was as follows:—The pianos were all tuned by order of the committee, the persons having them in charge selecting the tuners. They were then put under our seal for a period of two weeks. At the end of that time the seals were removed, and the committee tried the instruments, and came to the following decisions:—

"Among the grand pianos, Stoddart's, of London, and Bassford's, of New York, were in perfect tune: the others were slightly out of tune, except Erard's, which was very much out of tune. This fact constitutes the objection to Erard's pianos; and unless he learns to make them hold their own better, they cannot be commended unqualifiedly as suited for this hemisphere."

This is an ugly point. It was possibly found in the note-book of M. Jullien, and, proceeding from such an authority, could not with decency be overlooked. We think, however, that a reporter with so unlimited a command of language as Mr. Fry, might, unshackled by the "scale of adjectives," have stated the little objection with more delicacy and reserve. He might, as the French say, have "gazé un peu," since, if "Erard's Grand Piano" cannot be commended "unqualifiedly, as suited to the" American "hemisphere," of what consequence to the "great French maker," the "master of sound," is the fulsome and extravagant adulation which disfigures the foregoing pages of the Fry'd report? In the next issue of the document let us recommend the excision of the objectionable paragraph—which is otherwise offensive as containing praises of Mr. Stoddart, of London, and Mr. Bassford, of New York—or at least the addition of something else, which, as a qualification, may complacently devour it.

Meanwhile, what about Chickering of Boston—the "American Broadwood," as he has been styled? We have in vain sought for his name from one end of the report to the other. Did he, like Broadwood, refrain from exhibiting in the New York Crystal Palace? We have always heard Chickering mentioned as the best American pianoforte-maker; and our transatlantic friends will hardly be surprised that we should be surprised at his name not being mentioned. Possibly Chickering was afraid to enter the lists against the "master of sound."

And after all, though the prize was unanimously awarded to the "great French maker," it would appear, from page 8 of the Report, that the American pianos were the best. At least the following paragraph would seem to insinuate as much:—

"The Committee would remark generally, that such a degree of excellence has been obtained amid the strenuous competition of rival makers of pianos, that there was hardly a bad instrument among them, and the differences exist in degrees of excellence. One of our number, M. Jullien—whose experience I need hardly say is unsurpassed as regards ripe consideration of musical instruments—would particularly record his verdict in favour of the admirable strength, and often artistic beauty, in the framework of American pianos, and of their remarkable tenacity to hold well in tune, owing to the superior fidelity of such manufacture."

Nor must it be forgotten that M. Jullien is a Frenchman, whose testimony to the "superior fidelity of American manufacture" may be accepted as genuine, impartial, and disinterested. We remember, in 1851, when the prize was awarded to "Erard's Grand Piano," at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, the general opinion pronounced in favour of Broadwood's; and, while the Frenchman obtained the medal, the Englishman got the honour. There is some similarity in the two cases.

The remainder of the report relates to all descriptions of instruments; but we have no space to enter further into the matter. We cannot, however, resist giving a paragraph about flutes (page 10):—

"In regard to flutes, the Committee would state, that ivory is a bad material, and that metallic flutes are not good. Gold-mounted flutes with diamonds, the Committee are of opinion, will suit exactly Indian Settlements where gentlemen wear rings through their noses."

Of the original Yankee instrument it is stated that—"Banjos, esteemed barbarous, were passed as unworthy of notice." So much for American nationality! In order to give an example of the use made of the "scale of adjectives" adopted by the Committee, we may select that part of the table of awards which relates to grand pianofortes—the rest being all in the same vein.

|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | Erard (France) .... | — | fine | fine | fine | fine | good | fine | — | 5 |
| 1 | Huni and Hubert (Switzerland).... | — | fine | fine | fine | fine | fair | fine | — | 5 |
| 2 | Stoddart (England).. | — | good | fine | fine | good | fine | fine | 3 | 7 |
| 23 | Lakota (U. States).. | — | fine | fair | good | fine | good | fine | — | 3 |
| 29 | Hallett & Davis, do. | — | fine | fair | good | fine | fine | fine | — | 4 |
| 27 | Bassford ..... | imp. | good | fair | good | fine | good | fine | 3 | 6 |

"Fine," "good," "fair"—this is the "scale of adjectives." The remarks of the committee upon Erard's piano are—"most vocal, but does not hold its tune;" upon Huni and Hubert's—"very fine instrument;" upon Bassford's—"improvement in action—feeble tone;" and upon the others, nil. Bronze medals were awarded to all of the six.

LEOMINSTER.—Mr. John Wilkes, the pianist, gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music, in the Assembly Room of the Lion Hotel, on Thursday evening, the 9th instant. He was assisted in the vocal department by Mrs. Alfred Gilbert (late Miss Charlotte Cole), Miss Susanna Cole, and Mr. W. J. Burvill, of the Hereford Choir; and Mr. Alfred Gilbert, as pianist. The concert was very successful, and Mr. Wilkes came in for his share of the applause and encores.

"Six Musical Bagatelles," for the Pianoforte. By T. M. Mudie. R. Mills, London; Wood and Co., Edinburgh.

These small pieces, from the pen of a musician of known attainments, are designed as a series of improving lessons for players of moderate skill. They are not merely to be commended as successfully accomplishing that object, but for the still higher merit of being essentially good music—music calculated to refine the taste, no less than assist the fingers of the pupil. We have received the first three numbers, each of which has its special attraction. No. 1 (dedicated to Miss Fanny Lucas) is a lively allegretto in C, 3-8 time, with an episode in F, somewhat prolonged, but interesting throughout. From the 5th bar to the 8th, in page 1, a point of musicianship is detected, in the progression of the bass, which will at once create, in the mind of the attentive student, an interest that is sustained to the end. No. 2, a graceful movement in A, 6-8 time (dedicated to Miss Mary C. Pye) is, musically considered, far superior to No. 1. It is also rather more difficult. The first theme is charmingly developed. A tributary passage, commencing on the dominant, and afterwards repeated with some modifications at the end of the episode (page 5), shows Mr. Mudie to be thoroughly impregnated with Mozart, whose grand pianoforte duet in F he had evidently in his mind. The episode, also in E (which is a pity, since it brings you back, at the bottom of page 4, to the same half close which introduced it, at the bottom of page 3), is an agreeably harmonised subject, containing allusions, more welcome than obtrusive, to a chorus in Semiramide, and a duet in the Prophète. The first theme is resumed in an easy and natural manner; and a coda, containing some animated reference to the Mozartian passage alluded to, brings the piece to a conclusion with effect. No. 3, an allegretto in G, 2-4 time, is as piquant and animated as some of Haydn's happiest rondos. Of the three numbers. this is decidedly the most original, and, moreover, the most interesting to the connoisseur. The episode is a broad and open melody in the subdominant, which contrasts well with the principal theme. The whole movement is well conducted; and the termination, pianissimo, is new and striking,

"Nocturne," for the Pianoforte. T. M. Mudie. Ditto, ditto.

The only objection we have to make against this elegant movement—which is dedicated to Miss Emily Catharine Potter, the daughter of one of our most distinguished musicians—is on account of its undue brevity. It is too good, indeed, to be so very short; though possibly it may encounter a larger sale than if it had been longer. The style of this movement—in A major, 6-8 time—is something after the model of the notturnos of John Field, with passages, nevertheless (as, for example, in the harmonic progression at the head of page 5), that declare its modern parentage. The nocturne is considerably more difficult than the bagatelles, but not, for that, beyond the reach of players of ordinary skill.

We recommend these compositions, both for their utility as elementary lessons, and for their tendency to keep the taste of the student in the right direction. How much better is such music than those eternal hashes, and pot-pourris, made out of airs from popular operas, which have for so many years flooded the market, and damaged the musical appreciation alike of amateurs and professors!

"Jeannie," Ballad. Written and composed by George Linley.—"The Voice from the Deep." Written by Sir Francis Peacocke, Bart. Composed by Joseph F. Duggan.—"The Belle of the Fete." Valse. By F. G. Tinney. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.

"The Violante Waltz," for the Pianoforte, by Charles H. Compton.—"Fleur du Bal"—Galop Brillant Pour Piano. Par Ch. Eluam.—"Angel Forms will Guard us There"—Song. By Ed. Land. Cramer, Beale, and Co.

"The Bosphorus Galop." By Louise Christine. Jullien and Co.——"The Pantomime Galop." Composed by G. A. Durlacher. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.——"The Seymour Polka." By Mrs. H. St. Leger. Rûst and Co.——"The Old Mill," Ballad. Composed by A. G. Fialon. T. Chappell.——"Annette"—Valse Pour Piano. By T. W. Naumann.——"La Rose Blanche"—Morceau Elegant. By Jasienski. Boosey and Sons.

Here we have a collection of ballads and dances, which, if there is anything particular in them, will be worth the having; but alas! for the most part we fear they will turn profitless matters, altogether barren of musical interest. Let us see.

Mr. Linley's "Jeannie"—which has a lithograph of a melancholy-looking peasant-girl leaning on a ruined wall, with her bare feet in the stream—is a ballad much resembling some hundred others. Like all Mr. Linley's songs it is carefully harmonised; so much so, that we were rather surprised at the hidden fifths in bar 3, line 4, page 1. By the way, this bar of the melody, and that which makes the half close on the dominant (bar 3, line 3, page 2), ought to be banished from song-writing, as hacknied beyond revival.

"The Voice from the Deep" is not much more original than "Jeanie," though there is more style about it, and, if placed in an opera, it would probably stand as good a chance of acquiring popularity as one-half the modern ballads which have attained a large sale from fortuitous circumstances, wholly independent of their merits. The accompaniments are written with Mr. Duggan's accustomed care.

The Belle of the Fête is a lively and attractive set of waltzes, as good, indeed, as many by Strauss himself, and must be excepted on that account from all censure. Mr. Tinney writes like a thorough musician, decidedly in the Viennese school, but a thorough musician; and his music seems calculated especially for orchestral effect. Of the whole set we must point out No. 3 as the prettiest; it is more than pretty—it is charming. There is a cornet part, and a coloured lithograph of the "Belle" by the inexhaustible Mr. Brandard.

The Violante, though betraying no marks of originality, is a spirited and well written waltz. But why does Mr. Compton spoil his first figure by that very affected and by no means agreeable enharmonic change from E to E flat?

We have nothing to urge in favour of Mr. C. Eluam's Fleur du Bal, which, though bucolic in its simplicity, was hardly, we think, worth engraving. A more innocent galop was never composed.

"Angel Forms will guard thee there," is a sentimental ballad. The opening, in which the bass sings nearly the whole melody in unison with the voice, is not ineffective; but we cannot help thinking that for so simple a song the accompaniments are overcharged. We must notice the point on the words (line 1, page 3) "Let there be no bright eye weeping," where the bass and voice, in unison, go up to the D flat, as bold and well thought of. This would have been still happier in its place in the song, but for the worn out transition (E flat, C flat, B flat, A flat, with their dominants, to E flat again) which comes shortly after, to very little purpose.

The Bosphorus and the Pantomime are both excellent galops. There is nothing new in the tone or tune of either of them; but they are correctly written, and well accentuated, and, without pretension, accomplish their purpose. Under the circumstances, we have nothing left but to compliment Mdlle. Louise Christine and Miss Durlacher on their success.

As much may be said of the Seymour, and even more, since there is a certain French piquancy about the themes of this Polka, and a certain research (also French) about the harmonies. The second figure, in A minor, is extremely pretty. Mrs. St. Leger is, therefore, also entitled to our compliments.

If the ballad of "The Old Mill" had been signed Michael William Balfe, we should not have doubted its genuineness. Mr. Fialon's tune is Balfe to the note—with a note not in the chord, to be dwelt upon in the first bar, for expression, and other traits of the kind. It is, nevertheless, a good ballad in its way, and if well sung, would we have no doubt, be effective.

The Annette Valse is inoffensive, and the 3rd figure really pretty; but the introduction in 6-8 time is very insipid, and we recommend Mr. Naumann to cut it out from the next edition, in case the first is ever sold.

There is little to criticise in La Rose Blanche except the title-page. Mr. Jasienski should leave to others to call his nocturne a morceau élégant — Miss Helena Bainbridge, for instance, to whom it is dedicated. La Rose Blanche would seem to have been composed with an eye (or an ear) to the harp, since all the chords are sprinkled in arpeggios, which on a pianoforte becomes, after a time, very monotonous. Mr. Jasienski might close up and condense some of his harmonies with advantage; otherswise, the performer will run the risk of be ingaccused whipping, instead of playing upon, the instrument.

"CORBEILLE D'ORANGES QUADRILLE." By. G. Montagne. Boosey and Sons.

THE lively opera by Auber, of the above name, has furnished the subject for this quadrille. The melodies being very pretty, and the arrangement most effective, no more requires to be said in its recommendation.

And now, having gone through the collection of ballads and dances, we are bound to state that there is more in them than we anticipated. We have a still larger one for next week.

DRAMATIC.

HAYMARKET.—Sir Robert Rovely is a "fine gentleman," of the time of George II., married to an amiable woman, who is doatingly fond of him, and desirous of enjoying more of his society than he is inclined to accord her. Sir Robert has been married some length of time, and absents himself from his domestic hearth more than a husband should. His excuse generally is, that he has been detained by state affairs of great importance, for we are given to understand that he is engaged in some diplomatic capacity. The real cause, however, for his absence is that, like many other husbands in all ages, he is slightly oblivious of his marriage-vows, and has become more interested than he ought to be in a certain siren, by name Florentina, and by profession a singer. Lady Rovely bears his neglect patiently for a considerable period, but her suspicions are at length aroused, and she reproaches him with his conduct. This does not tend to make things better, and Sir Robert, as a matter of course, finds fewer attractions than ever in his own house. Such is the posture of affairs, when Lady Rovely learns, from some words Sir Robert lets fall in his sleep—for the only evening on which, to his wife's great delight, he promises to stay with her, he doses off in the most husband-like fashion possible—that he intends going to a masquerade at Ranelagh, the resort of the fashionable and dissolute young bloods of those days. She instantly determines to follow him, and secures a certain Dr. Coddlelove as her guide and protector. Dr. Coddlelove is the very opposite of Sir Robert, being devoted heart and soul to his spouse; never happy out of her company, and, indeed, rendering himself rather troublesome by the excess of his affection. He is the personification of conjugal felicity, appearing to have read and deeply appreciated Pope's maxim :—

> "Know then this truth, enough for man to know, > Virtue alone is happiness below."

His horror may, therefore, be more easily imagined than described, when Lady Rovely insists upon his accompanying her to a place of rather more than doubtful character—or, in other words, to a place of no character at all. He cannot escape, however, so he summons up all his courage, purchases a false nose of enormous dimensions, and sets out upon his expedition. Arrived at the gardens, where he is in continual apprehension of being recognised, despite the gigantic nose just mentioned, he meets Sir Robert, who is in no very pleasant humour at not having found the lady with whom he has come to spend the evening. The action now becomes more involved; Dr. Coddlelove is petrified at finding his own wife in such a place, and Mrs. Coddlelove, on her part, is equally shocked at her liege lord's presence there. The doctor's motive for coming is, however, as we know, perfectly unexceptionable, and his wife is as innocent as himself, having been invelgled to the gardens by some female acquaintances, seconded by that sentiment so peculiar to ladies from the time of Bluebeard up to the present hour—curiosity. After a series of strange mistakes, Sir Robert begins an intrigue with Lady Rovely, and, in consequence of her being taken for another person by five different gentlemen, immediately becomes involved in as many duels, and seems to stand a tolerably good chance of ending his career, when he is rescued from his perilous position by Lady Rovely's unmasking. Explanations and repentance follow, as a matter of course, and the fall of the curtain leaves every one happy and contented, audience as well as actors.

Such is an outline of the new comedy of Ranelagh, produced at this theatre last Saturday. It is taken from a French piece, entitled Un Mari qui se dérange. In the original, which is, we believe, in three or five acts, the action takes place in the present day. The author of the English version, Mr. Palgrave Simpson, has laid it in the time of George II., when ladies of rank and respectability were not quite so particular about the latter quality as they are now. The dialogue is smooth and flowing. We have heard some persons assert that it is not sufficiently brilliant, but we cannot agree with them. We entertain a shrewd suspicion that the conversation of wits was not more lively in those times than in our own, and we think it a great mistake to make every character in a piece indulge in a continual fire of smart repartees, which is uncharacteristic, and decidedly unnatural. To our mind, Mr. Palgrave Simpson has executed his task with considerable ability, and invested his comedy with an agreeable dash of the couleur locale, as our neighbours say, which lends it a certain charm, and shows the author well read in the literature of the period. The only fault we had to find was, that the first act, which, to use a technical phrase, is a carpenters' act, serving merely to lead to the imbroglio in the second, is much too long, and, as a natural consequence, rather heavy. It requires a little judicious cutting.

Mr. George Vandenhoff acquitted himself, on the whole, satisfactorily as Sir Robert Rovely, but there is too much of the tragedian and too little of the comedian in his style for him to act the character unexceptionably. He wants lightness, is too stately, and anxious to do more than is requisite. Although aware that "comparisons are oderous," we cannot help expressing a wish that the part had fallen into the hands of Mr. Leigh Murray, whom it would have exactly suited. Mr. Buckstone's Dr. Coddlelove was excellent; nothing could be more ludicrous than his horror when addressed by Mrs. Coddlelove, whom, thanks to her mask and domino, he takes to be not une dame comme il faut but une dame comme il en faut. Miss Reynolds was ladylike and graceful in Lady Rovely, but somewhat deficient in earnestness and passion. Mrs. Fitzwilliam made the most of a good part, Mrs. Coddlelove. The other characters are insignificant; neither they nor the gentlemen who played them require especial notice, if we except, perhaps, Mr. Tilbury.

The piece was admirably put upon the stage, the scene in Act II., representing Ranelagh in the time of George II., produced a great effect. The costumes were rich, tasteful, and correct. At the fall of the curtain the applause was unanimous, and Ranelagh was announced for repetition without a dissentient voice.

MARYLEBONE.—Serjeant Talfourd's Ion has been produced at this theatre, with all the resources of the management. Mrs. J. W. Wallack appears in the principal character, and Mr. J. W. Wallack in Adrastus. Mrs. Charles Kean, when Miss Ellen Tree, was, we believe, the first actress who attempted the part, which Macready had made so interesting. A male character, however youthful, could scarcely be suited to Mrs. Charles Kean, whose forte lies in more delicate and tender impersonations. Miss Cushman was more successful. In power and energy, physical and mental, she was calculated to pourtray male characters with success. Mrs. J. W. Wallack has not the force and passion of Miss Cushman, nor the softness and delicacy of Mrs. Charles Kean; nevertheless, she possesses energy and pathos, and is not deficient in other qualities which are necessary to constitute a tragedian. Mrs. J. W. Wallack is indeed an admirable actress, and, in high tragic parts, has probably but one superior on the English stage. Her Ion is an elaborately studied performance, truthful and impressive from first to last. We have seen Mrs. Wallack in parts better fitted to her capabilities, but in none which more undeniably declared her an artist. Mr. J. W. Wallack is seen to advantage in Adrastus. The theatre is crowded whenever Ion is performed.

OLYMPIC.—The announcement of an original three-act drama, with a part for Mr. Robson, brought a crowded audience to the Olympic on Monday night. The drama, entitled the Love Lock, had the advantage of being admirably acted throughout, and put on the stage without regard to expense. Nothing, however, could save it. The introduction promised something, and was favourably received. But from this something proceeded nothing. The first act was listened to patiently, the second impatiently, and the last not at all. The Love Lock, in short, was unanimously condemned.

We shall not attempt to analyse the plot. The author, at the commencement, seems to have projected a moral for his play. There are two elements—the good and the bad. The good element consists in a lock of a lover's hair tied round the neck. The bad, we could not understand; whether a real personage or a personification we failed to make out. In the first scene the bad element appears as a sea-captain, and, as he tells the watchman he has come from abroad and has made his fortune, and gives him sundry broad gold pieces, we believe him to be mortal. In the next scene he tells a poet, who is tapster at a public-house, the same story; and everything goes on naturally, until the poet's intended being unable to pay her rent, or her father's, and the poet being in despair, not having the means to assist her, the sea-captain—who, some minutes previously, had walked away in a very seamanlike manner—comes up supernaturally through a trap-door, pays the money, and, in spite of the tears of his mistress, carries off the poet to the diggings. At first we were pleased with the sea-captain, whom we fancied the author intended for a maritime Don Juan, making love and committing murder in the same breath. But the jump-up the trap-door upset our calculations. It seems of little consequence, however, whether man, or devil, Iago or Mephistopheles, since he does not affect the plot.

Thirty years are supposed to elapse between the introduction and the first act. The poet comes back old and insane, and the sea-captain appears as a Count Sebastian, a great man at some foreign court. During the poet's absence, his sweetheart marries Peter Hardtman, who has become landlord of the "Inn," with a grown-up daughter, the image of her mother when young, and about to be married to an organist. Count Sebastian is endeavouring to obtain young Rose as a singer—we suppose, for the Opera—but has not been able to gain her consent, or that of her mother. When the poet comes back from the diggings, he takes young Rose for her mother, to whom he was betrothed thirty years before, and, pretending he is in possession of vast wealth, proposes to marry her. Peter, the husband of Rose, believes the mad poet to possess the secret of the transmutation of metals, and promises him his daughter on condition of his divulging it.

In the next act, the poet and Peter meet in a lonely room by night for the purpose of making the gold. Rose, the daughter, is concealed in a clock-case, and a mysterious picture hangs on the wall, and displays a human interest in the practices going on before it. Whom this picture represents, or what is the meaning of the real face being changed for the painted one, we were at a loss to know. The poet fancies he sees the picture smiling at him,and, seizing the candle, repudiates its interference; he shakes his fist at it, and, in the heat of his gesticulations, dashes the candle against a curtain and sets it on fire. The room is in flames in a short time; Rose leaps shrieking from the clock-case, and runs off, followed by her father and the poet; Rose, the elder, enters terror-stricken; Count Sebastian glides in through a secret panel, and, standing in the midst of the conflagration, points significantly to the clock; and the curtain falls.

The last act is still more mysterious. The madman recovers his senses, and, recognising the real Rose of his affection, dismisses Count Sebastian through a trap-door with a prayer, takes possession of his black cloak, and dies while conferring a benediction upon his old sweetheart.

Robson had a singular part, but his genius flashed through the obscurity, and he made some really fine points. Mr. Wigan, too, played exceedingly well, as did Miss P. Horton, Mrs. Wigan, Miss Turner, and Mr. Emery. The scenery was excellent, and the dresses new and appropriate. But all was to no purpose.

STRAND.—Miss Rebecca Isaacs having gone to the provinces for a few weeks, opera has given way to drama at this little theatre. On Monday, the old-fashioned melo-drama, The Robber's Wife, was produced for Miss H. Noel and Mr. George Hodson, who are at present the "great guns" of the establishment. Miss Noel is not without pretensions as a tragic actress. She has a fine Siddonian face, and an imposing figure. In fact, she looks a tragedian, and lacks no physical requisite excepting a strong voice. Miss Noel's voice would be hardly powerful enough for a large stage. Mr. George Hodson has a great deal of talent, which lies in the personification of Irishmen in low life. He should not yet attempt the Irish gentleman. His Larry O'Gig in The Robber's Wife is excellent—full of life and humour; but his Sir Patrick O'Plenipo, in The Irish Ambassador, requires much consideration before he can succeed in it. Mr. Hodson, however, has at present scarcely a competitor in the delineation of Irish characters; and, with study and zeal, he may achieve distinction. Miss Fanny Reeves sings ballads nightly, with success. The house is well attended. Mr. Flexmore took his benefit on Thursday, on which occasion he was assisted by Miss Fielding and Mr. Honey, who played in the extravaganza of Antony and Cleopatra. The theatre, which had been but moderately well filled at whole price, became crowded before the pantomime commenced. Mr. Flexmore was encored in the Sailor's Hornpipe. To-night is the last night of the pantomime.

SADLER'S WELLS.—Dion Boucicault's comedy of London Assurance was given here last week for the first time, and, from the great satisfaction manifested by a crowded house, the piece is likely to become popular at Sadler's Wells. Miss Cooper's pleasant and sparkling delineation of Lady Gay Spanker would have been still better if she exhibited less affectation and mannerism. Miss Kate Hickson, who played the heroine, is a novice, but indicates some talent. She has already acquired ease and self-possession. She delivered many points of the dialogue with point and humour; and a pretty face and graceful form did the rest. It is needless to add that the comedy has been put on the stage with the usual care and costliness.

On Monday last, a new farce, written by I. V. Bridgeman, and entitled A Good Run for It, was produced for the first time. If the title is applied to the piece itself, it is not a bad one, to judge from the hearty manner in which the audience appeared to enjoy the performance. The farce was exceedingly well played by Mr. Lewis Ball, and by all the ladies and gentleman concerned. Had it been produced at the Adelphi, we should have denominated it a "screamer;" brought out at Sadler's Wells, we content ourselves with pronouncing it a very successful and amusing farce.

THE JERROLD DRAMATIC CLUB.—The members of the Jerrold Dramatic Club gave one of their Drawing-room Entertainments on Saturday evening last, at the London Mechanics' Institution, Chancery Lane, for the benefit of the widow and four children of the late William Willis, many years employed at the Shipping Gazette. The club were assisted by the Amateur Band, and also by Mr. J. T. Sutton, Mr. Wilston, Miss C. Felton, Mr. J. W. Fielding, and the members of the Sappho Glee Club. The singing of the professionals gave the utmost satisfaction, and the general arrangements of the evening reflected the highest credit upon the gentleman who officiated as conductor. If we may judge from the plaudits and encores, the audience were delighted with the entertainment. Between 700 and 800 persons were present, and we understand that there will be a handsome surplus for the widow.

PLYMOUTH.—The Fourth Concert of Mr. Newcombe's series, on Thursday, was fully attended. Mrs. Henry Reed, our rising young pianist, was highly successful, and more than once encored. The other artists were new to the audience, but acquitted themselves to their satisfaction.

THE WIFE OF OMER PASHA.—Some of the English journals, in serving up scraps of information regarding Omer Pasha's domestic arrangements, have made one or two mistakes. His wife, the daughter of his friend and patron, a Turkish pasha of great wealth, it has been stated, has broken through the restrictions placed on her sex by the Mohammedan law, appears in society, and receives her husband's guests. This is the work of imagination. The lady in question is a Wallachian, and complies with the customs of the country, having too much sense to imagine that any good can be done by violently outraging long-established prejudices. Du reste, she is all that rumour bespeaks her; plays well, is a good composer, and is educating her daughter as a European.—(Correspondent of the Daily News.)

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—An Undress Concert was given at the Concert Hall on Wednesday evening, the 8th inst. The full pieces were Mozart's symphony in G minor, and the C minor of Beethoven. The band played two overtures—The Ruler of the Spirits and Tancredi. Madame D'Anterney was the vocalist. Mr. Carrodus performed Ernst's fantasia on themes from Otello. The Manchester Courier thus alludes to the young violinist's performance:

"We spoke favourably of the performance of Mr. Carrodus as a quartet player last week; we then spoke of his style and tone being well adapted to chamber performances; we were not prepared for the energy and vivacity which he displayed in the Fantasia by Ernst. It was really a brilliant performance, and it was deservedly much applauded."

We are glad to find Mr. Carrodus justifying, in our most musical provincial towns, the warm praise which has been bestowed upon him by the London press. Mr. Perceval, from Liverpool, one of the best provincial flautists, played Drouet's brilliant solo on "Rule Britannia" with good effect. Madame D'Anterney sang a variety of vocal pieces, and among others a Tyrolienne, in which an obbligato for the oboe, performed by Mr. Jennings, shared the applause with the lady. A German song by Kücken was accompanied on the piano-forte; but the other songs of Madame D'Anterney had the advantage of orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Seymour was leader, and Mr. Charles Hallé, conductor. The improvement in the band since the last-named gentlemen was appointed director is remarkable. It is now, by many degrees, the best in the provinces.

IBID.—At the last Saturday Evening Concerts, a selection of sea songs was given. Miss Whitham and Mr. Delavanti were the vocalists.—The Sacred Harmonic Union gave a concert at the Mechanics' Institution on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. Weston.—On Friday evening, the 10th, the Rossendale Harmonic Choral Society gave a concert, in the large hall of the Bacup Mechanics' Institution. The principal vocalists were Miss Milner, Mr. Perring, and Mr. Wrigley.

BRISTOL.—The annual concert of Mr. H. C. Cooper took place on Wednesday at the Victoria Rooms. He was assisted by the members of the London Orchestral Union, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon. The first part of the concert was confined to the works of Mozart and Beethoven. It commenced with Mozart's symphony in G minor, which was finely performed, and produced a great sensation. Mr. H. C. Cooper played the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto, and introduced a long and elaborate cadenza. The first part concluded with Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, which was admirably played by the band. The second part began with Rossini's overture to Guillaume Tell. This was unanimously encored. An operatic fantasia arranged by Mr. Alfred Mellon, upon themes from Lucrezia Borgia, introduced some solos, prominent among which was one for the flute, executed by Mr. Robert Pratten. A duo concertante, founded on Bishop's song, "The Mocking Bird," was played on the flute and clarionet by Mr. Pratten and Mr. Maycock in a highly effective manner; and the concert terminated with the Wedding March from Mendelssohn's music in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Mr. Cooper was assisted in the vocal department by Miss Fanny Rowland, who, in the first part, sang Mozart's "Batti, Batti," and Beethoven's "List to the Quail;" in the second, Donizetti's "In questo semplice," which obtained an encore, Haydn's canzonet "My Mother bids me bind my Hair," and a ballad by Mr. Mellon, "I know that he loves me." The rooms were crowded.

EDINBURGH.—The Reid Commemoration Concert was given on Monday, the 13th. The Music Hall was crowded on the occasion of this annual performance, which is connected with the Chair of Music in our University. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which engrossed the whole of the first part, the Pastoral and Minuet, with the Grand March by General Reid, making a short second part; the third being devoted to a selection from Weber's Oberon. In the performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony (which had never previously been attempted in Scotland), there was much to admire; but to do justice to such a work, an orchestra of far greater strength than that engaged would be required. However, there was little to be wished for in any respect, except numerical force, in the execution of the three instrumental movements. The opening recitative in the choral finale was delivered by Herr Formes in his broadest style of declamation, every phrase standing out clearly and distinctly. The other singers were Mdme. Caradori, Herr Reichardt, and Miss Huddart, who did all that could well be done for the difficult and unthankful solos and concerted movements. The tenor solo, by Herr Reichardt, elicited marked approbation. The work was listened to with great attention, and the applause bestowed on the various passages formed the test of appreciation, and the best acknowledgment to the Professor on the part of the public for the intellectual treat afforded them. The Pastoral and Minuet of General Reid are on every occasion a sine qud non to the concert. In the selection from Oberon, the most attractive piece was the grand aria "Victory," by Herr Reichardt, who made his first appearance in Edinburgh at the Reid Concert two seasons back. Mdme. Caradori gave "Ocean, thou mighty Monster," in the style expected from this accomplished vocalist. Mdme. Zimmerman pleased all by her unpretending singing in the cavatina, "A lonely Arab Maid," and, with Mdme. Caradori, took part in the duet, "Haste, gallant Knight," which formed the finale to the programme. Herr Anschuez was the conductor.

IBID.—Miss Helen Faucit is performing at the Theatre Royal. She appeared lately as Imogen in Cymbeline, and Rosalind in As You Like It, with the greatest success. The theatre is crowded every night she appears.

BIRMINGHAM.—Mr. Elliott has commenced some classes, on the Hullah System, with success.

CHELTENHAM.—Mr. G. Marshall's concert took place, on Tuesday evening, at the Royal Old Wells Music Hall. The band of the Orchestral Union was specially engaged. The chief feature of the programme was Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. A new overture by Mr. Marshall was produced, and Mr. H. C. Cooper performed Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Miss Fanny Rowland was the vocalist.—The Amateurs gave a performance in the same rooms on Thursday. Miss in Her Teens, Amoroso, and the Bengal Tiger, were the pieces. The principal gentlemen were, Major Burns, Captains Lightfoot and Grange, Messrs. N. Stevens, V. de Pontigny, and J. G. Beavan; and the ladies, the Misses Armour and Waldron.—Signora Montignani, the successor of Miss Loveday, the pianist, gave her first Annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms, on Friday Evening, the 10th, and made a very favourable début. She was assisted by Miss Dolby, Signor Piatti, and Mr. Blagrove.

ATHERSTONE.—Mrs. Paget gave a second concert in the Town Hall, on the evening of the 7th, which was as successful as the first. The vocalists were Mrs. Bull, Mrs. Paget, and Mr. Paget. The programme contained a good selection of songs, duets, and trios. Mrs. Bull, who was new to the Atherstone audience, made a favourable impression in the cavatina, "Soave Immagine," and was encored in the "Prima Donna's Song." Mr. and Mrs. Paget sang Barnett's "Sol-fa" duet, and "Old and Young," by Parry. The latter was encored. Mrs. Paget was also much applauded in "Scenes of my Youth" (Benedict) and "Auld Robin Gray." Mr. Paget was encored in "Simon the Cellarer." Mrs. Bull and Mrs. Paget sang two duets together, one of which, "We come to thee, Savoy," was redemanded. Mr. Thompson presided at the pianoforte, and also played a solo fantasia by Beyer, which was called for again.—Birmingham Journal, Feb. 11.

MAIDSTONE.—The performance of sacred music announced by the Maidstone Choral Society, took place in the Corn Exchange on Tuesday night week. The instrumental portion of the performances was satisfactory, and the vocal of more than average merit. In the selections from the Creation, the singing of Miss Stabbach was highly effective in expression and taste, and had the rare merit of avoiding meretricious display. That of Miss Lizzy Dyer was also good. Mr. Suchet Champion's voice is agreeable. The Elijah of Mendelssohn realised all the expectations which had been raised concerning it. The choruses were well given, and the whole performance was eminently successful, the auditory frequently testifying their admiration by loud applause.

LEAMINGTON.—(From a Correspondent).—Mrs. N. Merridew's annual concert was given on Saturday week, in the Music Hall, before a full and fashionable audience. Mrs. Merridew sang the duet, "O'er Shepherd-pipe," with Mr. Weiss, and Wallace's "Cradle Song," and well merited the approbation she elicited. The concert was supported by the Beale party (now on a tour in the provinces), composed of Miss Arabella Goddard, Mdme. Amedei, Mrs. Weiss, M. Sainton, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Land. Miss Goddard's performance of a fantasia by Wallace, on Maritana, fully justified all the eulogiums that have been bestowed upon her. Her execution is perfect, and the tone she produces from the piano is the most charming I have heard. She was encored, and substituted the Improvisata of Stephen Heller, upon Mendelssohn's air, "On Song's bright Pinions," in which her musical feeling had more scope, while Thalberg's "Moïse," which she played in the second part, was a marvellous display of execution. I have said so much about the pianiste (my apology is that I am a "bit of a pianist" myself) that I have scarcely room left for anything else. Mdme. Amedei, the new contralto, was so hoarse, that an apology was made for her; I must, therefore, reserve my opinion for another time. Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, old favourites, were encored in Verdi's duet, "Il pianto," and the same compliment was paid to Mr. Weiss in Mendelssohn's "I'm a Roamer." M. Sainton played a solo of his own on Lindpaintner's "Standard Bearer," and was encored. He also performed a duet with Miss Goddard (Thalberg and De Beriot's Huguenots), a remarkable display of execution on both sides. Among the concerted vocal pieces was Frank Mori's "Villagers' Evening Song," which was well sung, and much admired. Mr. Land was the accompanyist. The concert gave general satisfaction to the friends and supporters of Mrs. Merridew.

A LETTER FROM WEBER.

A MIDDLE-AGED gentleman having conceived the idea of abandoning a lucrative business for the sake of devoting himself to the study of music, wrote to Carl Maria Von Weber, requesting his advice on the matter. The following was the reply:—

"SIR:—The unreserved confidence which you have thought proper to repose in me, justifies my addressing you with that openness and sincerity which artists owe to each other. By the young, and by men of too ardent and sanguine a temperament, plain truth is apt to be regarded as cold, harsh, and ill-timed; but your more matured judgment and experience will do me the credit to believe that what I am about to say, in reply to your letter, proceeds from the best feelings, and from the most cordial wishes for your well-being in life.

"It is your wish to dedicate yourself to the art, and to follow music as a profession: as you apply to me for my advice under the circumstances, I consider it my duty to direct your attention to the almost infinite difficulties with which you will have to contend. I am not acquainted with the degree of talent with which you have been gifted by Providence; but of this I am certain, that even to the talents of the higher, nay, I might even add the highest, order, favorable circumstances are necessary, to enable their possessors to make a fortunate hit in the world, and obtain a certain degree of credit and reputation. At your age, when the critical faculty has obtained the ascendancy,—a faculty which is always stronger in proportion to the degree of mental culture;—it is exceedingly difficult to retrace your steps, and commence the grammatical and technical portion of the art in such a manner, and with such success, as not to sink under the attempt, or fall into perplexing doubts as to your own capability for the pursuit;—a painful state of mind, which is frequently productive of much evil. We well know what the effect of art is, when cultivated for itself alone; when pursued with singleness of heart, which, in the end, is sure to gain the ascendancy over all artificial means. We are not satisfied unless we at once produce the intended effect; we do not sing unconsciously like a bird: we have witnessed the effect of song, and, having calculated the same, direct our efforts to attain it. It is a cause originating externally with regard to us, and proceeding to act internally; whereas, according to its real nature, the very reverse should take place.

"But supposing that your talents and perseverance should surmount all this, and that you become a superior musician: still are you sure that you will succeed in convincing the world of the fact, and that you will not be forced to sink beneath the thousand crosses and vexations that beset the artist? How much splendid talent has in this way been lost to the world! and Heaven knows if the number of those be not considerable, who, after having attained the envied pinnacle of the art, would willingly exchange their honours for what it has cost them in the acquisition! It is a burden that becomes every day more oppressive to the possessor, and robs him of himself, and of his relatives and friends, to the world's end. Again: let me ask what substantial benefit the artist derives from the pursuit to which he devotes himself with so much ardour, and what hope he has that his profession will advance him to any distinguished place in social life? If you are a practical musician, what object have you in view? is it a situation in the chapel?—this is not to be obtained without much difficulty, and, when obtained, the compensation is still scanty and insignificant: is it tuition?—how rarely does this produce anything beyond a mere pittance, barely sufficient for the maintenance of life. Are you a composer?—how many years must pass before you become known to the public, and obtain sufficient patronage even to enable you to defray the expenses of the publication of your works, not to speak of the additional difficulty of finding managers to produce them. And what if you succeed at last? a sparing existence is all you have a right to hope for.

"It is true that there are exceptions to all I have advanced: but what justifies you in believing that you will belong to the chosen few, to whom they apply? And grant that this good fortune attend you, in what respect will they prove valuable to you? Only in so far as they influence the breast of every honest man; in the consciousness of duty fulfilled according to the best of his power, and in a resignation to the will of Providence, amidst all the difficulties thrown in the way of well-meant endeavours, and amidst all the neglect and ingratitude of the world. In conclusion, let me beg of you not to set down what I have thought it a duty to state, in answer to your application, as a motive either of encouragement or dissuasion in the accomplishment of the object you have in view. In cases where we take a decisive step which is to influence the whole of our existence, that internal voice which speaks from our own heart must be the only judge.

I am, &c., C. M. VON WEBER."

The last sentence in the letter of the illustrious composer conveys a truth which outweighs all the semi-dissuasive argument of the rest.

The boasted glory of the Athenian State is now to be proved. Creon comes, as announced by Ismene, to solicit the return of Œdipus to Thebes. His specious persuasions are indignantly rejected. Œdipus, when first the consciousness of his ill-omened destiny burst upon him, in the recklessness of despair that prompted him to destroy his organs of sight, would have cast himself unguided on the desert wild, hoping thus to obtain the relief of death from his incomparable sufferings, and then the State would not allow him to depart; when familiarity with his woes had taught him to endure them, feeling the dependency of his self-inflicted helplessness, he would have remained within the shelter of his native walls, and then the State cast him forth to wander through the world; now, in consideration not of his wrongs, but of the preternatural power of which he is the instrument, his presence is claimed, but the claim is with noble scorn denied.

IV.

The wonderful enforcement of music is now added to the power of the words and the energy of the declamation, to intensify, to exalt, and to idealize the effect of this most exciting scene.

Creon declares that he has captured Ismene, and proceeds to tear her sister from the all-dependent reliance of their helpless father, seeking to extort by the force displayed in this outrage the reluctant consent which his ill-assumed courtesies have failed to win. The devoted Antigone, the powerless Œdipus, appeal to the promised protection of the Coloniate elders. These remonstrate vainly with the inexorable Thebans, and, finding the vanity of their remonstrances, call upon their fellow-citizens to hasten to the virgin's rescue. Creon orders his guards to seize upon Antigone, who passionately appeals for justice, while her sightless father reaches his expecting hand through empty air to search for her accustomed grasp, to find his touch, the only sense that serves to him the office of his eyes, ungratified. Mute implements of the tyrannic will of Creon, his attendant guards force Antigone from the scene.

Such is the action of the Strophe of this eminently dramatic piece, which, musically, may be described as forming the First Part of the movement. The exciting altercation between the three characters and the Chorus Leader is carried on in spoken dialogue, accompanied by the tremolo of the orchestra, and coloured by the one fragmentary phrase that, elaborated into every conceivable modification, points the breaks in the impetuous verse, gives connection to the broken character of the music, and unity to its expression, and induces a dramatic effect of the utmost power. The choral voices first enter with a rhythmical, but very declamatory passage: excited by Creon's threatened outrage, and, prompted by the earnest appeal of Œdipus, unanimously exclaiming against the portending wrong. The orchestral phrase upon which this movement is chiefly founded is still employed as a figure of accompaniment throughout the choral passages. The responses, assuming now the character of exhortation rather than remonstrance, are confined no longer to the Chorus Leader, but uttered by the whole body of voices, no longer in spoken monotones, but in musical phrases. This is a most powerful augmentation of the stirring excitement of the very animated scene, and the summit of its climax is where the brass instruments are introduced (all that has preceded having been accompanied by string instruments only,) upon the emphatic summons of the Chorus to their heroic countrymen, "Ye freemen, arise! O come, quickly come! Foes have assailed our land!" The dignity, the authoritative command expressed here in the music, is a wonderful adjunct to the purpose of the poet, which would, without this illustration, kill itself in any possible representation of the scene, since none could witness, without a sense of absurdity, the violence of Creon with his few attendants, opposed with words as violent, but with words only, by the assembled many. There is such entire earnestness, decision, majesty, in the rendering of this passage, as to enforce the respect of an audience, which is equivalent to a sense of propriety, and we lose all consideration for what should be, in our satisfaction with what is. The else obvious anomaly of the situation would have been exposed by any other treatment; by this it is justified.

"Antigone.—Help, O help me, friends!
"Œdipus.—Where art thou, dearest?"

is spoken in the first pause of the following quotation:—

"Antigone.—Torn from thee by force.
"Œdipus.—Give me thy hand" is spoken during the second pause; and Antigone exclaims, in the anguish of her powerlessness, in the agony of her bereavement:—

"Alas! I cannot now,"

during the third pause.

Who can hear the passage and not feel the wonderful meaning that it gives to the words, and not feel full of sympathy with the filial heart that suffers in the thought of leaving him whose tendance, more her pleasure than her duty, has filled her virgin time of natural enjoyment, absorbed her youthful freshness?

The symphony that accompanies the last struggle of the hapless daughter and her forcible removal by the attendants of Creon, is formed of the same musical idea that has accompanied and interspersed the dialogue, which, being now continued to much greater length than elsewhere, assumes a new interest from its developed musical beauty, that is as great as that of its dramatic expression. This symphony consists of a long passage upon a dominant pedal, and there is an especially touching effect in the sudden cessation of its agitated character, when Œdipus speaks a whole heartful of torment in the words, "Oh, I am all alone!"

However familiar its use, however general its availability, there is no harmonic combination or distribution that is so vague in its effect as the common chord in its second inversion, having, namely, the fifth in the bass. This is not a theory which I am writing, but a description; it is not, therefore, my province to account for such a phenomenon in our art, but to state its present application. Leave we then the discussion of the dissonance or non-dissonance of the fourth,—France has its flowers,* artificial perhaps; Gregorianism its diatesseron, possibly no less allied to nature (this, by the way, and wholly from the purpose, save for such as can penetrate its mythism),—leave we grammar, I say, the paradox without which beauty cannot exist, but by means of which it can never be understood,—leave we the speculation upon principles for the observation of results, and turn to the recollection of the opening,—well, and, if you will, with more or less of a provision, to the closing too,—of the Andante in A minor of Beethoven's symphony in A. Now do you understand what I mean by the vagueness of the effect of a common chord with its fifth for a bass, and if not, be who you may, you must be the most definite of definite articles, and the most matter-of-fact of all factious materialists, your imagination must be worn in your watch-pocket, and your fancy bred at a baker's. So; I have cited the opening of Beethoven's slow movement, which is like enough to the point under notice, to suggest by its analogy some idea of the effect here attained, and yet but little like it after all. The fact is that music is music, and no words, no music other than itself can illustrate its effect,—so surpassingly as it illustrates, enforces, intensifies, creates the effect of verbal expression! To return to our second inversion. The agitated character of the symphony is suddenly arrested, and upon the second inversion of the tonic common chord. (Oh that it were possible to be intelligible and not be technical! or, oh, again, and many a good round interjection, that I could certify intelligibility, with technicality or without it!) Upon the second inversion, Œdipus speaks the line I have quoted, and then succeeds the perfect cadence on the key note of D minor. All this goes to say, that the blind helplessness of the dependent father is forced upon his thought with aggravated reality by the violent abduction of his loving companion; that his sense of blindness, helplessness, dependency—vague since hopeless, indefinite since apprehensive—is presented in the peculiar employment of the harmony to which I refer; and that the certainty of evil, the only reliance now left him, is rendered in the two concluding chords. This may be fanciful. Grant that it be; he must have at least fancy, who would sympathise with imagination, and we approach nearer to the comprehension of an artist if we go beyond his purpose in our estimation of it, than if we fail to reach it; it is for a kindred artist only, scarcely that, it is for himself alone to know how much, how little is embodied in his work,—nay, even himself cannot determine this, for the greatest things in art are accomplished by the intuition, the inspiration if you will, of him who effects them, wholly without purpose, and they depend upon the sensitive susceptibility of others for their full interpretation.

We have now the Antistrophe. This consists of a repetition with more or less modification of the musical matter of the Strophe, terminating at the passage accompanied with brass instruments, where the Chorus call their fellow-citizens to the rescue.

The Ambassador-King of Thebes taunts his victim with the desolation he has brought upon him. Exasperated by this aggravation of his injuries, Œdipus, calling on the awful powers of the place to realize his words, imprecates a curse upon Creon. The purport of this malediction is to call upon the head of Creon the same suffering which Œdipus endures. It is recited while the orchestra sustains a chord until the last words, "Blind, old age, like mine," which are accompanied a note to a syllable. This passage is like—in fact it is the same as one in Antigone, where Creon reiterates the exclamation "Woe!" with this accompaniment. Would that it were not the same, for it disturbs our feeling of its perfect pertinence to the present situation to recollect another occurrence of it, perhaps equally pertinent. In censuring, however, the present passage, it may not be to dilate too widely the sphere of criticism to surmise that an intended connection is implied between this pronunciation of the curse of Œdipus and the realization of its fulfilment in the subsequent agonies of Creon. Regarded thus, not as an accidental coincidence, but as a purposed anticipation, the passage assumes a twofold beauty, and our censure must be all of praise.*

Disturbed by the vociferated appeal of the Chorus, Theseus, quitting the sacrifice to Neptune in which he was engaged, hastens to effect the rescue for which they call. It needs not here to abstract the particulars of the scene of recrimination between Œdipus and Creon. The Athenian king has granted Œdipus his hospitable protection, and he is thus pledged to defend his guest and to restore to him his daughters. He accordingly defies Creon to open battle, and gives orders for his forces assembled at the celebration of the sacrifice to overtake and to recapture Ismene and Antigone.

V.

This is a second Ode, resembling in importance and construction the preceding, but differing from it greatly in character. We have now a song of war, emulating first the glories of the victor chiefs, the memory of whose deeds is as a charm to assure success, and concluding in the exultant anticipation of triumph. Throughout these remarks I have taken the privilege to object, leaving to those who choose, to object to my objections. I should not be I if I liked what I dislike; I should not be honest if I disguised my dislikings in the eulogies which are the official garments of my admiration, showing as its credentials to the world, by displaying at best an official presentation of its inexpressible earnestness; if I stamped my farthing with the die of a guinea, which asserts its value, but proves not its intrinsic worth. By my assumed privilege, then, I have an objection to make, which I will make, to have done with it, and so to clear the way for more congenial matter. As in a former instance, my objection is to a single note; let it be esteemed, accordingly, of singular notability. The key being D minor, in the fourth bar of the voice part we come to a chord of A minor. This chord has a marked accent; its introduction is obviously designed, and its effect, then, obviously intended. Such effect is to me irrelative, unnatural, and uneuphonious. We may learn to like it, in its present application, and our duty to the surrounding beauties is to do so. This homage, at least, is due to an artist who has set the seal of his genius upon every susceptible heart, leaving an impression there that even prejudice could not resist and coming experience cannot efface. Whatever may be due to Mendelssohn, however, and this is all but infinitely much, there is one little matter that defines its finity, videlicit, our duty to ourselves, which is to examine into the exceptionalities in art, and, if we cannot justify them, to avoid their adoption into its rules. I cannot justify the effect in question, and, moreover, cannot like it; I try hard for the latter—I will not attempt the former. I have done with my objection.

The musical rendering of this Ode is a very fine conception. Full of the ardour inspired by its heroic theme, glowing with enthusiasm, and emulous with sanguine impatience, the music of the first Strophe and Antistrophe presents a spirit yearning for glory, like a great fire, eager to burst in flaming brightness on the world, and consuming with ever-waxing heat the furnace that contains but cannot restrain it. Read this in the suppressed character of the accompaniment, which is marked by a martial accent that is, however, hushed, subdued it cannot be, in the panting breathlessness of a pianissimo, always climbing towards a forte, but always stifled; read this in the exciting restlessness of the phraseology, which is especially indicative of the author, and, therefore, especially illustrative of the sentiment here embodied—a sentiment remotely suggested by Sophocles, realised yet idealised, quickened into life with the electricity of imagination, by Mendelssohn; read this in such original and peculiar marked rhythm as that of the following phrase, which is an example of the bold, nervous, manliness of feeling that distinguishes the whole;—in the irritated, excited effect of the change of triplets to couplets of quavers in the accompaniment with the introduction of the string in place of the wind instruments;—in this grand burst of enthusiasm with which each choir successfully concludes its division of the movement, where the voice parts are doubled by all the wind instruments, octave above octave, and the accompaniment of triplets and crotchets is given with the gigantic force of the entire string orchestra; and, in the countless manifestations of a meaning that submits not to the gross analysis of words, that must be felt, not said, that is or is not, according to our power to perceive it.

* It is curious that this passage is not in the published full score, but appears in the edition for voices and pianoforte. Had the score been printed in the composer's life time, we might suppose that the passage in question was a subsequent interpolation of his own; as it is, we can only regard the omission, the very important omission, as an example of the care with which the Musical Committee, appointed by Mendelssohn's family to superintend the publication of his posthumous works—the committee that robbed the world of his Reformation Symphony—issue such of his music as they think fit to produce.

In the second Strophe the poet turns from the past to the present, from the example of immortal heroes to the living action of the moment. Here again the musician embodies and spiritualises all that the poet suggests. The feeling now presented is no longer of stimulation but encouragement, no longer of excitement but approval, no longer of incentive but motive; the fire explodes its prison, and its streaming blaze reddens the vault of heaven as with an universal sunset, a glory that fills all before as all beyond, showing the present as eternal. The transition to the major key with its glittering brightness, the assumption of such grand, majestic, consciousness in the phraseology as this, where the voices are all in unison, and where the responsive phrases are given by all the wind instruments, including the trombones which are now first introduced into the score; the constant recurrence of this warlike summons to glory and honour, with its replicative acceptance; and the well-sustained tone of solemnity and irrepressible animation,—these and such as these are the means by which the genius of the composer identifies itself with our sympathies, and quickens in us the feeling that inspires it.

The second Antistrophe is an adjuration to Jove to prosper the arms of the ever victorious host; to the protecting deity Athena, to whom the State is dedicated and in whose especial honour all its greatness is achieved, to strengthen its sons in worthiness of her glory. The grandeur the subject here assumes is nobly rendered in the massive effect of the eight part harmony induced by the combination of the two choirs, and by the broad, continuous, expansive character of the prolonged phrases of the unaccompanied voices interspersed with the heroic summons, which is the most prominent feature of this second movement, given now by the entire power of the orchestra. I must especialize one passage of remarkably wide and all-encompassing effect, which is where a point of imitation is given successively by each of the eight voices responding from side to side, each answer being given alternately by a voice in each of the opposite choirs, the ever accumulating effect of which must be powerful in the extreme. Again, there is a remarkable point of harmony in this passage, divided between the orchestra and the Chorus, which is no less beautiful in its effect than singular in its application. Finally, there is a most original and a peculiarly large—oh, insufficiency of language to afford terms for my expression!—think of all that can be felt of power and grandeur, coin it into a word, and apply it as an expletive to the effect of the long-sustained dominant harmony upon a tonic pedal, for voices only, that swells from a whispered pianissimo to the extreme of power, when the vocal crescendo is crowned by the entry of the full orchestra, which, by this distribution, appears to acquire double its natural force. How entirely relative are all the effects our art affords, and how entirely dependent are each upon other, and all, still more, upon the susceptibility, and not the susceptibility alone, but the temperament, of the audience! To conclude, we have the two notes, of which I have spoken, as the glorious summons (let us suppose it the prompting to deeds of honour of an excited imagination), the two notes that intersperse the vocal phrases in my last but one quotation, the two notes that, in one or another key, are of constant recurrence throughout the movement, the two notes that indicate the inner thought, of which the words and their utterance is the external insufficient expression; these two notes are given by the entire orchestra, as if in confirmation of the sentiment of the whole movement, as if presenting the one feeling it embodies unanimously as universally. G. A. MACFARREN.

A PATRIOTIC MUSICIAN.—In the orchestra now under the superintendance of Mr. Packer at the Holborn Casino, a striking instance of the now "ruling passion" has occured, which may be accepted as an illustration of the spread of that warlike enthusiasm we have seen displayed day after day at the departure of our troops for Constantinople. One of the performers who had recently bought his discharge from a regiment to which he had been long attached, on hearing of its present destination, petitioned the War Office that he might be permitted to volunteer his services as bugler to the regiment, in its approaching conflict with the Russians. We hear that his request has been granted.

THE JOHANNA WAGNER CASE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, GUILDHALL, FEB. 20.

LUMLEY v. GYE.

Sir F. Thesiger, Sir F. Kelly, Mr. Hoggins, Q.C., Mr. Cowling, and Mr. Huddleston appeared for the plaintiff; and the Attorney-General, Mr. Bramwell, Q.C., Mr. Creasy, and Mr. Willes for the defendant.

The plaintiff in this action was Mr. Benjamin Lumley, lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre; and the defendant, Mr. Frederick Gye, director of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. The action was brought against the defendant to recover damages for enticing and procuring Miss Johanna Wagner to break a contract into which she had entered with the plaintiff to perform as prima donna at Her Majesty's Theatre in the season of 1852. The declaration contained several counts. The defendant pleaded the general issue.

Sir F. THESIGER said, the case which he had to introduce to the notice of the jury was one which had for a long time excited great interest in the public mind, and was one of considerable importance, not only to the parties, but to all who were interested in the fortunes of the Italian Opera in London. The plaintiff had been for several years the manager and director of Her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket; he had embarked considerable capital in the undertaking, and had carried it on with the greatest spirit and ability. He had been the means of introducing to the English public artists of first-rate talent, and the fortunes of the theatre had prospered in his hands. For five or six years Covent-garden Theatre had been opened for the performance of operas, and in the course of time the management of that theatre fell into the hands of Mr. Gye. The result of the experiment had been, that there was but little prospect that the public would support two operas at the same time. One effect of the rivalry thus established had been, that the managers found it would not do to rest on the old established favourites of the town, but that it was necessary that the taste of the public should be stimulated by novelty. The consequence had been that managers looked over the Continent to discover rising talent among singers there, and so to obtain singers of continental reputation. Before the theatrical season commenced, it was usual to announce the singers or artistes whose services had been secured, and if the announcement proved attractive, the subscriptions which took place were likely to be much influenced thereby. The mode in which this took place was by the librarians at the west end of the town subscribing largely for stalls and boxes, which they again let out for the night to their subscribers. It might easily be supposed that nothing could be more prejudicial to the manager of a theatre than to have advertised the performance of a particular singer, and then, from any unforeseen accident, that the singer should not appear. Such disappointments caused the interest of the public to sink, and, in fact, was sufficient to ruin a theatre for a whole season. Much more would this be the case if the public thought that any deception had been practised by a manager, who had held out false and ungrounded hopes. In such a case not only was the present season affected, but the effect was felt even in succeeding seasons. That observation would have an important bearing upon the consideration of the question now to be submitted to the jury. It appeared that in the year 1851 Miss Wagner had acquired considerable reputation as a singer. At that time Mr. Lumley was manager of the Italian Opera at Paris, and a Dr. Bacher, having been authorized by Miss Wagner, put himself in communication with Mr. Lumley, and proposed that she should be engaged to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre, in this country. Mr. Lumley had with him his usual printed form of agreement, and gave a copy to Dr. Bacher, with which the latter proceeded to Berlin, where Miss Wagner and her father resided. The form of agreement thus proposed was considered by Mr. Wagner as too complicated, and, in consequence, Dr. Bacher suggested that Mr. Wagner should draw up one with his own hand. This was accordingly done, and the agreement so prepared was signed by himself and daughter on the 9th of November 1851. (The learned counsel here read the agreement, which has already been several times laid before the public.) Dr. Bacher then proceeded to Paris with the agreement so signed. On his arrival, Mr. Lumley found that an important and usual stipulation had been omitted—viz., that Miss Wagner should engage not to sing at any concerts or assemblies without the written consent of Mr. Lumley. Dr. Bacher then said, it was a mere omission; that that point had been mentioned by him to Miss Wagner and her father, and that he was authorized to insert it on their behalf. He accordingly inserted the stipulation and signed it, and transmitted the document so signed by Mr. Lumley to Miss Wagner, at Berlin. On the 27th of November, 1851, he received a letter from Berlin, stating that the agreement had arrived, and neither then nor at any other time was any objection taken to the insertion of the clause in the agreement signed by Miss Wagner on the 9th of November, 1851. One question for the jury would be whether Mr. Gye was aware of the existence of that contract. There would, however, be no difficulty upon that subject, for in that very month of November, 1851, Mr. Gye was negotiating with Mr. Lumley to take a lease of Her Majesty's Theatre at a rent of 12,000*l.* a-year; and, from a document in his hand-writing, dated the 5th of December, 1851, Mr. Gye said expressly that he was prepared to assume the engagements which Mr. Lumley had made with Mademoiselle Cruvelli and Mademoiselle Wagner. On the 24th of the same month he also referred to Mr. Lumley's agreement with Miss Wagner, and spoke of it as being for 1,200*l.* The complaint now made of Mr. Gye was that he had taken means to induce Miss Wagner and her father to break the engagement into which they had deliberately entered, and to take an engagement to perform at his (Mr. Gye's) theatre. It was impossible to detect all the secret springs that were set in motion for that purpose by Mr. Gye, but some of his movements could be traced so as to show the dishonourable means which he adopted in order to ruin a rival theatre. On the 6th of February, 1852, Mr. Wagner wrote a letter to Mr. Lumley, requesting him to agree to a postponement of the commencement of the agreement for fifteen days. It had been previously agreed that this should commence on the 1st of April, 1852. On the 9th of March Mr. Wagner wrote to Mr. Lumley a letter in which he made an arrangement about the payment of the sum of 300*l.*, which was to be paid before Miss Wagner came to England. The letter contained an expression "dès le deuxième d'Avril," about the interpretation of which it appeared some difficulty would be made. The money was to be paid at a particular place "dès le deuxième d'Avril"—i.e., after the 2nd of April.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL here said, his learned friend must not assume that that was the meaning of the expression.

Sir F. THESIGER said, he had given his own construction of the expression, which seemed to be the correct one. It appeared that on the 26th of March Mr. Lumley had issued his usual programme for the approaching season; and in that programme the appearance of Miss Wagner was an important feature. The list was so attractive that Mr. Mitchell, of Bond-street, the gentleman who had produced the French plays in St. James's, and who was principally engaged in hiring boxes and stalls at the Italian Opera, increased his subscription from £5,000—the sum which he had subscribed in the preceding year—to £15,400. Of all these circumstances respecting Miss Wagner's engagement with Mr. Lumley, Mr. Gye had ample information. He (Sir F. Thesiger) would now come to the circumstances attending Miss Wagner's arrival in England in the month of April, when Mr. Gye had advertised her as about to sing at Covent Garden Theatre. On the 22nd of April a letter appeared in the Morning Post, signed by "Albert Wagner," the father of Miss Wagner, in which an explanation was given of all the circumstances under which the engagement with Mr. Lumley had been broken off, and the new one with Mr. Gye entered into. It would be shown that the letter was written by Mr. Gye himself, for the plaintiff had got the manuscript, and would produce it in court. The manuscript was in the handwriting of a clerk, but it was corrected by Mr. Gye, and the formal part and name, "Albert Wagner" were written by Mr. Gye himself. It would appear that early in the month of March he (Mr. Gye) was insinuating to the Wagners doubts as to whether Mr. Lumley would be able to perform his contract, and whether Her Majesty's Theatre would be open at all. The learned counsel here read the letter from the Morning Post, from which, he said, it appeared that early in the month of March Mr. Gye had been writing to the Wagners, and suggesting to them whether Mr. Lumley would be able to complete his agreement. In confirmation of that statement, there was Mr. Gye's affidavit in Chancery, in which, though he denied it to be true that he endeavoured to intimidate and alarm the Wagners, and so to prevent them from fulfilling their contract, he admitted that he had made representations of the kind now mentioned. According to the terms of the agreement, the sum of £300 was to be paid on the 13th of March. Dr. Bacher had at that time received the sum of £400 from Mr. Lumley for that and some other purpose. On the 10th of March, 1852, Dr. Bacher wrote a letter to the Wagners, to say that he had the £300 ready for them, and requested to be informed where he should meet them to come to England, and on the same day he wrote to Mr. Lumley to say the same thing. On the 18th of March Mr. Lumley wrote to the Wagners, saying that he had been informed that they had received a communication from Dr. Bacher that the sum of £300 was in his hands for them. On the 6th of April the Wagners never complained that they had never received the £300, nor that there had been any breach of that contract; and it appeared by the same letter, that on the 30th of March Mr. Gye had written a letter to the Wagners. He was writing to them on the 9th of March and on the 30th of March, and proposing to them to enter into an engagement with him. (The learned counsel here read from the letter in the Morning Post in confirmation of this statement.) Mr. Gye then went over to them (the Wagners) to induce them to enter into this contract. They urged a day or two's delay, but he was peremptory with them, and insisted upon their either accepting or rejecting his offer. Without making any complaint of Mr. Lumley, and the very day Mr. Gye arrived, viz., the 5th of April, Miss Wagner entered into an agreement with Mr. Gye to sing at Covent-garden Theatre for a sum three times as large as Mr. Lumley had engaged to pay. Mr. Gye also gave her an indemnity against the consequences of the breach of her agreement; and, by a most extraordinary proceeding, the defendant had actually given the plaintiff notice to produce this deed, which was described in the notice as a deed executed by the defendant on the 5th or 6th of April, 1852, whereby the defendant agreed to indemnify the said Johanna Wagner against all actions arising out of the agreement of the 9th of November, 1851. Under these circumstances the jury could not doubt that Mr. Gye had given the Wagners an indemnity against the breach of that contract. Mr. Gye then went or sent to London, and on the 8th of April there was an announcement that Miss Wagner was to appear at his theatre. On the 10th of April, the plaintiff (Mr. Lumley) continued his announcement that Miss Wagner would appear at Her Majesty's Theatre, and on the 10th of April Mr. Gye called on Mr. Mitchell and said he had secured Miss Wagner—the only novelty in the world—and asked what was Mr. Lumley to do. On the 17th of April, Miss Wagner and her father arrived in England, and on the 20th she was announced by Mr. Gye to appear at his theatre on the 24th of April. Mr. Lumley, on the 22nd, applied to Vice-Chancellor Parker, for an injunction to restrain Miss Wagner from singing at any theatre except Her Majesty's Theatre. That application, being ex parte, was granted immediately. One would have thought that under those circumstances Mr. Gye would have suspended operations; but, instead of that, he, on the 24th of April, put an advertisement in the Times, in which he stated that he expected to be be able to dissolve that injunction the following day, and that Miss Wagner would sing at his theatre the same evening in Le Prophète. Affidavits were put in on both sides, and the cause was heard on the 9th and 10th of May, when the Vice-Chancellor continued the injunction. At that time it would appear as if Miss Wagner was disposed to return to her duty, and he thought he should be able to show that music had been sent to her, in order that she might study her part in one of her pieces; but an appeal was taken to the Lord Chancellor against the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, when, after occupying two days, the 26th and 27th of May, the case terminated in the Lord Chancellor confirming the order for the injunction. The parties had thus the decision of two Courts against them, and they ought to have yielded. On the 28th of May Miss Wagner was written to, but no answer was received till the 7th of June, when a most extraordinary letter was written by Mr. Gye to Mr. Lumley (which letter the learned counsel read), proposing that Miss Wagner should sing once a-week at each of the two theatres, and that each party should pay his own costs, except the costs of appeal, which Mr. Gye was willing to pay. This was accompanied by a letter in French from Miss Wagner, in which that lady referred to Mr. Gye's letter as an answer to the application made to her by Mr. Lumley on the 28th of May. Certainly that proposal was a most extraordinary one. The three months during which the engagement was to last had nearly all expired, and he (Sir F. Thesiger) could only compare the proposal made with the case where the false mother desired to divide the child while the true mother refused. Mr. Gye at length consented to a decree made on the 24th of June, whereby Miss Wagner was perpetually restrained from appearing at the defendant's theatre or at any other than Her Majesty's Theatre. Since that decree it would not be open to the defendant to say, either that Dr. Bacher had not paid the £300, or that he had no authority to add the additional clause to the contract. Soon after that decree was made Miss Wagner left the country, and had not since returned. The question, then, would be, whether the defendant, knowing of Miss Wagner's contract with Mr. Lumley, enticed and procured her to break it. The defendant in his affidavit did not pretend to say that he did not. He only denied what was not charged—viz., that he coerced or intimidated Miss Wagner. If, then, the defendant was liable in this action, a most difficult and important question arose as to the amount of damages to which the plaintiff was entitled. The learned counsel here entered minutely into this question, as afterwards fully explained by Mr. Mitchell in his evidence, and concluded by saying that in consequence of the defendant's conduct the whole of the plaintiff's capital had been lost, and that he (Sir F. Thesiger) had no doubt the jury would give him the full amount of compensation to which they thought he was entitled for the injury he had sustained.

The following witnesses were then called and examined:—

Dr. Bacher, examined by Sir F. KELLY.—I am a native of Germany, and a doctor of civil law. In the year 1850, Miss Wagner brought to me letters of introduction at Vienna. Before that I was on terms of intimate friendship with Meyerbeer. So was Miss Wagner. I was about to leave Vienna for Paris, and she obliged me by singing in private. I found she had a splendid voice, and great dramatic expression. I recommended her to go to London and Paris. She was accompanied by her father. He transacts business for her. I soon after proceeded to Paris. I had assisted at both opera-houses in London, and I thought she ought to appear in London. I wrote to her from London. She wrote a letter to me on the 18th of August, 1851, from Soden, near Frankfort-on-the-Maine. I proceeded to Soden, and saw Miss Wagner and her father and mother. I arranged that she should obtain, through me, an engagement in London and in Paris. When I left Soden I returned to Paris. I had communicated with Mr. Lumley in 1850, after having seen Miss Wagner at Vienna. When I was at Paris I saw Mr. Lumley, and proposed that an engagement should be entered into with Miss Wagner. Mr. Lumley gave me a printed form of engagement, and so did the director of the Opera at Paris. Miss Wagner was then at Berlin. I proceeded with them to Berlin, where I arrived about November, 1851. I remained there some days, and submitted to them (Mr. and Miss Wagner) the printed form of contract. They objected to it as too complicated. I then proposed to Mr. Wagner that he should draw up one, which he did. I considered it, and, after some discussion, this contract was agreed upon (except the last article). Miss Wagner signed that contract. I left Berlin for Paris. Mr. and Miss Wagner are both well acquainted with the French language. I delivered the contract to Mr. Lumley at Paris. He objected that one stipulation was omitted. I added it. It was to the effect that Miss Wagner engaged to make use of her talent at no concert or public or private assembly without Mr. Lumley's consent. It was signed by me on the part of Miss Wagner, according to my understanding with Mr. and Miss Wagner. I wrote to Miss Wagner, and told her of the additional article. I sent her the agreement signed by Mr. Lumley, with the additional article. Miss Wagner is now abroad. I also sent her the contract from the director of the Opera at Paris. She answered me by a letter, dated Berlin, the 27th of November, 1851. (The contract was here put in and read.) I notified to Mr. Lumley the approval of the contract, with the additional article. I saw Mr. Lumley at Paris. I remained at Paris till January, 1852. I afterwards proceeded thence to Vienna, and remained there till the month of April. On the tenth of the month of March I wrote to Miss Wagner. I did not keep a copy of the letter. At that time I had 400*l.* in my hands of Mr. Lumley's. I received an answer from Miss Wagner. I know she received my letter, because she wrote to me an answer. I have not got her letter now. I parted with it during the proceedings in Chancery. I gave it to Mr. Lumley, or to Mr. Jennings. (After some considerable discussion, it was stated that such letter was not in the plaintiff's possession.) I afterwards met Miss Wagner at Hamburgh, and conferred personally with her on the subject of this letter of the 10th of March. I never heard from her that she had not received it.—Cross-examined by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—I was at Hamburg in Easter week, in the month of April. I arrived there on the 10th of April. By LORD CAMPBELL.—I referred to the contents of the letter of the 10th of March. By the ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—The first thing she said was, "I have committed a very bad action against you." I said, "What have you done?" She said, "I have signed another engagement." I answered, "That is impossible." She said, "As I signed the engagement my hands trembled, but Mr. Gye has been here to say to us that Mr. Lumley would not open, and offered me 20,000f. more, and gave me a guarantee for all the damages. I was so much embarrassed, I had not time to think. You have not sent me the 300*l.*, and thereupon we signed." Upon that I replied, "Have I not written to you and offered to you payment, and asked you if I should send the money to Berlin or bring it to Hamburg myself? Upon this I received your answer that you would see me at Hamburg. Therefore, as you did not wish to receive the money at Berlin, I have now come ready to pay you." Upon this she said she regretted very much she had signed it. Upon that I asked why she had not asked legal counsel before she signed it. She answered she had no time to do it; that Mr. Gye pressed upon her to sign it. She then said, "After that, we saw our counsel, and he said to us we did very wrong to sign." I have made an affidavit in Chancery. I don't remember whether I have read the affidavits of Mr. and Miss Wagner in Chancery. Examination in chief continued.—I went to Hamburg to accompany Miss Wagner to London. I took there the 300*l.* to give her. I changed the money into gold, and offered it to her several times. Cross-examined by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—I am a doctor of civil law. I am not an advocate. I am a doctor of civil law of Vienna. I am happy enough to have some fortune. I have worked from 1838 to 1847 in an advocate's office. Since then I have occupied myself with art. I do not make engagements with artists for profit. I do not do it in many cases. I do not get a commission, except for my expenses, when I take journeys. I was not to get anything in this case. I saw Miss Wagner in July, 1850, and saw Mr. Lumley about her soon after. I recommended him to engage her. He did not do so at that time. In September or October, 1851, I saw Mr. Lumley at Paris. It was in the beginning of November I got the printed form from Mr. Lumley. I had come to Paris from Vienna. Miss Wagner wrote to me a letter on the 3rd of October, to say that Mr. Gye and Mr. Lumley had made her an offer. I don't remember that I told Mr. Lumley that Mr. Gye had made her an offer. Mr. Lumley did not tell me to use my best endeavours to secure her for him. He did not know of her talent. He expressed a wish to have her. I told Miss Wagner it would be much better for her to come out at Mr. Lumley's Theatre. I said Her Majesty's Theatre had the prestige of many years, and it was there all the great artistes performed. I do not think I told her that Mr. Gye's was a second-rate theatre. I swear I don't remember I told her that, if she came to Mr. Lumley's, the press would write her up. Mr. Wagner told me Mr. Gye offered more than Mr. Lumley. I told him she should not lose. After that she signed that contract. I received the 400*l.* on the 8th of January; 300*l.* was to be given to Mr. Wagner. The other 100*l.* was applied for Mr. Lumley—not for myself. I received a letter from Mr. Lumley, directing me to pay the 300*l.* The letter is at Vienna, where I reside. I came to Hamburg, and saw Miss Wagner on the 10th of April. I told her I had brought the money. It was at my hotel—partly in gold, and the other part in Austrian money. I got 150 napoleons at Berlin for Austrian paper money which I had brought from Vienna. I have never said that the bill Mr. Lumley sent me at Paris was dishonored. That is impossible, for it was a bill on Rothschilds. Mr. Lumley wished me to engage Mr. Ander at Vienna. He was engaged by Mr. Gye. I had no money to pay him. (The witness's affidavit in Chancery was here read at the request of the Attorney-General.) The affidavit makes no mention of an answer to my letter of the 10th of March. I had the letter. It was not necessary to mention it. I did not believe the letter was all-important. I don't know to whom I gave the letter. I have received money from Mr. Lumley on my own account. It was for expenses. It may be 200*l.* during four years. I was not engaged to get him singers. I did engage singers, but I was not obliged to do so. (A letter was put into witness's hand, in which he wrote that he had got "two precious tenors" for Mr. Lumley, "one in each pocket.") I never sought to persuade Miss Wagner to feign illness to avoid coming to London. I swear that Miss Wagner swore falsely in saying that I did. I advised her to go not at all, or to sing at both theatres. I swear I dont remember that I advised her to feign sickness. I had read Miss Wagner's affidavit when I made mine. I can't remember that Mr. Jennings had told me that Miss Wagner in her affidavit had denied that my letter of the 10th of March contained any reference to the 300*l.* The entries in my memorandum-book do not all refer to theatrical affairs. I have been concerned in monetary affairs with Mr. Lumley. I have accepted bills for his accommodation. It may be for nearly 1,000*l.* I do not recollect how much. It may be that Mr. Lumley has accepted bills for me—not so much as I have for him. I have had to pay very little of the bills which I have accepted—about 300*l.* I am not to be repaid if he gets this verdict. I do not know that the result of this verdict is pledged to Mr. Brandus, my brother-in-law at Paris. Re-examined by Sir F. KELLY.—It was in 1852 I gave Mr. Lumley these bills, near the end of the season. I had no interest in advising Miss Wagner to make an engagement for the Queen's Theatre. When I made the affidavit in Chancery I was the whole night with the solicitor. I deposed to what was pointed out by the solicitor. This letter is in my own handwriting. It is a letter from me to Mr. Lumley, of the date of the 10th of March. It contained the following passage:—"I have also to pay the 300*l.* to Miss Wagner, and I have also given her notice of it." That letter was written on the same day as the letter to Miss Wagner. Cross-examined by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—Madame Monti said there was money due to her, as stated in the letter. It was not the whole of her year's salary. I don't know how much Mr. Lumley was to pay Madame Sontag on the 1st of April. It was not the whole of her salary for 1851. He owed Mr. Brandus money. I did not take a bill of exchange to Hamburg which was not honoured. Re-examined.—I took money to Hamburg.

Robert Dixon, examined by Mr. HOGGINS.—I am the printer of the Morning Post. I produce the manuscript of a letter inserted in the Morning Post on the 22nd of April, 1852. I also produce manuscripts of bills and advertisements of the Italian Opera House, Covent Garden.

John Mitchell examined.—For twelve years I was lessee of the St. James's Theatre. For some years I have rented stalls and boxes of Mr. Lumley, since he has been lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre. In February, 1852, I saw Mr. Lumley at Paris. He showed me the contract with Miss Wagner. Her name was already known to me. In consequence of seeing that contract I entered into one with Mr. Lumley to rent stalls and boxes. I was to pay £15,400. That was three times as much as in the preceding years. I made the engagement known to my friends and connexions, to whom I relet the stalls and boxes. On the 26th of March Mr. Lumley's programme appeared, in which Miss Wagner was announced. I caused a reprint of that to be circulated among my friends and connexions, and let boxes and stalls upon that basis. Shortly after Mr. Gye called upon me, and I told him of the purchase of boxes I had made of Mr. Lumley. I told him of the amount—£15,400. I told him I had such confidence in Miss Wagner, and that her engagement had been the chief inducement to my large contract. On the 11th or 12th of April I saw Mr. Gye again. He told me he had engaged Miss Wagner; that Mr. Lumley certainly could not have her services; and he could not imagine what he could do to carry on the season. There had been an announcement of this fact, which had created great astonishment, and many persons who were negotiating with me for boxes discontinued and declined to take them up, and other persons who had really taken them gave them up. I had taken sixty boxes. I was able to let altogether only five boxes during the season, and that only by reducing the price. The rest were all unlet through the season. I had taken the boxes and stalls for sixty-five nights. At the end of the forty-seventh night I put an end to the contract by negotiation with Mr. Lumley. The reason for so doing was the non-appearance of Miss Wagner. On the making of the contract I had paid £4,000 in cash and £3,000 in bills, and afterwards I made a further payment, making in all £10,600. That was in full of the contract. Mr. Lumley gave up £4,800. The non-appearance of Miss Wagner was very calamitous to the theatre. There was no demand for boxes at all. We could not let them at all. I lost more than £5,000. It was the most disastrous season I ever knew. It has always been my practice to take boxes by nightly lettings. I have usually paid about £1,500 on that account. In 1852 they did not amount to £20. This arose from the depression arising from the non-appearance. I was also a subscriber to Covent Garden in 1852 for £3,400. I remember the night of the first announcement of Miss Wagner. It was the 24th of April. There was a very great demand for boxes on that night—more than we could meet. I applied to Mr. Gye, and obtained some boxes, and learnt that the rest were all let. We did not take that night at Her Majesty's Theatre above £30. My lettings at Covent Garden might have been £200 if Miss Wagner had appeared. Mr. Lumley on the 10th of April asked me to accompany him to Hamburg. Miss Wagner was announced generally on the 8th of April, and on the 19th she was announced for the 24th at Covent Garden. On the 13th we arrived at Hamburg. I met Mr. Lumley. He asked me to send £1,200. Instead of sending it, I took it. I took no part in the interview. I arrived with Mr. Lumley, Madame Sontag, and Miss Wagner and her father at Cologne on the 14th. Mr. Gye was there with a Captain de Bathe. Mr. Gye took charge of Miss Wagner to London. Cross-examined.—The season of 1851 was a good season. Madame Sontag was the chief prima donna. This is the programme. It was carried out, containing the names of Sontag, Clementini, Gardoni, Sims Reeves, Coletti, Lablache, etc. In 1852 the programme included the names of Sontag, Fiorentini, Cruvelli, etc. Madame Sontag never appeared; Fiorentini appeared, but for a short time. Cruvelli was there all the season. She went away abruptly. Mr. Lumley had told me he was ready to negotiate with me to take the theatre. I do not know from him that many of the artistes had not been paid for 1851. I went to him at Paris, in consequence of Miss Wagner being retained. The programme of 1852 was as strong as that of 1851. In 1850 there was a good season. The programme of 1852, striking out the name of Miss Wagner, was as good as that of 1850. The ballet in 1852 was as strong as in 1850. Madame Sontag did not sing in 1852. I don't know that she was not paid. Cerito did not come in 1852. Negrini, the tenor, did not come, nor Bassini. We had other singers—Madame La Grange and Madame Charton. They were distinguished singers; but nothing would have attracted in the absence of Miss Wagner. I can't account for it, but I think if the same artistes who performed at Covent Garden in 1852 had performed at Her Majesty's Theatre, the public would not have gone. I gave up my contract about the time Madlle. Cruvelli left. I don't know that was because she did not get her salary. It was about the 20th of March. Mr. Gye knew of my engagement with Mr. Lumley. On the 10th of April he told me Miss Wagner would not come, because Mr. Lumley had not paid the £300. Mr. Gye told me he had been in negotiation with Miss Wagner since the year 1850. He said she was an old acquaintance. He did not say he was on the eve of making an agreement with her when Mr. Lumley got her away. Cruvelli was singing in Norma, at Her Majesty's Theatre, on the night of the 24th of April. Covent Garden was full. I would not send for boxes while I had got any of my own. Mr. Lumley had disposed of some of the boxes I had purchased to Mr. Brandus. Mr. Brandus gave me notice that that was in respect of a sum of money which was owing. I heard no more of it, but engaged the boxes. I got the boxes at a reduced price of £3 3s., instead of £3 12s., which I had formerly paid. The season of 1852 at Covent Garden was what is called a paying season. It was a fair average season. Covent Garden opened on the 1st of April. I took £1,200 to Hamburg. I thought it was the whole of the sum to be paid to Miss Wagner, and I thought that by paying the whole she might be induced to fulfil the engagement. I did nothing towards tendering the money. I deposited £500 with a banker, conditionally that Madame Sontag would come. She declined to come. Re-examined by Mr. HOGGINS.—I expected that Madame Sontag would appear at the end of the season, after Miss Wagner's engagement was over.

A good deal of documentary and formal evidence was then given, which occupied the Court till nearly six o'clock. Some discussion arose as to the meaning of the word "dès" in the expression "dès le deuxième d'Avril," the plaintiff's counsel contending that it meant "from" or "after," while the defendant's counsel contended that, when it referred to the future, it meant "by" or "not later than." The further hearing of the case was then adjourned.

SECOND DAY.

Several witnesses were called on the part of the plaintiff, to show the extent of damage which he had sustained by reason of the defendant's alleged interference with Miss Wagner, in enticing her to break her contract with the plaintiff to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre. The witnesses all described the consequences of the disappointment as most disastrous to the fortunes of the theatre, and as putting an end to any prospect of success during the season. Considerable expense had been incurred in getting ready for the representation of Le Prophète and Les Huguenots, both in the way of dresses, which cost several hundred pounds, and in the copying of music, &c. It was stated by Mr. Nugent, the director of the box-office of Her Majesty's Theatre, that, in the year 1847, during the 39 nights of Jenny Lind's performance, the takings of the theatre were £45,224 6s.; while, during the 56 nights on which the theatre was open in the year 1852, the takings only amounted to £2,800 12s. This difference the witnesses attributed to the disappointment occasioned by the non-appearance of Miss Wagner. They stated that Jenny Lind created what they termed "the Lind fever," and they gave their opinion that in the theatrical world "the Wagner fever" was quite as violent; but so great, they said, was the disappointment at her non-appearance that nothing was of any avail, but Cruvelli, Lablache, and other eminent artistes sang to empty boxes. The plaintiff's counsel, however, sought, by cross-examination, to show that the empty boxes arose from the circumstances that Sontag would not come because she had not been paid for her last year's services; that Fiorentini could not get paid and went away; and that Cruvelli only sang occasionally for the same reason. The ballet, it was suggested, was equally defective. Cerito was not there. The witnesses, however, said that her place was supplied by Rosati, and that the company generally was a good one, and that, if Miss Wagner had appeared, all would have gone on well. Mr. Allcroft's payment for boxes dropped from an average of £5000 a-year to the small sum of £150; and this witness added, that at the time when Jenny Lind came, the company was no better than it was in 1852. A clerk from Coutts's bank was called, who proved that on the 4th of April, 1852, a check for £1,000 was drawn by Mr. Gye in favour of Miss Wagner.

This was the plaintiff's case.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then addressed the jury for the defendant in a speech which lasted nearly four hours. He said, he was rejoiced to think that the time was now come when the case of the defendant would be laid before the jury in its true and simple character. After so much reproach, and obloquy, and misrepresentation, it would be satisfactory to him (the defendant) to feel that he would now have an opportunity of stating all that he had done and all that he had not done in reference to these transactions, and of vindicating openly, at the bar of a British court of justice and before the British public, the character which had been so malignantly assailed. The defendant had been charged with perfidious and malignant conduct by a man who now skulked from this court, lest he should be dragged trembling into that witness-box, where he had been afraid to show himself. He might now, however, throw back that charge upon Mr. Lumley, speaking as he (the Attorney-General) was on behalf of a man who did not shrink from a court of justice, when he was assailed by a man who sought by damages to consign him to irretrievable ruin. The charge made against Mr. Gye was, that he, well knowing the existence of a contract subsisting between Miss Wagner and Mr. Lumley, induced her to violate it. The contract with Mr. Gye was signed on the 5th of April, and one question would be, whether upon that day there was a contract subsisting between Miss Wagner and Mr. Lumley, which the latter was in a position to enforce as against Miss Wagner. A second question would be, did she break that contract in consequence of anything done by Mr. Gye? And a third question would be, did he do it with a knowledge of the existence of such a contract, and with the intention of injuring the plaintiff? All those questions arose upon the record which the jury had to try. The first question would in the end, he thought, depend on the decision of the learned judge (Lord Campbell), and he would therefore leave it for the present till he had brought out the whole of the case. He would now give the history of all the negotiations, and in so doing would keep back nothing, that being the wish of Mr. Gye, who intended to offer himself as a witness in the box. He (the Attorney-General) thought he had some reason to complain that his learned friend (Sir F. Thesiger) had branded his client (Mr. Gye) as a perfidious and dishonourable man; the more so, as it would turn out that while Mr. Gye was negotiating with Miss Wagner, Dr. Bacher went and secured her for Mr. Lumley by the most cunning mi-representations. Sir F. Thesiger had read to the jury a letter from Mr. Wagner, which had been published in the Morning Post, but he had omitted to read the first paragraph of that letter, in which the writer stated the particulars of the negotiations which he had had with Mr. Gye. He had to thank Sir F. Thesiger for putting in that letter, and he would by and by explain how it came to pass that Mr. Wagner's name was signed to it by Mr. Gye. Miss Wagner had been known to Mr. Gye for some period, and he had heard her sing in the year 1845, when she was singing at the Opera at Dresden, which he (the Attorney-General) called an inferior Opera, in comparison of the Operas of Paris and London. It was not till the year 1850 that Miss Wagner began to acquire that proficiency which now distinguished her. In the month of January, 1851, Mr. Gye heard her sing at the Opera at Hamburg. He called on her father at that time, and on the 6th of January made a proposal for Miss Wagner to sing at his theatre, in that year, 1851. But it so happened that at that time Miss Wagner had an engagement for the Theatre Royal at Berlin, and this led to her declining Mr. Gye's proposal. Mr. Wagner, in declining that proposal, expressed the readiness of his daughter to come to England in 1852, and requested Mr. Gye to make any proposal which he might wish to offer before the month November, 1851. In the month of September, 1851, Mr. Gye went to Berlin. He then found that a new difficulty had arisen. M. Meyerbeer had composed a new opera, which was to be brought out at Paris, and, being much struck with the freshness of Miss Wagner's voice, he was desirous that she should come out in his new opera at Paris, and a sort of engagement to that effect had been made. Miss Wagner told Mr. Gye that, under those circumstances, she could not give him an answer to his proposal; but at that time it never occurred to Mr. Gye that if she came to London Miss Wagner would sing at any other theatre than his. Mr. Gye then learnt that Mr. Lumley had been in communication with Miss Wagner through Dr. Bacher, but she gave him to understand that, from priority of acquaintance, she would give him (Mr Gye) the preference. Mr. Gye then went to Italy, and on his way back he saw Miss Wagner again at Berlin. The difficulties previously suggested still remained, and that lady took another month to consider of the offer which Mr. Gye made her. That offer was, to pay her £3,000 for three months' services in the year 1852, of which sum £1,000 was to be paid down. After the season at Berlin was over, Miss Wagner's voice had greatly developed itself, and she was offered a permanent engagement at Berlin, by which she would be entitled to a pension after a certain period, or in case of illness. That would have prevented her appearing at Paris or London, and Dr. Bacher urged her to reject the offer, while Mr. Gye, with true disinterestedness, advised her to secure the certainty. Mr. Gye then left Berlin in the confidence that, if she came to England, Miss Wagner would come to his theatre; but on the 7th of December he received a letter from her, stating that she had entered into a contract with Mr. Lumley. In that letter Miss Wagner said:—

"I must naturally appear ungrateful to you; but we have told you again and again the peculiar reasons which compel me for this once to sing at Mr. Lumley's against my feelings; you know them well. I expect little good from this engagement; but, on my word, I could not act otherwise. I am very unhappy about it—I and especially my father, who expects nothing but evil from this connexion. Nevertheless, I hope for your pardon, and even that you will receive us in London as friends. Will you not, Monsieur? In this hope, we anticipate with pleasure seeing you again. A thousand compliments from all our family.

"From your devoted,

"J. WAGNER."

That letter showed the former intimacy of Mr. Gye with the Wagners, and that she (Miss Wagner) was conscious that she was disappointing him. It showed, too, that Mr. Gye had been outwitted by Dr. Bacher's cunning manœuvres, and the deep disappointment and mortification which was expected to result from that circumstance.

To that letter Mr. Gye replied as follows:—

"London, 9th Jan., 1852.

"Dear Miss Wagner,—I was not in London when your most amiable letter arrived, but in Paris, where I remained some days; your letter has caused me both regret and pleasure—regret, because it informs me that you are to sing at a theatre so opposed to my interest; pleasure, because it tells me I am to have the happiness of seeing you in London. The twofold pleasure of seeing you here and deriving benefit from your success, was, it seems, too much for me to enjoy—at least, this season.

"I must therefore content myself with the hope that all this pleasure is only reserved for next year. A thousand compliments, if you please, to your amiable family.

"Yours entirely devoted,

"F. GYE."

That letter showed that Mr. Gye acquiesced in Miss Wagner's contract with Mr. Lumley, and that he treated it as un fait accompli, reserving to himself the opportunity of obtaining her services at a future period. In the month of January, 1852, Mr. Gye had to go to Berlin to see M. Meyerbeer about an opera, and it was only natural that while at Berlin he should call on Miss Wagner, and endeavour to secure her services for the year 1853. There was nothing to hinder his so doing, and he succeeded in getting his offer for that year (1853) accepted. He then asked Miss Wagner if she would sing at his theatre for a few nights after she had finished her engagement with Mr. Lumley. Nothing was settled upon that point, but it was then Mr. Gye became acquainted with the means used by Dr. Bacher to prevent Miss Wagner from singing at his theatre. That Dr. Bacher, who he (the Attorney-General) would show had been guilty of the vilest perjury, had represented Mr. Gye's theatre, which was second to none in the world for its dramatic and orchestral talent, as one of a second-rate character, and he had told Miss Wagner that by singing there she would lose caste, and that the whole press was leagued to support Mr. Lumley, and was certain to run down whoever appeared at Covent Garden. Dr. Bacher knew little of the press of England, or he would have known that it was incapable of being prostituted to purposes so vile and mean. He either lied, and knew he lied, or it was the custom of his own dirty mind to attribute to others what he knew himself to be capable of. Mr. Gye then came back to England and prepared to open the campaign of 1852. When he returned, he found that it was whispered about that it would be impossible for Mr. Lumley to proceed. The artistes manifested symptoms of discontent. Salaries remained unpaid, arrests were spoken of, and there was a general report that things were going wrong. Mr. Gye then wrote to Miss Wagner a letter of the 9th of March, as follows.—

"London, March 9, 1852.

"My dear Mademoiselle Wagner,—I send you one of the first of my programmes. It is a secret for two or three days, not being yet published. There is only one thing wanting to render the programme perfect—it is the name of Mademoiselle Wagner. Is there still any possibility of that? If you think so, write me two lines, because there is still time. With regard to the Prophète, no one can perform it in England except myself. I have bought the exclusive right. In any case, dear mademoiselle, I shall be delighted to hear from you. Have you decided to give a few performances at Covent Garden after your engagement at the other theatre? If you wish to do this, the agreement must be made before you commence at Mr. Lumley's, because during your engagement with him you are prohibited signing any contract; is it not so? I have no occasion to tell you that all shall be kept faithfully secret. If I can be useful to you in anything, do not hesitate to render me so. "Believe me, etc.,

"F. GYE."

Mr. Lumley had been at that time keeping up a solicitation to Mr. Gye to take Her Majesty's Theatre off his hands, and about the time when that letter was written he offered Mr. Gye to take £4,000 less by the year than Mr. Gye had offered in the year previous. That fact showed that Mr. Lumley did not believe in the prospects about which so much had been said. There was strong reasons for Mr. Gye to believe that Miss Wagner would not come, and, having received no answer to his letter of the 9th of March, he again wrote to her as follows on the 30th:—

"London, March 30, 1852.

"Dear Mademoiselle Wagner,—Will you have the goodness to write me one word in reply to my last letter? Forgive me for troubling you, but it is said here that your arrangements are not quite fixed with Mr. Lumley. Is this true? My theatre opened last Saturday. The opening of Mr. Lumley's theatre was announced last Saturday, but it did not take place; it was again announced for to-night, but was again put off. Another bill has now come out, in which the opening is announced for Thursday, but there is much doubt. You will see by the enclosed programme that M. Negrini, the tenor singer, of whom I spoke to you, is engaged at Covent Garden; the troupe is fine, is it not? Excuse me for writing in such a hurry. Give me two lines in answer.

"Believe me, &c., "F. GYE."

Negrini was one of the two tenors whom Dr. Bacher said he had got in his pocket for Mr. Lumley, and who was announced in Mr. Lumley's programme. But Dr. Bacher in his letter to Mr. Lumley, had told him that he had scarcely anything left for the tenors; and in the result Negrini refused to come without being paid. To neither of those two letters did Mr. Gye get any answer. He knew that Mr. Lumley had not got the sinews of war, as was proved by the result, for Sontag would not come, Fiorentini would not sing, and Cruvelli would only sing now and then, when she was paid. Miss Wagner had not come to England, and Mr. Gye was determined to find out whether any screw was loose which had prevented Lumley from carrying out his contract; and accordingly he went to Berlin to see Miss Wagner, but found that she was at Hamburg, where he saw her with her father and friends on the 5th of April. The first thing that she said to him was, that the contract with Mr. Lumley was at an end, in consequence of his failing to complete his part of the agreement,—viz., the payment of 300*l.* by the 15th of March. The clause of the contract containing the stipulation was shown to Mr. Gye, who, on seeing it, said that if Miss Wagner was ready to enter into a contract with him he would give her 2,000*l.* for two months, and would pay 1,000 down. Miss Wagner then asked Mr. Gye to wait two or three days, in case Mr. Lumley should send the money; but Mr. Gye said, "No, he could not do that; he had only just time to get back to England, and they must say 'Yes' or 'No.'" They then stated that they had heard from Sontag and Taglioni that they had not been paid for the last year, and that they were satisfied that, according to Prussian law, the contract had been broken. Mr. Gye stated that such was his opinion in reference also to the English law, and it was agreed that he should give them an idemnity. That was done, and an agreement was made the same day, the 5th of April, Mr. Gye feeling that he owed no delicacy to Mr. Lumley, but that he was justified in what he did, so long as he kept within the broad line of legal and moral duty. Subsequently a formal deed of indemnity was drawn up by Mr. Dale, the solicitor of Mr Wagner, in which the fact was recited that Mr. Lumley had broken his contract by the non-payment of the 300*l.* It had been stated that the time for the payment of that sum had been extended by agreement. It was originally intended that Miss Wagner should make her first appearance on the 1st of April, but on the 6th of February Mr. Wagner had written to Mr. Lumley to have that time extended for fifteen days. Mr. Lumley, by a letter of the 11th, assented to that proposal, but without making any condition as to the alteration of the time for the payment of the money on the 15th of March.

Lord CAMPBELL said it might be a question whether that time was not impliedly extended by the extension of the time for the appearance.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, certainly a question might be raised upon the point. At all events, the extension could not have been beyond the 1st or 2nd of April; but it was never tendered till the 10th of April. Mr. Wagner's letter of the 9th of March, upon which reliance had been placed, had been much misunderstood. It contained this passage:—

"Si vous envoyez la lettre de change, veuilles bien l'adresser ou dans ce temps à Berlin ou dès le deuxième d'Avril à Hambourg.

"Ad. 'Engel et Compagnie, Ferdinands Strasse,' où nous séjournerons quelque temps, chez notre fille et sœur dernièrement mariée."

The learned Attorney-General proceeded to contend, that although the word "dès," when used retrospectively, meant "from," yet when it referred to the future it meant "not later than," as in the phrase "dès demain," "by to-morrow." That was the interpretation given of the word in the dictionary of the French Academy. He then commented with great severity upon the evidence given by Dr. Bacher, who had stated that he had received a letter from Miss Wagner acknowledging his, in which he said he had got the 300*l.* ready, and saying that he could pay it to her at Hamburg. That witness had called himself a doctor of civil law, when it appeared that he was a mere copying clerk in an advocate's office, who had been employed by Mr. Lumley as his hack to do his dirty work. He belonged to the firm of Lumley, Bacher, and Brandus, who hoped to be enriched with the plunder which they expected to get from the defendant by this action. Dr. Bacher said he had that letter, and that he had given it to Mr. Lumley or to Mr. Jennings. Why, then, was Lumley not forthcoming? Why was not Jennings, the solicitor, called? He was wanted yesterday, but instead of calling him they called his clerk. The learned Attorney-General contended at considerable length that the evidence of Dr. Bacher was wholly unworthy of credit, which was proved by the simple fact that he had never mentioned the letter in his affidavit in Chancery. He (the Attorney-General) did not believe Dr. Bacher had got the 800*l.*, or else why did Mr. Lumley write to Mr. Mitchell to send him 1200*l.* to Hamburg? That was the whole sum that was to be paid to Miss Wagner, and only 900*l.* would have been required if Dr. Bacher had really got the 800*l.* The learned gentleman proceeded to contend that Mr. Gye had acted in the bonâ fide belief that the contract with Mr. Lumley was at an end, arising from the circumstances in which he knew Mr. Lumley to be at the time, and the statements made to him by Mr. and Miss Wagner. After an address of four hours, in which the learned gentleman commented upon every fact in the case, he concluded by stating that the present action had been brought merely to gratify the plaintiff's vengeance and cupidity, and that he had shrunk from appearing in the witness-box lest he should be exposed in his true colours, which were no other than those in which he had untruly described the client for whom he (the Attorney-General) had the honour to appear.

Frederick Gye, examined by Mr. Bramwell.—I am the defendant. I first saw Miss Wagner in the year 1845. I then heard her sing at Dresden. I had no personal communication with her. I had my first interview with her at the end of 1850, or the beginning of 1851. That was at Hamburg. We came to no arrangement at that time. She mentioned an engagement at Berlin which prevented. I had two or three interviews. She ultimately declined. These letters are from Miss Wagner. In one of them she begs me not entirely to forget her name next year, and requested me to make a proposition before November 1, 1851. My opera season terminates in August. In September, 1851, I went abroad and saw Miss Wagner at Berlin, with her father. I made her proposals for 1852. The terms I offered were, I believe, £2,000—positively £2,000 for the whole season. She did not accept the proposal. I offered her £1,000 in advance. She said she would give me an answer in the end of October. I saw her again at Berlin, in the company of her father. She was not ready to give me an answer. I renewed the proposition. She told me that she would be entitled to a pension if she accepted the court engagement at Berlin. I talked with her on the advisability of her accepting it. At one of those interviews they told me Dr. Bacher had been there, and they had had propositions from Mr. Lumley. No figure was named. I think I told her I should be at Berlin again. The next communication was a letter I received from her. The letter is dated December 7, 1851. (The letter was read, informing Mr. Gye of the engagement Miss Wagner had made with Mr. Lumley, expressing regret that she had been obliged to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre this once, etc.) I wrote in answer on the 9th of January. (Read.) I went to Berlin again in the month of January. I had occasion to see Meyerbeer. I took the opportunity of calling upon Miss Wagner, and negotiated about her singing at my theatre in 1853, and for six or eight nights after the completion of her engagement with Mr. Lumley. An engagement was signed for 1853. It was not a positive engagement, but she gave me an assurance that if she did sing in England in 1853, she would sing only at my theatre. No engagement was made for 1852. I never attempted to induce her to break her engagement with Mr. Lumley. We had no further communication till the month of March following. I had heard that Mr. Lumley was in difficulties. I then wrote a letter of the 9th of March. (Read.) I have bought the exclusive right of Le Prophète. I received no answer to my letter of the 9th of March. I wrote a second letter (of the 30th of March), but got no answer. I have no doubt that the statement which the letter contained, that the opening of Mr. Lumley's theatre had been twice announced and postponed, was true. I went to Berlin to see Miss Wagner; I found she had gone to Hamburg. I found her there, with her father, on the 5th of April. I left London on the 2nd. I saw her with her family. After the usual salutations I asked why she had not written to me? Miss Wagner said, "In effect I am free." Those were the first words she said. I then asked why she had not written to me? She said she had been expecting to receive a sum of money from Mr. Lumley, which she had not received. She said she had delayed answering, hoping she should receive it. She told me that, according to the contract with Mr. Lumley, he was bound to pay her £300 on the 15th of March. She then said she was free to make an engagement with me. I told her I was ready to make one. She asked the terms, and I offered her £2,000 for two months, and a month's salary in advance. This arrangement was entered into. (Read, dated the 5th of April, 1852.) I gave her a check for £1,000. I saw the agreement with Mr. Lumley, in order to be satisfied that it contained the provision about the payment of the £300. This was shown to me during the writing of the contract. No other clause was shown to me. I read the clause that the £300 was to be paid by the 15th of March. The agreement and check were then signed. Mr. Wagner said the contract was broken by Mr. Lumley by his not paying the £300. The Wagners suggested whether, according to the English law, the contract was broken. They said it was broken according to the Prussian law. I can only give the substance of what passed. I gave my opinion that there could be no doubt that it was broken according to our English law. They then said, "Would you have any objection to give us an indemnity? I said, "Not the least." I gave this indemnity (read.) Upon that I left Hamburg the same night. Miss Wagner had asked me if I could not wait a day or two longer, in case Mr. Lumley should send the money? I said I could not; I had done what I had never done before, that was to leave the theatre, and that I had lost more time than I expected to do by going round to Berlin. The Wagners spoke to me of Madame Sontag, and said she had not been paid, and that Taglioni had told them she had not been paid. They had been speaking of the money not having been sent, and the little likelihood that it would be sent. They spoke of the representations which had been made to them by Dr. Bacher in favour of one theatre and against the other. One was with regard to the press being in favour of Mr. Lumley's theatre. No one informed me that there had been any extension of time to Miss Wagner's engagement. I heard nothing of the letters which had passed betwen Mr. Lumley and Miss Wagner in February and March. I heard nothing of any extension of time for the payment of the money, or of any letter from Bacher that he had got the money. I first heard of the extension of time in the Chancery proceedings. The direct way to London from Hamburg is through Hanover and Cologne. I saw Dr. Bacher at the stations at Hanover and Cologne. When I came to London I advertised Miss Wagner. I left Hamburg on the 5th, and arrived on the 7th at Calais. I telegraphed to London the advertisement of Miss Wagner's appearance. Prior to that I had not advertised her name in any way at my theatre. On the day after the Wagners' arrival, an application was made to me by Mr. Wagner for a more formal indemnity. I said I had no objection. They asked me to recommend a legal gentleman to do this for them. I declined. I afterwards received a draught deed of indemnity from Mr. Dale. I made some alterations in the draught, and afterwards signed the deed. (Draught deed read, dated April 23, reciting that Mr. Lumley had broken his contract with Miss Wagner,) When I signed that deed I had not heard of any extension of the time of payment from the 15th of March. I first heard of that in the Chancery proceedings. After the Chancery proceedings I left Miss Wagner free to suit herself. She was very angry at the proceedings. Some expressions of Dr. Bacher offended her very much. In November and December of the year 1851, I had been in negotiation with Mr. Lumley for the renting of his theatre. I offered him a price of £12,500 a-year for the use of everything. The negotiation continued till the beginning of 1853. Viscount Ranelagh mentioned a different price. The letter in the Morning Post was in answer to an attack which had been inserted in the newspapers. Mr. Wagner stated some of the facts and they were taken down by me. I put down what I knew. I think Mr. Wagner signed one copy about taking the theatre. Cross-examined by Sir. F. Thesiger.—The negotiation was broken off on my part in January, 1852. One of the conditions was as to the number of representations to be given at Her Majesty's Theatre. I was at Berlin in January, about from the 9th to the 12th. I did not write to Miss Wagner on the 9th of January, 1852. I was at Berlin on the 9th of January. It was about the 22nd of January I was at Berlin. I had no communication with the Wagners till the 9th of March. I had no answer before I wrote the letter of the 30th of March. I did not, as stated in Mr. Wagner's letter in the Morning Post, send a letter early in March to Miss Wagner, stating I had heard that her contract with Mr. Lumley was not likely to be carried out, and that, though many of my season engagements were made, there was, in such a case, an opening for her at my theatre. The letter of the 30th of March says I had heard that the contract was not likely to be carried out. It says, "It is said here that your arrangements are not quite fixed with Mr. Lumley; is that true?" The statement is not true as it stands in the paper (the Morning Post). It was on the 2nd of April I left London. I arrived at Berlin on the 4th, and at Hamburg on the 5th. By the letter of the 30th of March I asked for an answer to my former letter. I did not wait for an answer, but I started on the 2nd of April. The Easter week had arrived, and I found I could get away for a few days, and thought it better to go. I went to see whether Miss Wagner was free. I had heard rumours about the theatre. I had received no answer to my letter, and I thought it was better to go and see her. I had heard the rumours constantly. The first thing Miss Wagner said to me was, "I am free." At first I found Mr. and Miss Wagner alone with her mother. Afterwards others came in and joined in the conversation. There was Mr. Jacobi and his wife, whom I had known as Miss Wagner's sister. I did not ask Mr. Wagner to let me see the whole of the contract. I was satisfied with seeing the clause. When I went over I was not aware of any particular special lapse of Mr. Lumley. When Miss Wagner wanted me to wait two or three days, I thought she wanted to give Mr. Lumley more than reasonable time. I told her my avocations rendered it impossible to remain longer from London, and Miss Wagner must either accept or refuse the offer. Great inconvenience would have arisen from my stopping. My brother-in-law accompanied me. Captain de Bathe did not. He is only interested in Covent-garden Theatre as a friend of mine. I was sole manager and proprietor. Re-examined by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL. When the letter was written to the Morning Post, it was drawn up from a recollection of the letters of the 9th and 30th of March. The letters at that time were not in England. I thought that the representation in that letter was true. The theatre was closed in Passion week. Good Friday was on the 9th. I had to prepare advertisements to be put in the Sunday papers, and hastened back. It is a common thing for foreign singers to stipulate for money to be paid down before they start for England. I have used every effort to induce Miss Wagner to come and be examined here. I wrote to her in July last, and on other occasions. I also went personally to see her. I wished her to submit to an examination in Vienna, where she then was. I urged her to come here to be examined. Cross-examined by Sir F. THESIGER.—My solicitor applied to her to deliver up some letters. He has received letters.

The further hearing was then adjourned at a little after six o'clock.

THIRD DAY.

J. L. Dale, examined by Mr. CREASY.—I am a solicitor in Furnival's inn. In April, 1852, I prepared the deed of indemnity for Miss Wagner. I received my instructions from Mr. Wagner. Mr. Gye did not in any way interfere in the matter.

T. Burgess, examined by Mr. CREASY.—I acted as solicitor to the Wagners in the Chancery proceedings. The injunction was granted on the 23rd of April. The application was made without notice. The extension of time did not come to my notice for some time. I communicated it to Mr. Gye as soon as I knew it. Cross-examined.—I applied to the Wagners for a letter of the 10th of March, but no such letter was found. The answer was, that there was no such letter. Re-examined.—The telegraphic answer was, that no letter of that date could be found.

George Tamplin, examined by Mr. CREASY.—I am the attorney for Mr. Gye. I know that attempts were made to procure the evidence of Miss Wagner and her father. A commission was issued, and several hundred pounds expended to that end. The Court of Queen's Bench ordered that a commission should issue to the Royal Court of Berlin. One of the conditions on which it was granted was the payment of the expense of the previous commission. I asked the Wagners at Berlin for the letter of the 10th of March. I could not get one. They told me they did not think they had received one of that date. Cross-examined.—I had read Miss Wagner's affidavit in Chancery. In consequence of that, I applied to her for the letter of the 10th of March. Re-examined.—It was in consequence of what she had said of that letter I was so anxious to obtain it. It was admitted that the first commission was abortive. Cross-examined.—We did not pay the costs of the first commission, and did not draw up the rule. Re-examined.—We did not like to pay the costs. By Lord CAMPBELL.—I thought no good would result from the commission, the Court threw so much doubt upon the evidence which would be produced. Re-examined.—The expenses of the commission were from 700*l.* to 800*l.* Cross-examined.—I don't know the amount of Mr. Lumley's costs on the rule which I refused to draw up. Re-examined.—I called Mr. Gye's attention to an article in the Sunday Times. Mr. Gye and Mr. Wagner agreed that it was necessary that an answer should be given. Mr. Gye took down Mr. Wagner's answer as to a part. Part was written by Mr. Gye for himself. I think one copy was signed by Mr. Wagner.

C. J. Delille examined by Mr. CREASY.—I am a professor of the French language, and French master of Christ's Hospital, St. Paul's, etc. I am a native of France. The following passage from Mr. Wagner's letter of the 9th of March was then read:—"Si vous envoyez la lettre de change, veuillez bien l'adresser ou dans ce temps à Berlin, ou dès le deuxième d'Avril à Hambourg. Ad. 'Engel et Compagnie, Ferdinande-strasse,' où nous séjournerons quelque temps, chez notre fille et sœur dernièrement mariée." The witness translated the passage thus:—"If you send the bill of exchange, have the goodness to forward it, either at this time to Berlin or by the 2nd of April at Hamburgh, to Engel and Co., Ferdinande-strasse, where we shall stay some time, at the house of our daughter and sister lately married." When the word "dès" is used, with reference to an event occurring at a time past, it means "à partir de," "beginning at." That is the interpretation given by the dictionary of the French Academy. It is used to designate a time fixed and near with regard to the future. If I promise to do a thing "dès demain," it means "by to-morrow." M. Merlet, of the London University, was also subpœnaed.

Lord CAMPBELL said the question was, in what sense Mr. and Miss Wagner used the word. They were both Germans, and probably did not understand the French language so well as M. Delille. Lord Campbell asked the witness whether he considered the letter good French?

M. Delille said—I can understand the meaning of the letter. It is not good French. Cross-examined by Sir F. KELLY.—I was not aware that the letter was written by a German. The letter is not written by a classical French scholar. The word "dès" may mean "by," depending on the nature of the verb and the context. Re-examined.—According to the strict use of the term "dès" here, the person acting upon it would be bound to send it (the money) "not later than" the 2nd of April. Taking the sequence into account, there is some doubt, but I should be on the safe side, and send it "by" the 2nd of April; but the sequence has nothing to do with it. Cross-examined by Sir F. KELLY.—If I were speaking of translating a work into English I might say, "J'y travaillerai dès demain," and that might mean "I will work at it (the translation) from to-morrow." It would oblige me to commence it to-morrow.

Lord CAMPBELL said, the jury could not have a better opinion than M. Delille's. No further evidence was called upon this point.

Leicester Buckingham examined.—I was treasurer of Mr. Lumley's Italian theatre in Paris from November, 1851, to November, 1852. The Paris season ends in April. Mr. Lumley was pressed for small sums. The salaries were, generally speaking, in arrear. (A letter from the plaintiff was here read to prove this fact. A second was then produced. It began with the words, "Private and confidential," and was accordingly laid aside.) Cross-examined by Sir F. KELLY.—On the 8th of January, 1852, Rothschild's house at Paris gave the plaintiff a remittance of 10,000*l.* on Rothschild's house at Vienna.

Frederick Leader, examined by Mr. CREASY.—I am a music-seller in Bond-street. I had taken two boxes and five or seven stalls of Mr. Lumley for the season of 1852. I received a letter from Mr. Lumley requiring me to pay the money. I paid £350. The bad season of 1852 was occasioned by the non-appearance of Sontag and Cerito, as well as of Wagner. There was a general falling off from the programme. Cross-examined by Sir F. KELLY.—I resisted payment in consequence of the non-appearance of Sontag and others, as well as of Wagner.

This was the case for the defendant.

Sir F. THESIGER then addressed the jury in reply to the defendant's evidence, and in so doing observed that, while several circumstances in the course of the trial had given him great pain, nothing had pained him more than the violent and vehement language which the Attorney-General had thought proper to use towards Mr. Lumley and one of his principal witnesses (Dr. Bacher.) The latter had been described as "the hack agent of all Mr. Lumley's dirty work." In making that attack, the Attorney-General had justified himself in some degree by his (Sir F. Thesiger's) example; but he was not aware that he had made a single observation which was not completely justified by the evidence in the case; and, as to Mr. Lumley, he (Sir F. Thesiger) thought there was nothing in the case, from the beginning to the end, to throw any imputation whatever on Mr. Lumley. It was true that he had met with the usual fate which it was admitted attended those who were embarked in theatrical speculations, but beyond that nothing could be said against him. The Attorney-General had said he should not have had the moral courage to conduct the case for the plaintiff without putting Mr. Lumley into the box. Now, he (Sir F. Thesiger) did not expect professions of modesty from modest persons like his learned friend; but he thought that, when it was clear that the only end that could have been answered by calling Mr. Lumley would have been the public exposure of his private affairs, he (Sir F. Thesiger) could safely leave it to the jury to say whether the refusal to call that gentleman showed a want of moral courage, or whether it was not the exercise of a sound discretion on his part. The learned counsel then proceeded to comment upon the evidence, and read several of Mr. Gye's letters, with a view to show that he had no ground of complaint against Mr. Lumley for making an agreement with Miss Wagner, and that there was no ground for the charge which had been made, that Mr. Lumley had in any way manœuvred in order to secure that lady's services. The whole of the circumstances showed that Miss Wagner was a free agent in the matter, and had acted entirely under the advice of her father. The learned counsel then referred to the evidence given by Dr. Bacher, in which he stated that on the 10th of March he had written to Miss Wagner, informing her that he had the £300 ready to be paid her, and had received a letter from her in answer, saying that she would see him at Hamburg. The learned Attorney-General had told the jury that he would convict Dr. Bacher of perjury in making that statement, but the very circumstance relied upon to prove that charge—a protest made by Mr. Lumley—proved the truth of the statement. The fact that a letter of the 10th of March was sent was admitted by Miss Wagner; and Dr. Bacher stated that it informed Miss Wagner that he had £300 ready to be paid her, and that, too, at a time when he did not know that the letter might be produced. That Dr. Bacher had written such a letter was shewn by the fact that on the same day, the 10th of March, he (Dr. Bacher) had written to Mr. Lumley, in which he said he had £300 to pay Miss Wagner—"et je l'en ai avertie." The learned counsel then read the passage from the letter in the Morning Post, in which Mr. Wagner had stated, with Mr. Gye's concurrence, that early in March Mr. Gye had written to say he had heard that Miss Wagner's contract with Mr. Lumley would not be carried out; and commented upon the inability of Mr. Gye, when challenged, to show any expression in his letters of the 9th and 30th of March which would bear out that statement. The learned counsel then read Mr. Gye's letters of the 9th and 30th of March, and contended that in those letters Mr. Gye was endeavouring to suggest the inability of Mr. Lumley to carry out his contract, and soliciting Miss Wagner to break her engagement. What did Mr. Gye do beside writing? Why, without waiting for an answer to his letter of the 30th of March, he started from London on the 2nd of April, when his absence from his theatre was most inconvenient, and travelled first to Berlin and then to Hamburg, to see Miss Wagner. Why did he go in such haste, if it was not to induce that lady to violate her contract. Then, how came it to pass that the evidence of the Wagners was not forthcoming? The evidence of those parties was most important, so much so, that Mr. Gye had caused a commission to be issued to take their examinations abroad, and when that commission proved abortive, an application was made by him to the Court of Queen's Bench for a commission to the Royal Court of Berlin for the same purpose. The Court of Queen's Bench had, however, made it a condition that Mr. Gye should pay Mr. Lumley his costs of the first commission, but it now appeared that Mr. Gye was unwilling to draw up the rule, and had abandoned the advantage which would accrue from the important evidence which those parties would be able to give. The conclusion which he (Sir F. Thesiger) was entitled to draw from that circumstance was that the evidence would have been unfavourable to the defendant. The learned counsel then argued that the account which Mr. Gye had given of his interview with the Wagners at Hamburg was incredible. It was incredible that the first words Miss Wagner said to him were, "In effect, I am free." The date of that interview was the 5th of April. On the 10th of March Dr. Bacher had written to Miss Wagner to say the £300 was ready. On the 16th of March Mr. Lumley, in consequence of a letter received from Dr. Bacher of the 10th of March, wrote to Miss Wagner, saying that he had been informed by Dr. Bacher that he had written to her to say that he had the money ready. How then could Miss Wagner have begun by saying that she was "free," when she knew that there was a binding contract still subsisting? It was impossible. The truth of the case was, that Mr. Gye, having discovered that the agreement with Mr. Lumley contained a stipulation that the money should be paid on the 15th of March, and that it had not been paid, suggested that the contract had been broken on the part of Mr. Lumley. Why was the indemnity asked for by Mr. Wagner, and why was it given by Mr. Gye, but to satisfy the Wagners that they might safely accept his (Mr. Gye's) large offer of £2,000 for an engagement of only two months? He first suggested that Mr. Lumley could not carry out his agreement, and then offered an indemnity and the sum of £2,000, and by those bribes he succeeded in procuring Miss Wagner to break her contract.

The learned counsel's address was followed by some applause, which was immediately checked by the officers of the court.

Lord Campbell then very minutely summed up the evidence to the jury, and in so doing said there would be three questions for their consideration. The first was, whether the agreement which had been entered into between the plaintiff and Miss Wagner remained in force at the time when it was alleged the defendant had induced her to break it; secondly, whether the defendant induced Miss Wagner to break the agreement, and whether she broke it in consequence of his inducement; and, thirdly, whether the defendant at that time knew that the agreement between Miss Wagner and the plaintiff was then in existence. Upon those questions his (Lord Campbell's) direction in point of law in reference to the agreement was, that the payment of the £300 on the 15th of March was a condition precedent, and that, if it was not performed, she (Miss Wagner) was at liberty to renounce the agreement. But Miss Wagner might have agreed that the time for performing the agreement should be extended, and it would be for the jury to consider, upon the evidence, how far she had done so, and whether the defendant had induced her to break the agreement before the extended time had expired. The second question was a pure question of fact for the determination of the jury. Upon the third question, his (Lord Campbell's) direction was, that if the defendant bonâ fide believed that the agreement with the plaintiff had ceased to be binding upon Miss Wagner, the scienter was not proved, and the defendant would be entitled to the verdict. His Lordship then read over all the material parts of the evidence, and finally left the above three questions to the jury, with the observation that, if they should find a verdict for the plaintiff, they ought to give such damages as would be a compensation for the pecuniary loss directly caused by Miss Wagner's breach of her agreement.

The jury retired to consider their verdict, and upon their return into court found the first two questions in the affirmative, and the third in the negative. This amounted to a verdict for the defendant.

Verdict for the defendant.

Harmonic Union.—On Thursday, Handel's Acis and Galatea, with Mozart's additional accompaniments, was repeated, with the same singers as on the first occasion—viz., Misses Stabbach and Thirlwall, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Suchet Champion, and Signor Belletti. Mr. Benedict conducted. The performance was as good as the first. Sig. Belletti and Mr. Sims Reeves were again encored in "O ruddier than the Cherry," and "Love sounds the Alarm." The serenata was preceded by the music of Mendelssohn to A Midsummer Night's Dream, which was well played under Mr. Benedict's careful direction. A solo for trombone, with orchestral accompaniments, was admirably played by the composer, Mr. Cioffi, and loudly encored. The hall was very full.

New Beethoven Rooms.—Señor Noronha, a Spanish violinist, played several compositions of his own in the presence of a select circle, at these rooms, on Tuesday evening. His performance afforded much gratification. Señor Noronha will doubtless be heard elsewhere, when his talent will have a chance of being more largely appreciated. There was a good programme of vocal music, due to Signor Di Calsi, who was not only the accompanyist, but performed a solo of his own on the pianoforte. The singers were Miss Stabbach and Mr. Walter Bolton. Signor L. Paggi played a solo on the flute.

Mr. Charles Salaman's Pianoforte Soirees.—The first of a series of three of these entertainments was given on Saturday last, at Mr. Charles Salaman's residence, Baker-street. Messrs. H. C. Cooper and Hancock, as violin and violoncello, assisted Mr. Salaman at the piano, and Madame Newton Frodsham was the vocalist. Mr. Salaman contributed the largest share of the programme, supplying no less than five pieces out of eight. Of these, three were songs, and two were pianoforte compositions. The Morceau de Salon, "Una Fantasma," perhaps exhibited Mr. Salaman's talent as composer and pianist in the best light. It was received with great applause. The principal classical pieces were Mozart's sonata in B flat, for pianoforte and violin, played by Messrs. Salaman and H. C. Cooper; Steibelt's sonata, for pianoforte solo, in E flat (dedicated to Madame Bonaparte), and Beethoven's trio in B flat (Op. 97), dedicated to Prince Rudolph, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, executed by Messrs. Salaman, H. C. Cooper, and Hancock. Steibelt's sonata was as good as a novelty, and is entitled to a place in any programme. It was well worth hearing, both on its own account as a work of art, and on account of the manner in which it was executed by Mr. Salaman. The feature of the evening, however, was Beethoven's magnificent trio, which had full justice done to it by Messrs. Salaman, Cooper, and Hancock. Madame Newton Frodsham's singing gave the greatest satisfaction. The rooms were thronged.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25th, 1854.

The long pending action brought by Mr. Lumley against Mr. Gye, on account of Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, has at length come off. The Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday and the two following days, was crowded to excess by persons in some way or other connected with the operatic and musical world. The interest taken in the proceedings was very great, but much stronger during the examinations of the three principal witnesses—Dr. Bacher, Mr. John Mitchell, and Mr. Frederick Gye (defendant)—than when Sir Frederick Thesiger and the Attorney-General were addressing the Jury. On Wednesday, Lord Campbell "summoned up" the whole of the evidence, pro and con, in his usual laborious and comprehensive manner. Three questions were put to the consideration of the Jury:—did the agreement between Lumley and Wagner remain in force when Gye was accused of having persuaded Wagner to violate it?—did Gye persuade Wagner to violate her agreement with Lumley, and did Wagner break it in consequence of Gye's persuasion?—did Gye, supposing him to have persuaded Wagner to violate her agreement with Lumley, know, while in the act of persuasion, that Wagner's agreement with Lumley was still in existence? These three questions, in which lay the gist of the matter, were answered by the Jury—the first two in the affirmative, and the last in the negative. The verdict was consequently for the defendant.

With regard to the justice of this verdict we have nothing to say. There was evidence enough on both sides, the speeches of the advocates were long enough, and the summing up of the Lord Chief Justice was elaborate and minute enough, to lay the case before the jury in the clearest possible manner. After hearing the whole of the proceedings from beginning to end, however, without missing a word that was said on either side, we obtained a somewhat less definite idea of the respective positions of plaintiff and defendant than we had before. The evidence of Dr. Bacher threw a great deal of darkness on the matter; while that of Mr. Mitchell, who, in order to magnify the pretensions of Mdlle. Johanna Wagner, made out that Mdlle. Cruvelli and the other members of Mr. Lumley's company were not worth a sou, was, we thought, quite beside the purpose, and extremely unreasonable. Mr. Mitchell was led into another great mistake, when he stated that the "chief prima donna" of the very prosperous year of 1851 was Mdme. Sontag. One who took so large an interest in Her Majesty's Theatre cannot have forgotten that the season of the Great Exhibition was that in which Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli made her first appearance (after an absence of three years); he cannot have forgotten her success in Beethoven's Fidelio, nor how often that masterpiece was played during the season; he cannot have forgotten that Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli was the very last to remain at her post, and that she was the constant attraction to the public until the close of the theatre, on the 12th of October, nearly two months later than the ordinary period for bringing the operatic season to an end; he cannot have forgotten that the extra nights, at cheap prices, which brought so much money to the treasury, in the months of September and October, could not possibly have taken place but for Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli; these, and many other things to the same purport, Mr. Mitchell cannot have forgotten. It is, therefore, singular, that he should have altogether ignored Mdlle. Cruvelli, in his cross-examination on Monday. Even in his enumeration of the programme for 1851 ("a good season") he omits her name; while in that for 1852 ("a bad season") he recalls it. Why did Mr. Mitchell leave her out of the "good season," of which she was the chief attraction, and introduce her into the "bad season," which, he well knew, was no fault of hers. There is what, at first sight, appears to be a curious anomaly in Mr. Mitchell's evidence. In his cross-examination we find the following answers:—

"The non-appearance of Miss Wagner was very calamitous to the theatre. There was no demand for boxes at all. We could not let them at all. I lost more than £5,000. It was the most disastrous season I ever knew. It has always been my practice to take boxes by nightly lettings. I have usually paid about £1,500 on that account. In 1852 they did not amount to £20. This arose from the depression arising from the non-appearance. I was also a subscriber to Covent-garden in 1852 for £3,400. I remember the night of the first announcement of Miss Wagner. It was the 24th of April. There was a very great demand for boxes on that night—more than we could meet. I applied to Mr. Gye and obtained some boxes, and learnt that the rest were all let. We did not take that night at Her Majesty's Theatre above £30. My lettings at Covent-garden might have been £200 if Miss Wagner had appeared."

In 1852 the whole of Mr. Mitchell's nightly lettings to Her Majesty's Theatre "did not amount to £20;" and yet on the night of the 24th of April, £30 was taken—i.e. £10 more on one night than for the whole of the season. We are aware there must be a confusion of the subscription of "£15,400" with the sub-letting from night to night; otherwise there is no explanation. We are very sorry for Mr. Mitchell's losses; for there is not a more spirited or estimable gentleman in his walk of life; but we cannot help thinking that his confidence (like that of Mr. Gye) in an unknown singer, about whose qualifications the most opposite descriptions were given, by persons who had heard her in Germany, was, to say the least of it, unwarranted. On this point, however, we do not presume to admonish, or affect to console, Mr. Mitchell. Our quarrel is with that part of the evidence, which, in magnifying the attractions of the embryo idol, Johanna Wagner, was a manifest injustice (unintentional, we are sure) to Sophie Cruvelli, who is, and always has been, a better singer.

In whatever light, however, the evidence may be regarded, the case has been virtually decided in favour of the defendant, who will, on the other hand, be compelled to pay two-thirds of the costs—no trifle, we surmise. Had we been among the jury we should have proposed a verdict for neither party—since, while both are to be compassionated, both are evidently to blame. The unhealthy and debasing "star" system was the origin of the whole affair; and we feel thoroughly convinced, that, so long as that prevails, so long as that is allowed to influence managers in their policy and conduct, no theatrical establishment can possibly be fixed on a solid foundation, no theatrical speculation carried out with ultimate chances of success. "A flash in the pan" may now and then come off; but, after that, all will again be darkness and obscurity. What ruined Her Majesty's Theatre? Was it the opposition of Covent Garden? Certainly not—it was the triumph of Jenny Lind. For that triumph everything else was sacrificed. The ballet was sacrificed—the ballet, which had helped the theatre to its fortune; the chorus and the orchestra were neglected—since whether they were good or bad mattered little, so long as the "Nightingale" still charmed the multitude by her warbling; the other principal singers were wounded in their self-esteem, and abandoned to their ill humour. Their salaries were paid, it is true; but to those who have the heart and spirit of true artists, a salary paid is nothing when weighed in the balance with talent despised. At that particular time all was quenched in the overbearing light of Jenny Lind; nothing else was seen or cared for, and the blood, and life, and energy of the direction were spent in ministering to the importance of this one Divinity, at whose shrine the best and most lasting interests of the theatre were sacrificed.

But as Jenny Lind came, Jenny Lind went also. There was an end, as there was a beginning. Her coming was a joy; her going was a sorrow. When she was gone, it was time to consider what was to be done. Mr. Lumley looked around him, and saw only desolation. He saw his once beloved ballet in ruins! He saw disorganization in every department, but nowhere the means of revival. He tried one thing after another; but without success. He engaged an excellent company—as good as it ever was with Jenny Lind—but there was no longer the excitement. Another fever could not be induced by any manner of inoculation. The public were insensible and torpid. Placards were now no more to them than placards—as to Peter Bell a tree was nothing more than a tree. The old enthusiasm had burnt out, and nothing remained but ashes, cold and grey. There was no longer any poetry in the public. A Prussian thrush,* of ripe years, was brought forward; but it was of no use; her note, though a sweet one, was not like the note of the "Nightingale." At least so thought the public, who had grown old, and from whose grass the "splendour had departed." The thrush was succeeded by a sky-lark, who soared into the clouds of song;† but it was of no avail; the note of the sky-lark was not like the note of the nightingale, in the estimation of the public; and the sky-lark was as great a (pecuniary) fiasco as the thrush. In short, to get up a new excitement for a singer was impossible.

A quarter of a century must go by before another such a furore as the Lind furore can by any means be raised. The atmosphere of enthusiasm is fairly used up, and must have time allowed it to replenish, before it can be brought to bear again in the matter of endemics.

* Mdme. Sontag. † Mdme. Lagrange.

When managers shall find out that the most solid basis of success is the general efficiency of their establishments, they may have a better chance of lasting prosperity. But the Star system must absolutely be got rid of, and the preposterous salaries of singers—who are in many cases better paid than judges, prime ministers, and archbishops—brought within reasonable compass. Without this it is sheer folly to calculate on the chance of theatrical speculations yielding anything but vexation and ruin to those who embark in them. The receipts, including the subscription, of the Royal Italian Opera, in 1847, its first season, amounted to £52,000; and yet there was a deficit! Need another word be said to show how monstrous is the system?

For our own parts, strongly sympathising as we do with Mr. Lumley, in his misfortunes—and to Mr. Lumley the public owe no small debt of gratitude for the magnificent entertainments he provided—we are heartily glad that the attempt at creating a new "Dog Star," to outshine all the other luminaries in the Operatic heaven, has totally failed. At the same time we must avow our belief that Mdlle. Johanna Wagner would never have answered the expectations the public had formed of her; and that the lady herself, more than any one, has cause to rejoice in the misunderstanding which prevented her from risking the depreciation of that fame which she had undoubtedly acquired in her own country, but which it is more than probable she would have failed to maintain in another. As far as Mdlle. Wagner is individually concerned in the matter, not as an artist, but as a maker of bargains, we must candidly own that her behaviour does not entitle her to the respect and consideration of the English public.

THE following paragraph appeared in the last number of a weekly contemporary:—

"MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC GOSSIP.—A contemporary has stated that the sum of £1,200—being the proceeds of the Mendelssohn Concert, given in Exeter Hall five years ago, with the aid of Mdlle. Jenny Lind, in aid of the establishment of Mendelssohn scholarships—has been remitted to Germany with that intent. This is an entire mistake, no such remittance having been made; because (so far as the English trustees have heard) no step has yet been taken in Leipsic in serious furtherance of the object for which the English concert was given, at the instance of the prime Leipsic mover of the affair. For some signs of earnest life and co-operation we believe the English Committee have waited;—perhaps, too long,—even allowing for the notorious manner in which such affairs are apt to be procrastinated in Germany, after the first impulse and glory of self-illustration have subsided."

This, instead of extenuating the conduct of the committee, only shows it in a more blameable light. The money, as we have been lately given to understand, was placed by the trustees in the Bank of England, where it has lain ever since—nearly six years. By this most inexplicable proceeding, instead of accumulating, the original sum remains exactly what it was at the beginning! Meanwhile it may lie in the Bank of England still another six years, for all the trustees or the committee seem to care. The committee have been grossly at fault. They undertook the affair originally as a tribute of respect to Mendelssohn, of whom they were all personal friends—some of them most intimate friends; and for that reason, if for no other, having undertaken it, they should carry it out. As the matter stands, it is a mere farce—a mockery, indeed, both of Mdlle. Lind and of the illustrious musician who is no more. What have the committee to do with the "notorious procrastination" of the Leipsic people? Do they wish to emulate it by similar procrastination on their own side? If the Leipsic professors are indifferent to the foundation of a Mendelssohn Scholarship (which it is natural to infer they must be), let the scheme be taken out of their hands, and be carried on elsewhere.

For the negligence of the trustees it is difficult to find an excuse. Had they been a bit more active and zealous than the Leipsic people, the £1,200 might have increased by this time to a considerably larger figure—which would have been so much the more gained in "serious furtherance" of the very useful object which was professedly in view. The committee were to blame, almost as much as the trustees, for having allowed so evident an advantage to be lost sight of by the former; and both are to be reprehended in an equal degree for their apathy and carelessness, in a labour which should have been to all of them one of duty and of love.

We must not allow this matter to rest. If the committee are determined to continue inactive, we shall take an early opportunity of suggesting to them, that the money in hand should be forthwith transferred to Mdlle. Lind—minus the terms of Mr. Benedict, the conductor, and those of the singers and instrumental performers who gave their gratuitous services at the concert, under the impression that they were contributing their quota towards the institution of a tribute of respect to the memory of the great and lamented Mendelssohn.

DRAMATIC.

Princess's.—The liberality and taste which, since Mr. Charles Kean undertook the direction, have characterised the revivals at the Princess's Theatre are well known. The manager obtained universal praise for his spirit and enterprise, and all London was attracted by the splendour and completeness of the performances. That Mr. Charles Kean was determined to uphold the legitimate drama was shown in the productions of King John, Macbeth, and Sardanapalus. To magnificence of the scenery, appointments, etc., and perfection of details, was joined a special regard for the text of the author, which seemed to declare that Mr. Charles Kean was resolved to act upon the principle carried out by Macready at Covent Garden and Drury Lane, and subsequently by Mr. Phelps at Sadler's Wells. When, therefore, the tragedy of Richard the Third was announced at the Princess's Theatre, we could hardly have supposed that it was intended to revive Colley Cibber's adaptation, instead of Shakspere's play. In the bills of the performance, Mr. Charles Kean states the reasons which have induced him to prefer Colley Cibber to Shakspere: they are as follows:—first, Shakspere's text has been pronounced, by the greatest ornaments of the stage, less fitted for representation than almost any other acted play of the poet; secondly, the tragedy as modified by Cibber, being rather a condensation than an alteration, has been pronounced one of the most skilful instances of dramatic adaptation ever known; thirdly, David Garrick, Henderson, the classical John Kemble, Cooke, and Edmund Kean all preferred Colley Cibber's play to Shakspere's. The first of these reasons has been set aside by the revival of Richard the Third at Sadler's Wells, without the slightest assistance from Mr. Colley Cibber. About the second reason, we have something more to say.

"Colley Cibber's adaptation is better fitted for the stage than Shakspere's play," says Mr. Charles Kean. We are not of his opinion. For argument's sake, however, we will allow that the prefix of the last scene but one of the second part of Henry the Sixth to Richard the Third, is pardonable, inasmuch as Richard the Third is a sequel to Henry the Sixth, and the funeral of King Henry, which takes place in the first act of the former, brings the action of the two tragedies in close approximation. We also allow that there may be sufficient reasons for dispensing with Queen Margaret and her long speeches; perhaps, too, for omitting Clarence, as he only appears in part of Act I., although we are thereby deprived of one of the finest dialogues and speeches in the play. We might even go so far as to overlook the alteration of the tent scene in Act V., seeing the difficulty of bringing upon the stage two tents, supposed to be some distance apart. But how can we pass by the violation to Richard's character, the interpolation of two scenes, which, not only have no relation to the play and do not advance the story in the least, but are direct contradictions to Shakspere's text, and utterly worthless in themselves. Every touch of Cibber disfigures Shakspere, Non nullum tetigit quod non desecravit.

The poetry and grandeur of Richard vanish before him. Witness the second scene with Lady Anne, which would find a more fitting place in George Barnwell or Jane Shore, than in one of Shakspere's plays! Witness the so-called "great" tent scene in the last act, in which Richard is made a coward, scared at his own shadow, and terrified by the sound of a human voice. Where is Cibber's authority for this? Richard, frightened by terrible dreams, starts from his couch, and calls aloud incoherently; but no sooner does he wake, than his fear is controlled:—

Give me another horse—bind up my wounds—
Have mercy, Jesu—soft; I did but dream.
O coward conscience—how dost thou afflict me!

It is evident that Colly Cibber misunderstood this passage, as he misunderstood the whole character of Richard. Hear him also:—

Give me another horse—bind up my wounds—
Have mercy, heav'n! Ha! soft; 'twas but a dream!
But then so terrible it shakes my soul!
Cold drops of sweat hang on my trembling flesh,
My blood grows chilly and I freeze with horror!
Oh! tyrant conscience! how dost thou affright me?
When I look back, 'tis terrible retreating;
I cannot bear the thought, nor dare repent.

On this alteration, Warburton thus comments:—

"O coward conscience,"—this is extremely fine. The speaker had entirely got the better of his conscience, and banished it from all his waking thoughts. But it takes advantage of his sleep, and frights him in his dreams. With greater truth and force, therefore, he is made to call it "coward conscience," which dares not encounter him while he is himself awake, and his faculties entire; but takes advantage of reason being off its guard, and the power of the soul dissolved in sleep. But the players, amongst their other innumerable absurdities in the representation of this tragedy, make Richard say, instead of "O coward conscience!" "O tyrant conscience!" whereby not only a great beauty is lost, but a great blunder committed. For Richard had entirely got the better of his conscience; which could, on no account, therefore, be said to play the tyrant with him.

Innumerable absurdities, indeed! Richard, speaking of himself, says:—

"I, that have neither pity, love, nor fear."

And this is the whole cue to his character. Colley Cibber, however, makes him as subject to fears as Macbeth, by which he altogether destroys the individuality of Gloster, and the intention of the poet. But this is not all. According to Shakspere, Gloster's love for Lady Anne was entirely assumed: but Colley Cibber would not have this on any account. In the shamefully interpolated scene with Lady Anne, Richard tells her that "he loved her once, but had outlived his liking." Where did Colley find authority for this? Throughout the whole play, Cibber not only proves that he mistook the character of Richard the Third, but takes the greatest possible pains to prove his own inferiority to Shakspere, as a dramatic poet, to demonstrate how Shakspere might be improved in ideas, figures, and classical allusions; how all the elevation and felicity of his diction was capable of amelioration; how much better he (Cibber) understood the world of nature; how much more deeply-versed in the subtleties and vacillations of the human heart. There are scarcely ten consecutive lines of Shakspere, in Colley Cibber's version, upon which he has not laid impious hands. Verse after verse is altered and spoiled; the most exquisite thoughts are weakened in the effort to obtain what Cibber considered dramatic force; and a whole speech is turned upside down, or inside out, for no other reason than that he thought it inappropriate. We could fill columns with extracts, to show how miserable are the Cibberian attempts to purify and strengthen Shakspere. We shall, however, quote one passage from the original play, which has been altered, to let the reader see what havoc has been made with the text, and how entirely devoid was Cibber of all feeling for lofty and imaginative poetry. The king, addressing his troops before the Battle of Bosworth Field, is interrupted by the drum of the enemy, and thus continues :—

Fight, gentlemen of England! fight, bold yeomen!
Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head!
Spur your proud horses hard, and ride in blood;
Amaze the welkin with your broken staves!

Enter a Messenger.

What says Lord Stanley? Will he bring his power?
Mes. My lord, he doth deny to come!
K. Rich. Off with his son George's head!
Nor. My lord, the enemy hath pass'd the marsh;
After the battle let George Stanley die!
K. Rich. A thousand hearts are great within my bosom;
Advance our standards, set upon our foes!
Our ancient cry of courage, fair Saint George,
Inspire us with the spleen of fiery dragons!
Upon them! victory sits on our helms!

The whole of this magnificent and stirring scene has been re-written; and not one word of the last four lines is retained. Besides this, after Norfolk suggests the delay of young Stanley's execution until after the battle, Richard is made to answer :—

After the battle be it, then.

Such quiet and natural expressions, which abound in Shakspere, and, perhaps more than anything else, make his poetry so often quoted, could not be supposed to pass scatheless through the ordeal of Colley Cibber's imagination. We accordingly find many instances of this sort of meddling in the acted play of Richard the Third. One example will suffice. Richard, calculating upon the chances of his succeeding to the crown in consequence of the death of Clarence, and the expected dissolution of the King, interrupts himself by saying :—

But yet I run before my horse to market.

Cibber alters this to:

I count my spoils before the field is won.

We have said enough, we trust, to show that Cibber has not improved Shakspere; and that he has entirely mistaken the character of the Duke of Gloster. We know nothing in the history of literature more unaccountable than the popularity which the altered play has maintained for so many years.

The third reason expressed by Mr. Charles Kean for his preference of Cibber to Shakspere is not without weight. Precedent is a great matter, and the example of Garrick, Kemble, Cooke, and Edmund Kean, is entitled to respect. But, as a lover of Shakspere, and as one who had already effected so much towards the establishment of the legitimate drama, we expected in Mr. Charles Kean undeviating reverence for the great dramatic poet. We thought that on finding it impossible to represent Richard the Third exactly as it is written, while retaining Cibber's scenic alterations, he would at least have preserved the text. Nothing could have been easier. Mr. Kean himself could have supplied the version.

Of the performance and the getting up of the play we cannot speak too highly. Mr. Charles Kean has studied the character of Richard thoroughly, and, even through the mist of Colley Cibber, contrives to present a spirited and faithful delineation of the crooked-backed tyrant. The part is one which requires extraordinary physical power and endurance. Mr. Charles Kean, however, sustained it to the end with unflagging energy. On the whole, Richard the Third is decidedly one of his most finished and artistic performances.

The costumes, appointments, and scenery are on the same scale of splendour and completeness which have distinguished former productions under Mr. Charles Kean's direction at the Princess's. The dresses are not only gorgeous and striking, but, as we are informed, are, for the first time, historically correct. The gravest authorities have been consulted, and there is no doubt that the spectator sees for the first time a direct counterpart of the costly garments and the flashing armour of the time. The scenery, it seems, is no less true to authority. Nevertheless, in this particular, Richard the Third does not afford the same scope to the painter as Macbeth or Sardanapalus. We particularly admired, however, the first view of Bosworth Field; and the tent scene of Richard, which is beautifully managed. But the most striking scenic effect is, perhaps, the throne room, when Richard appears in full court. The marches and counter-marches of the several corps of Richard and Richmond are remarkably effective; and the rushing off of Richard's troops to the fight is undeniable.

The performance was received with great enthusiasm, and Mr. Charles Kean obtained a special recall after the fall of the curtain. The theatre was crowded in every part.

Colley Cibber's Richard the Third will doubtless have a successful run, but, from the causes above named, we cannot augur for it the same brilliant career which has attended the revivals of King John and Macbeth.

MARYLEBONE.—The immense success which the Thirst of Gold continues to obtain at the Adelphi, has induced the management of this theatre to bring out a piece of the same kind, founded on the original French drama. The title of the version at the Marylebone is, The Struggle for Gold, and the Orphan of the Frozen Sea. The adaptation is by Mr. Edward Stirling. Of course great stress is laid on the scene of the frozen waters, which, properly managed, cannot fail to produce an effect. The scene is admirably done, considering the size of the stage, and the acting of Mrs. J. W. Wallack invests it with reality and truth. We have certainly witnessed no scene comparable to this until now at the Marylebone Theatre. Mr. J. W. Wallack was evidently determined to surpass all his previous efforts, to produce something novel and striking, and has succeeded. But the mise-en-scène and scenery alone are not entitled to praise; the acting throughout is excellent, and every part is well supported. Mrs. J. W. Wallack, as Laluna, produces a powerful impression. The plot of the piece is, perhaps, extravagant, but the situations are dramatic and the incidents striking; while the characters of the Mexican flower-girl and the Marquis are both interesting. We cannot help thinking that Uncle Tom's Cabin suggested in a great measure the outlines of this drama. Mr. W. Shalders plays a comic valet with good effect. This gentleman belonged to the Olympic company, under the management of Mr. Farren.

THE THEATRES IN PARIS.

AT the Théâtre des Variétés, a comedy-vaudeville, in one act, entitled Quatorze de Dames, by Messrs. Gabriel and Dupeuty, was produced for the first time on Friday, the 17th inst., with success. Madlle. Scriwaneck was especially applauded as Pallas, in which part (as usual) she represents successively four different characters On Wednesday, the 15th instant, a vaudeville in five acts, by Messrs. Guénée and Vachette, was played for the first time at the Délassements-Comiques, under the name of Les Petites Misères du Carnaval, and met with a very flatttering reception. At the Odéon, L'Honneur et l'Argent is still running. The principal attractions at the Vaudeville are La Dame aux Camélias, Les Filles de Marbre, and Louise de Nanteuil, which, in turn, constitute the entertainments at this theatre. It is reported that a performance will shortly take place at the Palais Royal for the benefit of M. Sainville's widow. A new vaudeville, entitled Un Homme qui a Peur, is in rehearsal. M. Levassor will play the principal part.

ACCIDENT AT THE CARDIFF THEATRE.—On Monday the 13th, at the Cardiff Theatre, during the combat between Macbeth and Macduff, in the play of Macbeth, Mr. Melville, who acted the part of Macbeth, had a piece cut out of his nose by the sword of his opponent.

CLAYTON-HALL.—The amusements furnished by Mr. Coleman, at this establishment, are attracting increased audiences. Masks and Faces, the Marionettes, with opera and singing, make an attractive bill of fare, added to very moderate prices. The house is one of the most comfortable places of amusement in Liverpool. Mr. Coleman proposes to have a cheap Saturday evening entertainment, weekly, for the working classes, on the plan in use at the Concert-hall, Lord Nelson-street, when the prices will be reduced one-half. On the 22nd instant, the performance will be for the benefit of the Infirmary.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—Handel's Judas Maccabæus was given, on Thursday evening, by Mr. Hullah's Upper Singing Class, supported by Mrs. Endersohn, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Forrington (late Miss Gill), Miss Freeman, Mr. Augustus Braham, and Mr. Frank Bodda, as principal vocalists. The oratorio was very carefully executed throughout, the chorus in many instances exhibiting unusual excellence. "Fallen is the Foe" was sung with a force and precision highly creditable to Mr. Hullah's pupils. The members of the Upper Singing School have evidently not been idle. The principal singers were all up to the mark. Mr. Augustus Braham was loudly encored in "Sound the Alarm," and Mrs. Endersohn and Miss Dolby gave the fine duet, "Oh, never bow we down," with admirable effect. The hall was crowded. This is not surprising, when we consider the nature of the entertainment and the cheapness of the admission. Mr. Hullah is on the high road to fortune. He conducted the performance with his usual ability.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—A third performance of Elijah drew another overflowing audience to Exeter Hall. The singers, Mr. Sims Reeves excepted, were the same as on the previous occasions. We never heard this accomplished tenor sing the two beautiful airs, "If with all your Hearts," and "Then shall the Righteous arise," more superbly. The audience, in spite of custom, could not refrain from applauding him.

Last night the Creation was performed. An interesting history and analyis of the oratorio, by Mr. Macfarren, was printed with the programme. Of this, and of the performance, more next week. The hall was crowded.

WEDNESDAY EVENING CONCERTS.—The last concert was on the 17th. The hall was very full, and Mr. Sims Reeves made his second appearance. The vocalists, besides Mr. Reeves, were Mrs. Newton Frodsham, Misses Rebecca Isaacs, Maria Simpson, Ransford, and Laura Baxter, Messrs. Young and Leffler. Mdlle. Madeleine Gräver was the pianist, and Mr. Richardson was the solo flautist. The directors appear to have discontinued those "operatic selections" with which they used to begin the concerts. It is, perhaps, as well, seeing that they could not do justice to them without an efficient chorus, the engagement of which would involve a serious additional expense. However, the audience of the Wednesday Evening Concerts are satisfied with variety, so long as the programme consists of good music sung by good artists. In this respect, little fault could be found with the selection of Wednesday. The names of Mozart, Spohr, Beethoven, Handel, Weber, and Donizetti, figured in the first part. The band played the overture to Jessonda, and the last three movements of Beethoven's symphony in D (Op. 36). Mr. Sims Reeves sang "Fra poco" (Lucia di Lammermoor), "Spirito gentil" (La Favorita), and "Di Pescatore" (Lucrezia Borgia). He was encored in all three, and it was difficult to say which of them he sang the best. The quartet in canon, from Fidelio, "Il cor, e la mia fè," was hardly done justice to by the Misses Simpson and Laura Baxter, Messrs. Young and Leffler. Mr. Young's voice has not sufficient power for concerted music with orchestral accompaniments. Miss Rebecca Isaacs sang the finale from the Sonnambula cleverly, as she always does; Mr. Leffler gave a good bold reading of "Non più andrai;" Madame Newton Frodsham sang Handel's "Softly sweet in Lydian Measure," with violoncello obbligato by Mr. Lovell Phillips; and Miss Ransford "Ocean, thou mighty Monster." Mdlle. Madeleine Gräver performed Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante in B minor, which, though one of his least known and most difficult pieces, has been frequently heard of late.

Mdlle. Gräver, on the whole, played it extremely well. We preferred the allegro con fuoco to the opening andante. The forte of this clever artist seems to lie in vigorous execution; not that she wants either taste or feeling, but that brilliancy is the chief characteristic of her style. What Mdlle. Gräver at present wants is repose—an important quality which she will doubtless do her best to acquire. She was very much applauded.

Mr. Sims Reeves sang only one piece in the second part; but he sang it twice. "Young Agnes," from Fra Diavolo, is one of the many songs which our great tenor sings to perfection, and it never fails to raise the enthusiasm of audiences.

One of the features of part second was the flute solo of Mr. Richardson. Mr. Richardson, a great and deserved favourite, is always applauded to the skies, or rather to the ceiling, and was applauded to the skies, or rather to the ceiling, on Wednesday night, and encored, of course. Among the remaining items of the programme, we would select for approval a very charming song, by Herr Molique, called "May," sung admirably by Mdme. Newton Frodsham, and repeated; the "Kate Kearney," by Miss Rebecca Isaacs, encored; an Irish song by Mr. Young, encored; and a fantasia on Roberto il Diavolo played by the band, with solos for Messrs. Lazarus, Barrett, and Baumann, on the clarionet, oboe, and bassoon. The band also performed the march from the Camp of Silesia, and the overture to Cosi fan tutti, with which the concert ended.

MENDELSSOHN.

ON the 26th of March, 1829, Felix wrote to Moscheles, from Berlin, an account of the performance of Bach's Passion Music. The proceeds of this concert had been generously handed over by the directors to the managers of two charitable institutions. In the letter alluded to, Felix told his friend of his intended visit to England, and we find him in London on the 20th of April following. His name was known already in the musical circles, since Moscheles, as conductor of the Philharmonic Society, had invited public attention to his rising genius, and the members of that body were eager to give him an honourable reception and a fair trial. We shall see that he did not visit England empty-handed. Besides a chorale in A minor, and a motet for sixteen voices, he brought his first stringed quartet in A minor. The overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream was performed for the first time in London, and repeated with great applause on the 13th of July, at a concert given by Henrietta Sontag. On this occasion, Felix and Moscheles played, from an unpublished score, a concerto in E major, for two pianofortes. A tour through Scotland, shortly after his arrival in England, suggested the thoughts of an overture to Fingal's Cave, or the Hebrides, which, I believe, was written in the same year, after his return to Berlin.* A curious story is told of this composition. His sisters asked Felix for some description of the cave. "Come, tell us something about the Hebrides." "I can't," said Felix; "it's impossible, except on the piano." He then seated himself at the instrument, and extemporized on those ideas which were afterwards condensed in the shape of an overture. In the May of 1830, Mendelssohn went to Weimar, and, after staying some weeks with Goethe, visited Munich, where Fräulein Delphine Schaurott happened to be giving concerts, and adding greatly to her reputation as a pianiste. Felix, who admired her playing, appears always to have felt a deep interest in this lady; and it is said he presented her with the song in Op. 19, "Bringet des treusten Herzen's Grüsse," which was composed at Rome. Hildebrand, Hübner, and Bendemann joined Felix in his journey to Italy, and he remained at Rome from the 1st of November to the April of 1831. During that period he set the First Walpurgis Night of Goethe to music,† and wrote the music to the 115th Psalm, several sacred pieces, three motets for the nuns of Santa Trinita, and the first volume of the Songs without Words. In the February of 1832, he went to Paris, to conduct his overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream. This was the third and, as far as I know, the last time in his life that he visited the French capital. He had been there with his father as a boy of ten years old, but neither the climate nor the people seem to have suited him. On the 22nd of April, he returned to London, bringing with him three most valuable manuscripts—the Walpurgis Night, the overture to the Hebrides, and the concerto in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra. The overture was played for the first time on the 14th of May. In the latter end of the month following, Felix was once more found in Berlin. During his absence from Germany, the office of director to the Vocal Academy at Berlin had become vacant, and Felix became an unsuccessful candidate for the post, which was given to Rungenhagen. This was probably a job of the "Dii minorum gentium," whose appreciation and judgment have been alluded to in a former number. But disappointment failed to crush the ardent and active Felix, who gave a series of concerts in aid of charitable institutions, and seemed bent on winning the good will of the Berlinese, if not by his genius, at least by his benevolence. A reward came soon, in the shape of an invitation to conduct the Düsseldorf Festival; and, Felix, after what had lately happened, acknowledged and accepted the compliment with gratitude. A new period in his life dates from his first stay in Düsseldorf. We have already sketched what we shall call the first two periods in his career: that of his early years, and the second, which he devoted to travelling. The third, at which we have now arrived, convinced the world of his great original powers. He had hitherto contended with much opposition. It is sad to think of the uphill work and misgivings of heart which are inseparable from all great and persevering spirits. In Mendelssohn's case, I believe that the firm friendship of a faithful few did much to alleviate his toil and cheer him on. Possessed of this, he was comparatively callous to the fact that "the world knows nothing of her greatest men;" and his friends played their part nobly, in assuring all around them that Germany knew not the value of her son. At Düsseldorf, Felix joined the society of those artists who had travelled with him through Italy. They all welcomed him as an old companion; and Willhelm Schadow, who was the foremost among the number, became one of Felix's best and most intimate friends. Before, however, we follow Mendelssohn in this new sphere of action, we should not omit to mention another visit to London, remembering that the Düsseldorf Festival took place between his first and second journey to England in 1833. He arrived in London on the 25th of April, and in two days from that time composed, jointly with Moscheles, variations on the "Zigeuner Marsch," from Preciosa; this was played in public by the two composers on the 11th of May, and so often (it is said) had these two artists played and studied together, so familiar were they with each other's thoughts and expressions, that in private circles they not unfrequently extemporised together on the same instrument. On the 13th of May, Mendelssohn's symphony, in A major, was given at the Philharmonic Society.* On the 15th, the variations from Preciosa were repeated. After the Düsseldorf Festival, Felix returned to England with his father. On the 10th of June an overture, in C major, was introduced to the public, and, at this period, he showed Moscheles the manuscript of his beautiful overture to Melusine. A picture in Düsseldorf had suggested the subject of this music, which was given for the first time on the 7th April, 1834, and met with very qualified applause. It was performed again on the 8th of May following, at Moscheles' own concert, and was better appreciated than on the occasion of its first trial. Mendelssohn's reply to Moscheles, who wrote him an account of the earlier concert, is not without interest. He thanks him heartily for the zeal and care taken in introducing the overture to a critical audience, and owns modestly to self-satisfaction after Moscheles' favourable opinion of its merits as a composition. "Your encouragement," (he says) "is essential to keep up my spirits; distrust of my own powers would ensue if you failed to encourage me; your applause is dearer than ribbons and orders." He then gives some hints as to further improvement. The wind instruments must be kept under, and the leading idea in the overture be played ppp. "Without boisterous playing the whole overture will be a different thing: it will sound frischiger, and I shall be better pleased." Felix left London on the 25th of August, 1833, and took up his abode in Düsseldorf. At the great festival which introduced him as a conductor to the musical world at Düsseldorf, his Overture in C major, Handel's Israel in Egypt, the Overture to Leonora and Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, an Easter cantata by Wolf, and Die Nacht der Töne, by Winter, formed the chief features of the programme. Felix played Weber's Concert-Stück with great applause, and the directors were so satisfied with the success of the whole undertaking, that they induced him to consent to remain for three years, during which time he would be required to lead the weekly meetings of the "Singverein," the Winter Concerts, and also the music in the Catholic Church. An unlucky circumstance at this period deprived the world of a treasure which, we believe, would have been "for all time." Immermann, a friend of Mendelssohn's, had, at the latter's request, prepared a libretto for Shakspere's Tempest, which Felix longed to set to music; but the manuscript was declined by the musician, and, as no alteration was volunteered by Immermann, the whole project fell to the ground. What Felix would have made of this beautiful poem need scarcely be demanded by those who have heard his music to A Midsummer Night's Dream. Can we doubt that he, who understood Puck and his gambols as well as any Englishman living, would have written just as fairy-like strains for the dainty Ariel? The solemn Prospero, and sweet Miranda, too—what subjects for one who loved to write of the fairy world, and to heighten the interest of a romance with his own passionate music! The wild, the etherial, and unseen, "such stuff as dreams are made of," have been nobly treated in modern days, by two stars shining in the same sphere—Carl Maria von Weber, and Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.*

FOREIGN COPYRIGHT.—The appeal case of Boosey v. Jefferys, in the House of Lords, was terminated on Monday last. At the conclusion of the arguments, the Lord Chancellor announced the intention of the House to postpone judgment until it could have the assistance of the counsel of the whole of the learned judges. As their Lordships are about going upon circuit, it will be some few weeks before the decision will be given.

DRUMS.—The Earl of Glengall has made a present of a set of new drums to Mr. E. T. Smith, the lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, as an appropriate testimonial of his Lordship's admiration of Mr. Smith's system of managing and puffing the theatre. These drums were made by Mr. Henry Distin's patent, and are as noisy as could be possibly desired—so loud, indeed, that they drown the sounds of the feeble violins of the feeble orchestra.

A HINT FOR ENGLISH LIBRETTISTS.—A publisher of the name of Krantz, at Gera (Saxony), has offered a prize for the best libretto for an opera. One hundred and forty competitors have already entered the lists.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER VII.

(1775–1777.)

MOZART was now in his twentieth year. After having watched, with a kind of stupefaction, the growth of the prodigy, and seen genius spring up, as if of its own accord, before reason and knowledge were developed in the head of the young contrapuntist—who at one moment would extemporise on a given theme, and at another ride round the room upon his father's walking-stick—Europe now beheld him, a mere youth, enter upon the career of dramatic composer with brilliant success, make the most splendid offerings at the shrine of music, and adorn with his creations all its branches, rivalling in fame the greatest masters in every department of the art. Europe looked upon him, and asked herself, whither this precocity in the several stages of life, this extraordinary childhood, this spring enriched with the fruits of autumn, this haste disturbing the whole order of nature—as though time itself was fearful of leaving something undone—could ultimately lead. A few steps more, and Mozart would approach the limits of the possible. Having already done all that is expected from mature age, what would there be left for him to do when he attained it? Was he to rest stationary?—or was there reason to fear that his sun might set as rapidly as it had risen to its zenith? In arts which have not yet reached perfection, that only appears possible which is already known; and all that was then known Mozart had learnt and exhausted. In the eyes of his contemporaries, therefore, he necessarily seemed to have reaped the best part of his harvest; but, truth to say, he had not even commenced gleaning in the fields reserved for music of a later period. The early efforts of Mozart found so much favour, simply because, in every branch of composition, they reflected, with rare felicity, the favourite models of the age. In reality they were but studies, destined to vanish before such perfect types, as Music, alone among the arts, did not possess, and with which it was the mission of Mozart to present her. The astonishing rapidity with which he advanced to the fulfilment of that mission, may be laid to the account of a strange and terrible fatality. Eight centuries had awaited the coming man; and he came but to be snatched away in the prime of life! Ah! why did he wander from the flower-strewn path, his early triumphs opened for him? But for that he might have been the rich, admired, respected well-fed Capellmeister at some Royal or Imperial court, a Knight of several Orders, and I know not what besides. Instead of dying of his music, he would, probably, have survived it, and have spared me the trouble of writing his biography after twenty others had undertaken the task before me.

As a proof of the high opinion entertained of the works of our young composer by the most competent judges at that period, and how far he was himself from overrating his own merits, I will here give a letter addressed by Mozart to Father Martini, with the Padre's answer:

"Salzburg, 7 September, 1776.

"The esteem and respect which I entertain for so worthy a person as yourself induce me to intrude a weak specimen of my composition for your examination. Last year I wrote for the Carnival at Munich a comic opera—La Finta Giardiniera. A few days previous to my departure, the Elector expressed a desire to hear a contrapuntal work of mine. I was, in consequence, obliged to write this motet in all haste, and to have a copy made of the score and vocal parts for his Highness, in order that it might be performed on the following Saturday, as an offertorium, during Grand Mass. Dearest, best Father! I heartily entreat you to give me freely, and without reserve, your opinion of it. We only live in this world to progress, and this we can the more easily do when one enlightens another with his ideas—although in the arts and sciences there ever remains something more for us to learn. How often do I wish I were near you, that I might talk with you and communicate my thoughts! I live in a country where music is not held in very great esteem. But, although many have left us, we still possess some excellent artists, thorough-going, scientific, and elegant composers. We have no men sopranos, and are not likely to have any, as they insist on being extremely well paid, and liberality is not one of our failings here. I occupy my time, nevertheless, in writing and composing for the Church and the Chamber. There are two other contrapuntists here—Michael Haydn and Cajetan Adlgasser. My father is Capellmeister at the Cathedral, so that I have an opportunity of writing as much as I like for it. Since, however, my father has served this court for thirty-six years, and knows that the Archbishop does not like old people, he troubles himself very little about musical performances, and has adopted the literature of the art as his favourite study. Our church music is very different from that of the Italians. A mass with 'Kyrie,' 'Gloria,' 'Credo,' Epistle-Sonata, Offertorium, or Motet, 'Sanctus,' and 'Agnus Dei,' even when the Prince himself reads the service, must last, at the longest, only three quarters of an hour. For compositions of this description a peculiar course of study is necessary: and yet the score of the mass must include every kind of instrument—even military trumpets! 'What!' you will exclaim. Yes, indeed, dearest Father! Oh, how delighted I should be to tell you a very, very long story. I send my most humble respects to all the members of the Philharmonic Society, entreat you more heartily than ever to extend to me your goodwill, and never cease lamenting that I am at such a distance from one whom, of all men in the world, I most love and honour."

It is impossible not to recognise true modesty in this artless language, even, without remembering that the writer of the letter, who had always rebelled against the first principle enforced by education and society, was a good example of the proverb: Only fools and children speak the truth. Mozart, though not a fool, was, in many respects, a child all his life. He confessed as freely, and with as much naïveté, that he stood in need of Father Martini's advice and approval as he afterwards displayed when declaring, without hesitation, that he was himself, in his own opinion, above the judgment of his contemporaries. But there are two other points in this letter worthy of notice—first, the indifference, bordering on contempt, with which the archbishop treated the elder Mozart; second, the strange conditions imposed by that prelate on the musicians who performed service in his cathedral. We shall shortly become better acquainted with this prince of the Church, who had about as much understanding for music as consideration for the merits of artists. At present, I shall content myself with having adduced merely one of the obstacles that militated against our hero's aspirations in the sphere of sacred music, his decided genius for which was not thoroughly demonstrated until the close of his career.

Subjoined is Father Martini's answer:—

"I received the motet, together with your agreeable letter. I have read your work, with interest, from beginning to end, and I tell you in all sincerity, that it pleases me very much, for I find in it all that modern music requires: good harmony, good modulation, appropriate use of the stringed instruments, a natural flow in the vocal parts, and a skilful development of the ideas. I am extremely glad to find you have made such progress in composition since I had the pleasure of hearing you play the pianoforte in Bologna. Continue to practise unceasingly. Music, of all arts, requires the most arduous exercise and study."

If this letter bore a different signature, it would not be worth much; its style, indeed, is very dry, when compared with the frank and hearty communication of Mozart. But we must not forget that Father Martini was seventy years old; that antiquarian and contrapuntal researches had engrossed his entire attention through life, and that all this did not tend to make him easily susceptible of enthusiasm. Nor must we overlook the important position which the learned Father occupied, nor with what respectful submission musicians applied to him for counsel. Great masters, like Jomelli, for example, on the pinnacle of fame, humbly solicited his advice; an approving line from his hand was worth the most pompous academical diploma; in short, as we have already said, he was the musical oracle of his time. Of this Father Martini was aware, and, on that account, every word he uttered was weighed and considered in advance. His verdicts were not taken in the light of ordinary compliments; each word had its value. Father Martini sometimes praised, but never found fault. In pronouncing judgments, he bore in mind that the phraseology of law should be clear, concise, laconic, and as free from hyperbole as from circumlocution. Considered in this light, his letter to Mozart appears what it really was—a certificate, and one the most flattering and complimentary that was ever shown by a musician as voucher for his acquirements. Father Martini pronounced the motet to be without fault; which, from such a man, signified a great deal more than any ordinary praise he could have bestowed; since compositions were not submitted to him that he might point out their beauties, but that he might direct attention to their defects. He disclosed the secrets of counterpoint, and did not pretend to endow musicians with the gift of genius. A question, however, presents itself, as to what the Bologna critic meant by saying that Mozart's work contained all that modern music required. Did he allude to the general character of the period—the style of writing adopted by the men of the day, or rather of the hour—and the fashionable caprices of the moment? Most decidedly not. To theorists and scholars, this verdict must suggest a far wider interpretation. It will serve to intimate the whole progress of the Past and Present, the whole distance traversed by art, the point, in short, beyond which nothing for the present can be seen. It is thus we must estimate the value of a testimonial written and signed by Martini.

Our hero and his father, who, as we know, were at this time in Munich, felt in no hurry to leave a town where they had been received so well. Many other reasons, moreover, attached them to the place. Nevertheless, they were obliged to return to their miserable Salzburg; and scarcely had they entered the gates of the archiepiscopal city ere Wolfgang's services were put into requisition. The archbishop was expecting a visit from an illustrious personage—the Archduke Maximilian, Elector of Cologne—and Mozart was ordered to compose a Dramatic Serenade, Il Re Pastore (The Shepherd King), to celebrate the solemnity of his arrival. Although the work was very hastily written, it obtained a brilliant success, and a critic of more recent times placed it above everything the composer had previously written.

PARIS, Feb. 24.—(From our own Correspondent.)—There is but one topic of conversation in musical circles at this moment. Need I say it is the new opera of Meyerbeer, L'Etoile du Nord, which was received so triumphantly at the Opéra Comique, in presence of the Emperor and Empress, and the largest and most brilliant audience ever assembled within the walls of that theatre. Next week you shall have full particulars.

BRUSSELS.—On the 15th inst. Alexandre Dumas' new play, La Jeunesse de Louis XIV., which, as our readers are aware, had been prohibited by the Censure in Paris, was produced for the first time at the Théâtre du Vaudeville. It was a great stroke of good fortune for the theatre to be thus enabled to offer something quite new; and, as a natural consequence, the crowd was immense. The success of the piece was never for a moment doubtful. The ideas of the author were perfectly carried out by the artists to whom the principal parts were allotted. We must particularly mention Julien Mary, who was entrusted with the character of Molière. The other principal parts were supported by Duchêne, who, as Louis XIV., exhibited a large amount of zeal and intelligence; by Romainville, who had made a perfect study of Cardinal Mazarin, and by a lady, who did all she could with that by-no-means attractive personage, Marie de Mancini. The other parts were carefully played; and this was all the public had a right to expect, considering that the company had, on this occasion, stepped completely beyond its accustomed limits.

COLOGNE.—On the 13th January, the Choral Union of Male Voices, the "Polyhymnia" gave a concert, which was very well attended; and on the 5th inst., Madlle. Clauss played several of Mendelssohn's compositions in the Hôtel Disch, with the greatest success.

IBID.—On the 17th January, Mlle. Wilhelmina Clauss again played in the Hotel Disch, in the presence of the élite of this city. She performed some compositions of Mendelssohn and Chopin, and created quite an enthusiasm.

VIENNA.—Vieuxtemps gave his seventh concert on the 12th of February. He played the "Devil's Sonata" of Tartini, a prelude by Bach, and Paganini's Moto Perpetuo, besides his own Norma variations on the 4th string, and Arpeggio Caprice. Herr Stockhausen sang some lieder of Mendelssohn and Schubert, and in one of the latter "Wohin" ("I heard a Streamlet") was encored. The brothers Hellmesberger gave an evening quartet concert on the 12th. The selection comprised Mendelssohn's E major quartet (Op. 44), Hummel's pianoforte quintet in E flat minor (Op. 84), and Beethoven's violin quintet in E flat (Op. 4).

BERLIN.—On the 27th January, the Princess Charlotte of Meiningen gave a chamber concert, at which the court pianist, Dr. Kullak, and Herr Sulot, violinist from Meiningen, assisted. Herr Sulot created quite a sensation in a fantasia of his own composition.

IBID.—A Matinée was given, on the 29th January, in the Salle of the Opera House. The singers were Mesdames Tuczek, Bock, Johanna Wagner, and Köster, etc. Particular interest was created by the singing of Madame Tuczek, in Lindpaintner's lied "Das Märzveilchen" ("The March Violet").

MILAN.—A new serious opera, entitled Ottavia, the music by Gualtiero Sanelli, was produced at the Scala on the 11th inst., with moderate success. The principal singers were Mesdames Clara Novello and Brambilla, Signors Carrion, Corsi, and Nerini. Ottavia is not likely to have a long run. Rossini's Mose in Egitto is in rehearsal, and will be brought out shortly, with Signors Corsi, Carrion, Nerini, and a new prima donna, Signora Arga. A new comic opera, by Dominiceti, is also in rehearsal. The tenor, Signor Luchesi (who is re-engaged this season for the Royal Italian Opera in London), will make his first appearance in Cenerentola.

STUTTGART.—Herr Waldhauser has been heard in a concert in the unusual combination of pianist and violinist. Ernst has given three concerts here, to crowded audiences. At the first, their majesties the King and Queen of Wurtemburg were present. Ernst is now in Frankfort.

TRIESTE.—(From a correspondent).—Balfe's Bohemian Girl, under the Italian title, La Zingara, was brought out for the first time at the Teatro Grande, on the 12th instant. It was eminently successful, and will no doubt run to the end of the season. The principal singers were Signora Valesi, the tenor Mazzoleni, and the basses D'Ettore and Della Costa. These artists are, I suspect, unknown to you, and will not, I think, set London on fire for some time to come. Nevertheless, they were very zealous, and did Balfe good service. It was curious to English ears, to listen to the music of the Bohemian Girl, written for the Drury Lane company, interpreted by singers, who, probably never heard one English ballad. It certainly would not have satisfied a London audience. But Balfe's music carried everything before it, from first to last, by the force of its own attractions. I must do the band and chorus justice. They were excellent throughout. The encores were numerous; and, among others, the Gipsy Chorus, the Prayer in Act I., the dream of Arline ("I dreamt that I dwelt"), her duet with the tenor, the quartet, another ballad, the finale of Act II., the "Fair Land of Poland" (Scotland here!), and the final rondo. Balfe was summoned on the stage at the end of each act, and during the performance, sixteen times in all, with acclamations of applause. A success more decided, or a verdict more unanimous, was never obtained. The Italian libretto is exceedingly well made. The Bohemian Girl will soon have gone the round of Europe. From here, Balfe proceeds almost immediately to Milan. He is a confirmed wanderer from his native land.

LEIPSIC.—The fame of Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss continues to increase. The further this charming pianiste penetrates into Germany, the more decided is her success, and the more original the style of its manifestation. The director of the Conservatoire invited Mdlle. Clauss to be present while the pupils were practising. When they had concluded, Mdlle. Clauss sat down to the piano, and ran her fingers over the key-board with the rapidity, grace, and vigour for which she is distinguished. At the termination of each performance, the professors and students who were present cried out, like so many children, "More! more!" The fair artist executed, in this manner, sixteen or seventeen pieces, all of which were rapturously applauded. Mdlle. Clauss met with a similar reception at the Gewandhaus concerts, although the Leipsic public, accustomed to hear the most eminent artists, is very difficult to rouse into enthusiasm. After the last concert, two serenades were given her—one by the Pauliner Singing Society and the other by the members of the Conservatoire.

VERCELLI.—Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore was produced here on the 7th. The English tenor, Mr. Charles Braham, the Nemorino, was very successful. Mdlle. Marietta Ballerini was the Adina, Signor Sacconi the Serjeant, and Signor Marchelli, Dulcamara.

ELBERFELD.—A "Congress of German and French Composers" has been announced to be held in this town in the course of the summer.

BREMEN.—Capellmeister De Barbieri is about to leave this place to fill a similar post at Rio Janeiro.

THEODOR KULLAK, of Berlin, the composer and pianist, will visit London in the month of May.

---

ST. JOHN'S WOOD.—On Tuesday evening, the last of the St. John's Wood Subscription Concerts took place at the Eyre Arms Tavern. Messrs. Blagrove and Forbes played a sonata by Fesca, for violin and piano, and the latter gentleman also took part in a duet for harp and piano with Mr. Wright. Sims Reeves sang three times, and was encored in "Young Agnes," Auber's celebrated serenade. Miss Ransford gained much applause by her singing of Donizetti's polonaise "O luce di quest' anima," and the ballad "Sweet Mary of the Vale." A harp solo (on national airs) by Mr. Wright, and a violin fantasia by Mr. Blagrove, with many other attractions, rendered the evening very agreeable.

LEIGH.—On Friday evening, the 10th instant, the Atherton Choral Society gave their annual concert in the Assembly Room, at the King's Head Inn, Chowbent. Mr. Plimmer performed on the accordion and flutina. Mrs. Lansdale, the organist of St. John's, presided at the pianoforte. After the concert there was a ball.

PROVINCIAL.

CHELTENHAM.—In speaking of Mdlle. Montignani's recent concert, the Cheltenham Examiner expresses itself thus warmly:—"We have to congratulate Signora Montignani on the success of her concert at the Assembly Rooms, which was honoured by the attendance of a full and fashionable audience. It is unnecessary here to enter into a detailed critique of the performance; but we may observe that the audience were exceedingly pleased with the bill of fare provided for them, the encores being frequent and unanimous. Sig. Piatti, in his violoncello solos; Mr. Blagrove, in his variations; Mr. Alfred Pierce, in his ballad; and Miss Dolby, in hers; each received a recall. The pianoforte performance of Signora Montignani commended itself to all admirers of brilliant execution, and fully established her as a mistress of the instrument which she professes. The caprice "La Jeune Mariée," composed by herself, will, no doubt, become a favourite."

IBID.—(From a Correspondent.)—A morning concert was given at the Assembly Rooms on Saturday, the 18th inst. The artistes were, Miss Arabella Goddard, Mdme. Amedei, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, M. Sainton, and Mr. Land. The gem of the concert was Beethoven's sonata (dedicated to Kreutzer) for piano and violin, which was executed in a pure and faultless style by Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton. Although occupying not less than half an hour, it was listened to with the utmost attention throughout. Miss Goddard's solo from Maritana being encored, she substituted Stephen Heller's arrangement of Mendelssohn's air, "On Song's bright Pinions." This young lady's talent is of the highest order. Mdme. Amedei's contralto was heard to advantage in Mercadante's cavatina, "Se m'abbandoni." Mdme. Weiss, in "Dove Sono," acquitted herself well; and Mr. Weiss, in Mendelssohn's "I'm a Roamer," achieved his accustomed success. M. Sainton's solo, on the "Standard Bearer," was unanimously redemanded. The quartet from the Siege of Rochelle, "Lo, the early Beam," was likewise encored. The concert gave general satisfaction.—"Musical Recitals," more characteristically called, in London, Chamber Concerts, have been held for several weeks past at the private residence of Mr. Evans, Bath-buildings. Every Saturday a large number of amateurs from Cheltenham assemble to listen to the performances of a class of musical compositions seldom, if ever, heard in concerts provided for the amusement of mixed audiences. On Saturday week, quartets of Mozart and Beethoven, a duet of De Beriot's, a pianoforte concerto of Mendelssohn's, and a concertina concerto. Mr. Evans plays the violin, and his son, Master W. Evans, performs on the concertina. Mr. Sebastian Bach Mills was the pianist, and Mr. R. Blagrove performed on the concertina. During Lent, Mr. Evans contemplates giving selections from oratorios, etc.—The gentlemen amateurs gave another performance at the Royal Old Wells, on Thursday evening week. Mr. Jarth recited a prologue before Miss in her Teens, and Captain J. F. Slegg delivered an epilogue. Both produced much amusement.

MANCHESTER.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The seventh concert of the Classical Chamber Music Society took place on Thursday, the 16th instant. The first part commenced with the pianoforte trio of Beethoven in E flat, the first among his published works. This trio derives peculiar interest from that very circumstance; and, although possessing little of that remarkable individuality of style which became manifest in succeeding productions, is no less a masterly composition, a model of form, and a treasure-house of melody. The sonata, by the same composer, in A, for pianoforte and violin (Op. 30), which followed, was finely played by MM. Molique and Hallé. The second part opened with Herr Molique's pianoforte trio in B flat (Op. 27)—a work worthy of that gentleman's high reputation—which was worthily performed by the author, with M. Hallé and Signor Piatti, and received with great favour. Piatti, in his own fantasia for the violoncello, on airs from Linda di Chamouni, astonished his hearers by his feats of execution. His phrasing was as graceful as his mechanism was wonderful, and the applause was loud and unanimous. M. Hallé was also applauded when he came on the platform to give his pianoforte selection, which comprised one of the Songs without Words by Mendelssohn, the extraordinary presto movement in A, from the Seven Characteristic Pieces (Op. 7) of the same composer, and the lachrymose romance by Henselt, entitled Poème d'Amour, which, though last in position, was by no means first in esteem. M. Hallé played these pieces with his accustomed skill.

OXFORD.—On the morning of February 2, Mr. T. Ions, M.B. of Magdalen Hall, and organist at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, performed an exercise for the degree of Doctor in Music, in New College Hall, which was thronged with ladies and members of the University. Sir H. Bishop, as Professor of Music, presided; and the Vice-Chancellor was represented by the Warden of New College, one of the pro Vice-Chancellors. The composition was one of great merit, and all the parts were sustained with effect, the choristers from New College, singing-men from other colleges, and University amateurs, taking the vocal, and the members of the Oxford Choral Society, with some assistance from London, the instrumental.

LEEDS.—(From a correspondent.)—At the People's Concerts on Saturday, the 11th instant, the Recreation Society introduced the Beale party, at present making a tour in the provinces: consisting of Miss Arabella Goddard, Mdme. Amedei, Mr. and Mrs. Weiss, M. Sainton, and Mr. Land. The hall was filled in every part, although the prices were raised. Miss Arabella Goddard played several pieces, and was encored three times. The Leeds Mercury says, "Miss Arabella Goddard made her first appearance before a Leeds audience, and was the great attraction of the evening. It is impossible to speak in too high terms of this young lady's performance. She unites brilliancy and power with refined taste and feeling; and we have the greater pleasure in dwelling upon these characteristics, since popular taste has leaned so decidedly to the extravagant school as seriously to affect the style of our young artistes." The same journal speaks in hardly less enthusiastic terms of M. Sainton and Mdme. Amedei who were received in the most flattering manner. I need scarce tell you how Mr. Weiss sang, nor how Mr. Land accompanied. Mr. Spark conducted. The concert was entirely successful.

BRADFORD.—A concert was given in St. George's Hall, on Tuesday evening, and attracted a very numerous audience. The performers were Mdme. Amedei, Mdme. and Mr. Weiss, Miss Arabella Goddard, M. Sainton, and Mr. Land.

BATH.—The Orchestral Union from London gave a second concert in this city, on Saturday, the 11th, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon, and was assisted in the vocal department by Miss Fanny Rowland and Mrs. J. K. Pyne. The overture to Mendlessohn's Son and Stranger, Bethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and the overture to Guillaume Tell were played with great effect by the band. The Wedding March, from A Midsummer Night's Dream, also, was executed in the most complete manner, and brought the concert to an effective termination. Mr. H. C. Cooper received the warmest applause in a violin solo, and the ladies acquitted themselves well in their songs. The attendance was not what might have been expected, from the programme and the talent brought together.

CLIFTON—The annual Concert of the Orpheus Glee Society came off on Thursday week at the Victoria Rooms. The selection comprised three glees by Mendelssohn, and others by Kücken, Busse and Abt. There were also some English glees given.

WINCHESTER.—Two concerts came off last week at St. John's House, in which the orchestra was selected from the Italian Opera, Exeter Hall, and London Philharmonic Society. The vocalists were Mrs. Enderssohn, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. H. Phillips. The concert on Monday evening consisted of selections from Handel, Mendelssohn, Weber, Beethoven, etc. On Thursday evening, Handel's Messiah was given. This concert was more numerously patronised than the former. Both concerts were conducted by Mr. Alfred Mellon. To Mr. Conduit great credit is due for providing the inhabitants of Winchester with such a refined source of amusement.

THE CONSERVATIVE LAND SOCIETY.—MEETING AT READING.—A meeting of the inhabitants of Reading was held at the Town Hall on Monday evening, to receive a deputation from the Conservative Land Society, consisting of Viscount Ranelagh, Colonel Knox, M.P., H. Pownall, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Worthington, C. E. Lewis, Esq., G. Morgan, Esq., and C. L. Gruneisen, Esq. There was a large attendance; much interest being taken in the proceedings, in consequence of the approaching allotment of the Downshire Square Estate on the 1st of March next. Viscount Ranelagh presided. Colonel Knox, M.P., gave an interesting statement of the progress of the Society, and dwelt particularly on the valuable character of the estate purchased for the Society in that locality. It was called a child of his own, for he had urged it on the attention of his colleagues in the committee; and, looking at its most eligible site, its commanding, neat, beautiful, and noble prospect, the healthy locality in the best neighbourhood of the most influential town of Berkshire, he had full confidence in the result that his judgment was not mistaken. Mr. Pownall, in a very eloquent speech, dwelt on the great social advantages of the freehold land movement as affording a safe and profitable investment for the savings of industry. Mr. C. E. Lewis very ably described the working of the Society, and gave some interesting particulars with respect to the estate on the Castle Hill. It is situated within the limits of the borough, in the best part of Reading, the centre of the railway communication of the southern counties, and in a short time will possess three lines of railway to the metropolis. The Great Western railway station is not more than five minutes' walk from the estate. In the centre of the estate, space is reserved for the erection of a church. The whole had been most judiciously laid out in lots, varying in price from £50 to £325. The addresses of the speakers were listened to with much attention, and a vote of thanks was passed to the deputation for the information they had afforded.

MENDELSSOHN.

IN compliance with a general wish of the people at Düsseldorf, Felix, Immermann, and Uechtritz undertook a joint management of the theatre, which for some time past had dragged on a miserable existence, and seemed likely to fall into decay, from the incompetency of the directors, and consequent failure of support from the public. As "Mustervorstellungen," Felix revived Mozart's Don Juan, and Cherubini's Wasserträger, besides Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont. He himself wrote two choruses, a march, and music of a military kind for a play of Calderon's. (I am not aware of these pieces having been heard anywhere but at Düsseldorf.)* Matters now began to wear a more favourable aspect, and, to ensure further success, a committee was formed consisting of eleven members, who consented to Immermann's assistance in the production of plays, and to the superintendence of Felix in that of opera, and whatever incidental music might be required. Julius Rietz, a pupil and disciple of Mendelssohn, promised his able co-operation, and everything seemed to augur well for the "Stadttheater" of Düsseldorf, which was reopened with all pomp and circumstance on the 28th October, 1834. But there is a fatality attending theatrical managers and caterers for public amusement, which in this case blighted all the fair hopes and expectations which had been raised by the energy of Felix, and the help and goodwill of his associates. We grieve to record, that Immermann and Mendelssohn quarrelled, and involved in their unhappy dispute the complete downfall of the entire scheme. They were confessedly unable to manage the theatre. Felix was accused of prejudice and exclusiveness, in selecting his singers from Berlin, and the operatic party retorted to the effect that Immermann attached an undue importance to the histrionic performances, thereby depreciating the value of the opera. Objections and arguments of all kinds were the preludes to a final separation. Weber's Oberon was twice given by Mendelssohn, and this is the last we hear of him as conductor of the opera at Düsseldorf. The theatre supported itself with much difficulty till the year 1837.

* Of course the Leipsic folk know nothing about them.—ED.

Most of our readers are aware of the existence of a school of painting at Düsseldorf. The names of Overbeck and other distinguished fresco painters might be here mentioned with honour, as having in their early years studied at this place; and let us add, with pride, that Felix could use his pencil with more than average excellence, and availed himself of the advice and friendship of Schirmer, a professor of landscape drawing at Düsseldorf. Felix dedicated to Schirmer his music to the 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," and his friend Klingemann has in his possession an album with several drawings by the musician, who was fond of illustrating poetry with pen and pencil also. Moscheles, I am told, has several humorous sketches by Felix in his possession, and though I would not contend that the sister arts found an equally worthy representative in the subject of this memoir,* the facts are worth recording, as illustrating that versatility of taste with which Mendelssohn was undeniably gifted. The vocal institutions at Düsseldorf (the opera excepted) seem to have flourished chiefly in 1834, during the winter season, for we read of the performance of the Messiah and the Seasons, and other works of magnitude and importance; but the great event of this period was the composition of the greatest part of St. Paul: to this may be added the three Capriccios for pianoforte, Op. 33 (dedicated to Mr. Klingemann), several Songs without Words, the first volume of vocal pieces for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, and three national choruses (Volkslieder). The spring of 1835 found Mendelssohn on his way to Cologne, to conduct the festival, which was inaugurated with a performance of Handel's Solomon, with new organ accompaniments by Felix.† So heartily appreciated were Mendelssohn's good services, that the musicians presented him with the London edition of Handel's scores, as a slight but significant mark of their gratitude, and upwards of six hundred signed their names to a written acknowledgment of the honour paid them. Cities and towns seemed to rival each other in paying honour to the artist, whose name in Germany became the theme of every tongue, and Leipsic deputed some of the most influential members of her university to press on him the acceptance of a professional chair. Felix modestly declined the honour, on the plea of his incapacity for lecturing, and the experience of after years proved that this was a proper distrust of his powers, and no affectation. Nothing daunted at his refusal, they prevailed on him to take the management of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts, which was to date at the expiration of his engagement at Düsseldorf. He presided at a farewell concert in the latter place on the 2nd July, 1835, and then took up his abode in Leipsic, which became the scene of his noblest achievements. He lived there almost uninterruptedly from September, 1835 to 1844, and from 1845 to the day of his death. That this was a glorious epoch in the history of modern music, and that Leipsic might justly boast of her adopted son, are matters patent to all who have wished to know anything connected with the author of Elijah. His friends, moreover, and the whole atmosphere he breathed here, were admirably suited to favour and encourage him to persevere in his art. He found on his arrival great resources at his disposal, both orchestra and chorus comprising eminent musicians, amateurs and professional. Felix lost no opportunity of exalting the public taste and introducing a love of the highest classical music, and his influence, not confined immediately and exclusively to the society of which he was the leader, met with an abundant harvest, as the memoir will show. He was very conscientious in his selections of music to be performed before audiences of such acknowledged discernment; the oldest masters were not shelved, but the greatest works of each period were given in a series of historical concerts, so that the orchestra and listeners might become familiar with the noblest and best composers of all times. Here was a liberal-minded conductor, and the cheers which greeted him on the 4th of October, 1835, the first occasion of his leading the Gewandhaus Society, were something more than the mere vulgar applause which is bestowed on public favourites in ordinary. Artist and connoisseur, one and all, knew the value of their lately acquired treasure. The concert began with the overture, entitled Meerstille und glückliche Fahrt, followed by a scena from Weber's Ladoiska, and Spohr's violin concerto No. 11, with the introduction to Cherubini's Ali Baba. Beethoven's Symphony in B flat was given in the second part, and the precision and accuracy with which this great work was rendered commanded the immediate respect of the musicians, who had hitherto been conducted by Mathäi, the first violin player in the orchestra. He had won applause as a conscientious reader of Beethoven, but his successor's was the master-mind, and it would be unfair to draw comparisons of the earlier performances of this work with the one we are now dwelling on, which was always esteemed at Leipsic one of the happiest revivals under Mendelssohn's management. On the 9th of October, Moscheles appeared, and the two friends performed his duet Hommage à Handel on the 11th of that month, at a subscription concert. The delight of the audience knew no bounds. "Es wurde" (said one of the papers) "von den beiden Freunden so feurig vorgetragen." We shall not give any further details of this series of performances, which continued to please all parties, and satisfy them of their wisdom in conferring the post of conductor on so active and zealous an artist. Felix now sustained a severe loss in the death of his father, Abraham Mendelssohn, who died at Leipsic about this time. We could wish to know something more of the son of so illustrious a father, and father of so illustrious a son; though it is not to be wondered that the wisdom of the philosopher and genius of the musician should have eclipsed the inobtrusive piety and worth of a private individual in the eyes of the world. But let it be recorded to the honour of the elder Mendelssohn, that his practical benevolence was the means of alleviating his own son's sorrow, when that son was left fatherless, not friendless. It will be remembered by our readers that we stated in an earlier number that Ferdinand David was born at Hamburgh, in the very same house where Felix first saw the light in 1809. Ferdinand lost his parents at an early age, and was adopted by the elder Mendelssohn, in whose house he received the chief part of his education. This circumstance naturally brought the two boys together, and both evinced proofs of remarkable powers at a very early age. David practised on his violin, and was first introduced to the public at Hamburgh, his native place; but the real harvest of his triumphs was reaped in Berlin, where he had accepted an appointment in the orchestra of the Royal Opera House. This celebrated pupil of Spohr followed his vocation afterwards in the chapel of a wealthy private gentleman in Dorpat, and, after a separation of many years, we find him restored at a painful time to the friendship of his earliest and most devoted friend. On the death of Mathäi at Leipsic, in the February of 1836, David succeeded to his place, and has continued to hold this distinguished position in the Leipsic orchestra ever since. Thus the two friends met again, and I think it fortunate for the world that they did so. Griefs of a private nature weigh heavily on those who find a solid comfort in domestic sympathy, and the activity of a great man's mind, which has been proof against the scorns and caprice of the world, has often succumbed and yielded to the pressure of private sorrow. Mendelssohn had not yet fulfilled his mission, and he strove with a manly energy to forget his loss in the prosecution of his duties; while his friend was close at hand to cheer and assist him. The season of 1835 witnessed the production of several standard classical works, and Mozart's compositions seem to have been brought out with especial care. Of Mendelssohn's playing that master's concerto in D minor, the Leipsic Journal spoke in the following enthusiastic terms:—"Die von ihm (Mendelssohn) beigegebenen Cadenzen, vorzüglich die erste, waren wie natürlich aus Themen des Concerts verbunden und im Flusse neu erhöheter Mechanik kunstreich ausgeführt, so dass man es ein Concert im Concerte nennen konnte."

On the 11th of February, the memorable symphony on Schiller's song. "An die Freude,"* was revived. The preparation of this stupendous work is a severe task to any musician wishing to do Beethoven full justice in the interpretation of his magnificent music; but Felix had excellent materials to work with; and, confident of success, the symphony was performed to his own satisfaction, which is a sure guarantee for that of others. Nothing now could exceed Mendelssohn's activity and zeal in and apart from the actual duties of his office at Leipsic. He joined David Graban and others in a quartet association, and on one occasion played the tenor part in an octett which he had composed in early days.† Nor did he neglect his composition, since we find that his oratorio of St. Paul, which he had begun in Düsseldorf, was this winter completed at Leipsic, and the vocal parts were immediately forwarded to Julius Rietz, who put the work into active rehearsal for the approaching festival at Düsseldorf. On the 8th of May, 1836, Felix arrived at the early scene of his crosses and triumphs, and, on Whit-Sunday, the 22nd of May, St. Paul was performed. The solo singers were Fischer-Achten, Graban, Schmetzer, and Werfing, and the oratorio was received with decided approbation, to the delight of the author, and the anxious witnesses of his trial, Mendelssohn's younger brother, and the accomplished Fanny Hensel, who knew and felt her brother's power. Of these three members of a happy circle, two have been taken away, the eloquent and gentle brother,

> "And she who at his side sat listening by,
> And thought to strains like these 'twere sweet to die"—

she, too, is gone!

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The Twenty-first Annual General Meeting of this Society was held at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening, the president, John Newman Harrison, Esq., occupying the chair. There was a full attendance of members.

The Hon. Secretary opened the proceedings by reading the report of the Committee. This document, which was of considerable length gave a detailed account of the operations of the Society during the past year. The following extracts from the report detail several points of interest which presented themselves:—

The number of subscribers continued increasing as was best shown by the following statement of the numbers at the close of each of the three last years, viz.—

——— 1852,——750.
——— 1853,——838.

During the year there had been twenty concerts given by the Society, eleven of which were subscription performances.

The Committee have the pleasure to inform the members that the performance of the Messiah, for the benefit of the Royal Society of Musicians, on the 22nd of April, 1853, was more than ordinarily profitable to that Institution.

Of late years, the concerts of that Society, when held at the Hanover Square Rooms, have entailed an annual charge upon its funds. In 1852, for the first time the Sacred Harmonic Society rendered assistance at the first performance of the Royal Society, in Exeter Hall, when a profit of £80 3*s.* 9*d.* accrued, while in the year just passed the balance in favour of the Society amounted to the unusually large sum of £288 19*s.* 4*d.*

The Charity Concerts given by the Society in its early career were very frequent, but, as one in the Large Hall, for the benefit of the Shipwrecked Mariners' Institution, in July, 1837, although under royal and distinguished patronage, resulted in considerable loss, the Committee, notwithstanding they were guaranteed the amount, rather than let the charity suffer, defrayed the loss from the funds of the Society, but resolved that they would not undertake to give charitable performances for the future, unless under special circumstances, nor unless its promoters could give such assurances of success as would make the issue profitable to the charity, and thus justify the Committee in calling for the co-operation of the members and assistants.

Acting upon this view of the case, since 1837, with the exception of the concerts of the Royal Society, the only charitable performances given by the Sacred Harmonic Society have been the following, viz.:—

The Messiah, 8th of July, 1842, for the Distressed Manufacturers' Fund, realizing a profit of £213 14*s.*

The Creation, 14th of June, 1847, for the relief of the Distress in Scotland, realising a profit of £1,102 10*s.*; and

St. Paul, 7th of June, 1850, for the building of King's College Hospital, which produced a profit of upwards of £1,000.

The Committee fear that it is too much the habit of committees of charitable institutions to resort to the musical profession for gratuitous services in aid of the several objects they have in view. The Sacred Harmonic Society, however, having music as its object, and the helping of its professors being a part of that object, they do not feel themselves at liberty to solicit gratuitous services from any professor. Equally chary are they in pressing the amateur portion of the Society to undertake assistance without really good results are likely to follow; and the Committee therefore feel it their duty to point out to the promoters of charity concerts, that, as it is not right to expect the members of the profession to forego their due reward for services, neither is it right to take advantage of the labours of amateurs, without the promoters of the charity exert themselves to secure such an amount of support as would make the performance sufficiently profitable to repay the trouble undertaken in its behalf.

The Committee have had under their consideration the practicability of making arrangements for holding occasional meetings for the practice of Vocal Music (other than that particularly required to be rehearsed for the Society's performances) when with a limited number of selected voices, pledged to punctual and regular attendance, such an amount of study and preparation should be given to the music practised as would induce the nearest possible approach to perfection.

The Committee greatly deplore that the necessity still exists for repeating the regrets which were expressed in the last Annual Report, as to the insufficiency of the means of ingress and egress to and from the Large Hall. Backed by the resolution adopted at the last Annual General Meeting of the Society, the Committee have renewed with the most pressing urgency their appeals to the Directors of Exeter Hall, to remedy the great deficiency which attaches to the building, and which might at any moment be productive of most serious consequences; but without attaining the desired result. The Committee have observed, with much satisfaction, that not only other occupants of the Hall, but nearly every one of the newspapers and public journals accustomed to notice the meetings which are held there, have joined in expostulating against the continuance of so crying an evil, and it is most sincerely to be hoped that complaints which are so general and so frequent, being at the same time so well founded, may ere long have their due effect upon the Directors and Proprietors of the Hall.

The accounts for the year ending at Christmas last, have, at the request of the Committee been carefully examined and audited, as usual, by three of the members, who were nominated at the last Annual General Meeting, viz., Mr. Fredk. Wm. Willcocks, Mr. Alexander Durlacher, and Mr. Matthew Mason. From the abstract which has been signed by these gentlemen, and which is appended to this report, it appears that the aggregate receipts and payments of the year were as follows, viz:—

RECEIPTS.

| Balance in hand at Christmas 1852 | 152 | 12 | 11 | | | |

Upon this statement it may be observed, with regard to the Receipts, that both the subscriptions and the proceeds of the Concerts amounted to considerably more than in the preceding year. The increase in the subscriptions was upwards of £286, and on the proceeds of Concerts upwards of £820; at the same time it should not be forgotten that in the preceding year the Receipts under both those heads were much above what had previously been usual.

With respect to payments, it may be mentioned that independently of the expenditure for Concerts, for rent, and for other ordinary purposes, several important items relate to purchases which are in the nature of valuable property to the Society; these are purchases for the library; purchases of music for the orchestra; office furniture, etc., amounting together to about £330; in addition to which, the accounts show that an actual profit in money has been realized during the year to the amount of £227 0*s.* 1*d.*, (the balance in hand at the commencement of the year having been increased at its close from £152 12*s.* 11*d.*, to £379 13*s.* 10*d.*); so that, taking both descriptions of property into account, the profit realized during the last twelve months may be set down at above £550, which is £100 more than the highest amount ever gained by the Society in one year, with the single exception of the Exhibition year, 1851.

The amount of property of which the Society is possessed at the present time, independently of the cash balance at the bankers, may be stated to be as follows:—

| | £ | s. | d. | £ | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 3 per Cent. Consols ... ... | 800 | 0 | 0 | | | |
| 3½ per Cent. ... ... ... | 750 | 0 | 0 | | | |
| | | | | 1550 | 0 | 0 |
| Estimated value of Library, Stock of Music, Fittings, &c. ... ... ... ... | | | | 2150 | 0 | 0 |

Including the balance at the bankers the entire property of the Society (every claim against it to Christmas last being discharged) amounts to upwards of £4000.

The Committee have the continued gratification of reporting that the profits on the publication and sale of the books of words at the concerts of the Society during the past year have been found equal to the cost of the orchestral music required to be purchased for the performances during the same period. The profits in the year 1852 amounted to £149 0*s.* 10*d.*; in the last year they amounted to £152 1*s.* 2*d.*, bringing up the entire receipts from this source of income during the past six years to £888 19*s.* 0*d.*

The allusion just made to the publication of the books of words leads the Committee to notice an interesting feature which they have lately been enabled to introduce into some of those publications. Having been induced to believe that it would be a means of rendering good service in the promotion of musical knowledge and taste, if the books of words published by the Society could be accompanied with a judicious exposition of the composer's design in the music, and such comments as might assist persons attending the performances to a more correct appreciation of the work, the Committee applied to Mr. G. A. Macfarren, a gentleman whose extensive knowledge of the musical art and practised skill in criticism, pointed him out as eminently qualified for the purpose, and requested him to undertake to furnish for the book of words of the "Messiah" such an analysis of the oratorio as in his judgment might answer the object proposed. The result was the production of a book containing a comprehensive historical preface and an analytical commentary on the music, illustrated by musical extracts, which the Committee are bound to say fully realized all that they could hope for or desire, and has received the highest praise as well from public writers as from private individuals whose judgment on the subject is entitled to weight. In order to disseminate as widely as possible the advantages of such a production, your Committee decided that the publication should be sold at the same price (sixpence) as the former book of words, and the extensive sale which has since taken place affords a clear evidence of the public appreciation of the step which the Committee have taken. They will only add that Mr. Macfarren has subsequently, at their request, performed a similar task with respect to Haydn's "Creation," and that he has also undertaken for the Society a similar labour with regard to other standard works.

Within the last four months the Committee have received an intimation from their respected colleague, Mr. Joseph Taylor, that on account of his inability, from various causes, to attend personally to the more important duties of the office of Treasurer, in a way that the present magnitude of the Society's affairs required, he should, at the present Annual General Meeting, tender his resignation of the office which he has held in the Society during the past sixteen years, the intimation being accompanied with an assurance from Mr. Taylor that if in any other capacity he could serve the Society he should be most happy and desirous to do so, as far as he might be able.

This announcement has led your Committee to determine that Mr. Taylor's retirement from an office which he has so long held, should be marked by some expression of respect and kindly feeling on the part of the Society; and that, as he has proffered the continuance of his services in any other way that he may be able to afford them, it will be but a proper compliment to pay him to invite him to accept the office of Vice-President of the Society. Should this suggestion be acceded to, the Committee recommend the necessary alteration to be made in the rules in order to recognise the existence of such an office.

With regard to providing a successor to Mr. Taylor in the office of Treasurer, the Committee feel satisfied that they shall have the entire and cordial concurrence of the members in the suggestion that the most desirable person that can be found to invite to undertake the office, is their highly esteemed friend and colleague Mr. Bowley; to whose extraordinary merits the various portions and connections of the Society have recently borne the highest testimony, by the splendid and well-deserved Testimonial which was presented to him in acknowledgment of his great services to the Society in a variety of ways, and as a mark of personal esteem and regard. Your Committee, therefore, recommend that Mr. Bowley should be invited to accept it.

With equal satisfaction your Committee are prepared to suggest that the office of Librarian be offered to Mr. W. H. Husk. The experience which has long been had of Mr. Husk's peculiar suitableness for that office, and the readiness which he has at all times shewn to assist in the performance of its duties—of which a striking instance is afforded by the well arranged and interesting catalogue which he kindly prepared of the Society's library—point him out as the person who in preference to any one else should be invited to accept of the office of Librarian.

The Report and Accounts were unanimously adopted.

A motion was made and adopted, again urging upon the Directors of Exeter Hall the necessity of steps being taken to improve the means of entrance and exit, as an opportunity now presents itself of making additional fireproof staircases.

The various changes of officers were also unanimously agreed upon, and, after the re-election of those members of the Committee who retired by rotation, and the election of Mr. Milbourne to supply the vacancy in the Committee, the usual vote of thanks was passed to the officers of the Society, a special vote acknowledged the great value of the services of Mr. Costa, and the members separated.

THEATRES IN PARIS.

THERE has been very little novelty since our last. At the Théâtre Français, M. Bressant is becoming more popular every day. M. Provost's part in the Etoile has been allotted to M. Anselme. A new comedy, by Mdme. de Girardin, entitled La Joie fait Peur was to be produced, for the first time, on Saturday.—At the Odéon, a new three-act comedy: La Conquête de ma Femme, is in rehearsal.—A comic opera in two acts called Une Nuit à Seville, has been accepted, and will shortly be put in rehearsal, at the Théâtre Lyrique. The libretto is by two young authors, MM. A. de Beaumont and Charles Nuitter, and the music by a young composer, M. F. Barbier.—A new two-act vaudeville: Un Père de Famille, by M. M. Duvert and Lauzanne, has been successful at the Gymnase. The characters are sustained by MM. Villars, Lesueur and Geoffroy, Mdlles. Luther, Désireé and Judith Fereyra.—On Saturday, Mdme. Doche took her benefit at the Vaudeville.—Sainville's widow, also, had a benefit on Friday at the Palais-Royal.—A five act drama: L'Enfant du Régiment, is in preparation at the Ambigu-Comique.

SAINT DAVID'S DAY.—The Anniversary Festival Dinner of the Society of the Welsh Charity Schools took place on Tuesday evening at the Freemasons' Hall—(the 1st of March this year being on Ash-Wednesday). Earl Grosvenor officiated as President, supported by Lord Dynevor, The Bishop of Llandaff, Sir Watkyn Wynne, Sir T. Phillips, and others connected with the Principality of Wales. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Brinley Richards, who gave his services gratuitously. The vocalists were Miss Ransford, Miss Messent, Mr. Wrighton and Mr. Ransford. During the evening Mr. Cheshire, a pupil of Mr. Balsir Chatterton, played a solo on the harp, introducing some popular Welsh airs. Miss Messent and Miss Ransford sang a duet called "The Return," Mr. Ransford sang "The Sea Kings," and Mr. Wrighton was obliged to repeat his song, "Sweet Home." The collections during the evening exceeded 800*l*. The stewards of the day were Mr. Brinley Richards and Mr. Alexander Ridgway, each of whom added a donation of ten guineas to the subscription list. Among the many interesting events of the festival, we must not omit to allude to the procession of the boys and girls, educated by this Society, round the hall; and afterwards singing with considerable effect the "Ode" written for the occasion.

HERR VERRHULST, a composer of great eminence from Holland, is at present in London. The object of this gentleman's visit is to acquire as much information as possible about the traditions of Handel in relation to Israel in Egypt, and, if practicable, to obtain possession of the best additional accompaniments which are used at the performances of that oratorio in the metropolis and at the provincial festivals. We feel sure that Herr Verrhulst will receive every attention from our great societies, and from those musicians best able to advise him on the matter. Israel in Egypt is to be performed at the approaching great music-festival at Rotterdam, of which Herr Verrhulst is to be the principal conductor.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.—Last evening, Mr. Wrighton, a gentleman of some note as a drawing-room singer, essayed an entertainment illustrated by ballads both of yesterday and to day, under the title of Life and Song. The rooms were crowded. There is but little narrative introduced, and the chain which connects 'the song' of the entertainment is the assertion that poetry and song are the reflection rather than the fiction of 'life.' The selection of ballads shews a sound taste, and Mr. Wrighton's performance of them was without reproach. He possesses a pure tenor voice, and exhibits an unusual warmth of style. In the first part he sang two of Mr. Lover's ballads "The Road of Life" and "My Mother Dear"—an aria of Beethoven, and Haydn's canzonet, "She never told her Love." In the second (having an eye to what has been going on these last two or three weeks) he raised his hearers to an enthusiasm by a verse of 'Rule Britannia.' The whole audience joined in chorus with unmistakeable sincerity. What Mr. Wrighton had to read (and his remarks were aptly and gracefully written) might have been delivered, we think, with greater force and earnestness.

PROVINCIAL.

MANCHESTER.—(From a Correspondent.)—The first of a series of four performances of classical and modern pianoforte music took place at the residence of Mr. J. Thorne Harris, York Place, Higher Broughton, on Thursday evening, February 23rd, before a select audience. Mr. Harris was assisted by Herr Baetens, and some amateur vocalists. The following was the programme:—

Sonata—Piano and Violin—in F minor, Op. 4 (Mendelssohn). Vocal Quartet, "Rustling Leaves," Op. 39 (J. Thorne Harris). Sonata—Piano Solo—C minor, Op. 27 (Beethoven). Duo—Piano and Violin—"Andante Cantabile," in E. Op. 54 (J. Thorne Harris). Solo Violin—Herr Baetens (de Beriot). German Glee, "The Young Musicians," (Kücken). "La Cascade"—Piano Solo—(E. Pauer). Andante and Presto, agitato in B. (Mendelssohn).

The performances elicited the warmest applause from an audience accustomed to such music, and therefore critical. Mr. Harris's instrumental duo received an encore. It is written concertante, and the capabilities of both instruments are displayed. The vocal quartet is also a composition of merit. Mr. Harris's playing on the pianoforte, and that of Herr Baetens on the violin, were equally admired. The second performance is fixed for the 16th of March.

BRIGHTON.—A morning concert was given at the Pavilion on the 22nd ult., by Madame de Fauche, assisted by other artists. The Music Room was filled by a fashionable audience. The trio of Beethoven in B flat (Op. 97) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Madame de Fauche, Herr Molique, and Signor Piatti), with which the concert opened, was the gem of the concert. The solos of Sig. Regondi on the concertina, Sig. Piatti on the violoncello, and Mdme. de Fauche on the pianoforte, were all favourably received. Sig. Marras, who has just returned from his native country, created the greatest effect in his "Canti Toscani Nazionali," and the whole concert gave satisfaction.

LEEDS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The fourth and last concert of the Musical Union, for the present season, took place in the Music Hall, on Friday evening week. The members of the English Glee and Madrigal Union, consisting of Mrs. Endersohn, Mrs. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Lockey and Mr. Henry Phillips, were the principal vocalists, and the band, which included Messrs. Baetens, of Manchester, Haddock, of Liverpool, Mr. Carrodus, Messrs. Bowling and Haddock of Leeds, was placed under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Lucas, of London. Mrs. Endersohn sang "Softly sighs," from Der Freischütz, and took part in two duets. Mrs. Lockey sang twice, Mr. Lockey ditto. The band played the overture to Sollabella, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, besides accompanying (in an inefficient manner, by the way) several of the songs and duets. Mr. Baetens performed the Adagio and Rondo from De Beriot's third Concerto. The concert concluded with a performance of "Rule Britannia" by the band and all the singers.

LEICESTER.—The Messrs. Nicholson gave their Annual Benefit Concert at the New Music Hall, on Monday evening. There was a large attendance. The brothers were assisted, in the instrumental department, by Messrs. Maycock, Larkin, C. Harper, and Zerdahelyi; and, in the vocal by Madame and Signor F. Leblache, Miss Ursula Barclay, and Miss Fanny Rowland. Mr. Lohr was pianoforte accompanist.

BATH.—The tenth of the series of "People's Concerts" took place on Monday, and was well attended. Messrs. Darby and Whittaker sang some ballads, and the gentlemen amateurs some glees, etc. The German band commenced with the overture to Guillaume Tell, and for the first time played a new set of waltzes by Mr. John Bishop of Bath, which were encored. A violoncello solo, by Mr. Drew, a débutant, was very successful.

MR. WILLY.—This eminent violinist has returned from a provincial tour, in which he has reaped both honour and profit.

HARMONIC UNION.—Handel's Judas Maccabæus is announced for performance on Thursday next. Mr. Sims Reeves is engaged.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER VIII.

WE have now reached one of the most interesting periods of Mozart's history, namely, his last journey to France, the commencement of the numberless disappointments which fate had in store for him. Up to this time, we have known him only as an artist, the man himself having been scarcely perceptible. Always obedient to the strict and somewhat rough authority which had guided his childhood and early youth, Mozart possessed no will and displayed no activity except at his piano. His power was limited to choosing the notes and signs to be inscribed upon his ruled paper. But the time had arrived when the father's superintendence of his much-loved pupil was destined to come to an end. Wolfgang was now a young man, while Leopold Mozart, on the other hand, was growing old; it was, therefore, essential to procure some permanent appointment for the former. But where was this to be effected? In Vienna? No; for all the steps already taken in that city by Leopold Mozart, in furtherance of the desired object, had been abortive. At Salzburg, with the Archbishop? Wolfgang had already a place there; but what a place, and what a master! Besides, to Salzburg, if the worst came to the worst, he could always return. Eventually, Leopold Mozart directed his thoughts to Munich and to Paris—Munich, the scene of his son's latest and best-earned triumphs; Paris, the rendezvous of celebrated men of every description, who often adopted it as their home, where the Mozarts had left so brilliant a reputation, and where they flattered themselves they still owned more than one friend and patron. It was, therefore, determined that Wolfgang should try his fortune in one or other of these capitals. Whatever pain it gave his father to part from him, the urgency of the position made the sacrifice inevitable. The journey was a long one; and Leopold Mozart did not dare to think of accompanying his son this time, for fear of exposing himself to the anger of the Archbishop, who was greatly displeased at his frequent absence, and who might deprive him of his situation, which was of great importance to him, since he had learnt how difficult it was to obtain another. In his old age, he trembled for his bread, upon which, although it was rather flung than given to him, and was, too often, bitter to his taste, he could not absolutely positively reckon. Far-seeing old man!—what would have been thy feelings, couldst thou have foreseen that thy son, the pride of his country, the imperishable glory of his art, would be even less fortunate than thyself!—that, among the princes of Germany, he was destined to seek in vain for employment and subsistence!

At twenty years of age, Wolfgang might safely have gone alone to Paris; but Leopold Mozart feared that the sudden transition from a state of perfect dependency to one of absolute freedom might be dangerous. He therefore thought it best to prepare him for the change, by substituting, for the paternal authority, another less severe and imposing, which at the same time should evince an equal amount of interest in the well-being and happiness of his son. Wolfgang's mother was the new Mentor, charged with the task of accompanying him during his sojourn in a city where pitfalls would beset him at every step. The reader will easily believe that Leopold Mozart, on the point of parting for the first time from his beloved child, enjoined him to keep up an uninterrupted correspondence, and to make it as circumstantial as possible. The letters were to include a history of the entire journey, an account even of the most trivial occurrences, a detailed exposition of his relations with every person with whom he might have dealings, a statement of all his professional receipts, the bills at the inns, etc. Furthermore, in cases of difficulty, where the intelligence of a woman combined with that of a genius might still be at a discount, and led perhaps to pursue a course of which the calculating mind of the aged diplomatist in Salzburg would be unlikely to approve, Wolfgang was to write to his father for instructions how to act. This was a heavy task for Mozart, whose pen became dry in his hand when he had to write down anything but music. But Leopold had tutored his family so well, and Wolfgang, we may add, was so deeply impressed with the consciousness of all he owed his father, that the instructions were obeyed to the letter. To this obedience we are indebted for the existence of so many valuable documents, for the publication of which musicians should be ever grateful. Too happy to invest my narrative with the greatest possible interest by allowing our hero to take the place of his biographer, I shall let him speak for himself—not invariably, like Herr von Nissen, but when his words deserve to be considered by posterity, and, especially when they are likely to interest others besides his father, when they throw a new light on his character as a man, and suggest the means of analyzing his merits as a composer.

Wolfgang and his mother set out about the end of September, 1777.* Immediately after their arrival in Munich, Mozart proceeded to the residence of Count von Seau, the Court Intendant. Our hero, who was never apt at long circumlocutions, told the Count point blank that he had come to offer his services to the Elector, because he knew that the Munich chapel stood in need of a good composer. Had his former friend been with him, Mozart would certainly have couched his communication in different language. The Intendant admitted the truth of the assertion, so little flattering to himself, and advised Mozart to apply directly to the Elector, and, in case of being unable to procure an audience, to send in a written application. Other influential personages also promised to interest themselves with the Elector in his favour.

A Count Schönborn and his wife, a sister of the Archbishop of Salzburg, who happened at this period to be passing through Munich, were informed that Mozart had left the archiepiscopal service. They were surprised at this, but much more so, says Mozart, "on learning that I had only 12 guldens 30 kreuzers, of blessed memory,"—his annual salary as Concertmeister to the Prince-Bishop of Salzburg.

The steps taken by those courtiers who honoured or pretended to honour the young musician with their patronage, did not forward his interests very remarkably. One of these Mecænases—the Prince von Zeil—said to Mozart: "I think we shall not do much here. I have spoken to the Elector alone. 'It is too soon,' he replied, 'let him travel; let him proceed to Italy and get a reputation. I refuse him nothing; but, as yet, it is too soon.'"

Thus, Maximilian Joseph, a really enlightened and patriotic prince, and, which in the present case is more, a judge of music, knew nothing of the European triumphs of Mozart, but wished him to seek a reputation he had long acquired in that very Italy, where he was advised to go, as if he had been a mere tyro—so great were, at that period, the national prejudices, which conceded to foreign nations an exclusive and indisputable superiority in so many departments of human knowledge. In the time of Klopstock, Lessing, Herder, and Goethe, Gluck, Haydn, and Mozart, aristocratic and fashionable Germany thought that true literature and poetry were only to be found in French books, while Italian musicians seemed to them as necessary to conducting their operas as Swiss porters to watch at the doors of their mansions. The Swiss, however, might come from Franconia, Suabia, or Bavaria; but it was absolutely necessary that the Italian should be a bonâ fide Italian.

The Elector's answer did not discourage Mozart. He merely perceived an error which he thought he could easily rectify. Did he not possess the diplomas of Bologna and Verona, the certificate of Father Martini, and the scores of two operas, the great success of which had been fully described in the Milan papers? "The Elector does not know me," said Mozart, to one of the noblemen attached to the Court. "He is not aware of what I can do. Let him assemble the composers in Munich, let him summon others from Italy, France, Germany, England, and Spain; I will pit myself against them all."

In another part of the letter, from which the foregoing is taken, he says:—"I am greatly liked here, and should be still more so, if I could succeed in elevating the lyrical drama of my country as high as I feel I am capable." These passages are remarkable. The composer of the Entführung speaks with the presentiment that it is he who must establish the dramatic music of his native land; he feels power within him of entering the lists against any of the musicians of his day, and declares that he is the first composer in the world, with as little ceremony as if he was merely saying he had got a cold in the head. All the testimonies of his sojourn in Italy, and of the great things he had done there, were sent him by his father. When Count von Seau had examined them, he expressed great delight that an artist of such acknowledged talents intended to do Munich the honour of staying there, and, on taking leave, "His Excellency absolutely raised his nightcap." A few days later, Mozart was informed that there was no place vacant. He now perceived that, to become a capellmeister in Munich, it was necessary to boast of something more than a talent recognized by all Europe, combined with a great deal of candour. Once more, therefore, Mozart set out upon his travels, and proceeded to Augsburg. His father had recommended him to go to the Syndic of that town, whose acquaintance the good Leopold had formerly had an opportunity of making. A cousin of Mozart's, a respectable citizen, took him to Herr von Langenmantel—that was the great man's name—or, more correctly speaking, to his door, and waited for Wolfgang on the stairs.

"I did not fail," says Mozart, "to present papa's humble respects to his worship the arch-city-administrator, as soon as I entered. He graciously recollected everything, and asked me: 'How has the gentleman been?' I replied, directly: 'Thank Heaven, very well, and I hope that you, too, have been very well.' Becoming still more polite, he said 'You,'* and I, 'Your Grace,' as I had done all along. It is my custom always to behave to people as they behave to me. I find this to be the best plan."

When the Langenmantels, who, in spite of their little weaknesses, were very fond of music, heard Mozart extemporise, and play everything that was put before him at sight, they became wonderfully civil. The son offered to take him to the celebrated harpsichord manufacturer and organ-builder Stein, for whom, by the way, he had a letter of recommendation. Mozart, quite willing, conceived the idea of being presented to Herr Stein under the name of Trasom, a pupil of the pianist Sigl, in Munich. Herr Stein, taking the letter Mozart had given him, was about to break the seal, in order to know how to receive the bearer, when our hero stopped him and said, "What do you want to read the letter now for? Open the door, and let us go into the show-rooms; I am so anxious to see your pianos.' 'Very good, with all my heart; just as you like,' replied Herr Stein. I immediately ran up," continues Mozart, "to one of the three instruments in the room, and began playing. Herr Stein could scarcely open the letter, although burning with anxiety to know who I was; he only read the signature. 'Ah!' he exclaimed, embracing me, and greatly delighted."

Mozart was as much pleased with Stein's pianos, as Stein with Mozart's playing. Our hero's description of these instruments would, however, not be interesting, as they are at present to be found everywhere, and a great many additional improvements have since then been introduced.* Mozart now expressed a wish to play on the celebrated organ with forty-three registers, built by Stein for the church of the Carmelites.

"'How can a person like yourself,' said he, 'so good a pianist, desire to play upon an instrument possessing no tenderness, no expression, no forte nor piano, and always alike?' 'That makes no difference,' I replied, 'for my eyes and ears, the organ is the king of instruments.' 'Very good,' he answered, 'with all my heart.' We proceeded together into the church. I saw, from his conversation, that he thought I should not do much upon his organ, but merely play like any other pianist. He informed me that, at Chobert's request, he had taken him to the organ, 'and I was very fearful' (he said), 'for Chobert had told every one, and the church was rather full. Then, too, I thought: stop! the man will be all spirit, fire, and rapidity, and that will not suit the organ; but, immediately he began, I was of another opinion.' I said nothing but: 'What, do you think, Herr Stein, that I shall run wild upon your organ?' We came to the choir; I began to prelude, at which he commenced laughing. I then played a fugue. 'Ah!' said he, 'I can easily believe that you are fond of playing on the organ, when you play as you do.'"

From subsequent correspondence with his father, we learn how Mozart passed a day with some pious lovers of music in the cloister of the Holy Cross, and how he praises the hospitality of the good fathers, and gave fresh proofs of his rare talents as an extempore performer. After a symphony of his own composition had been tolerably ill played by the orchestra of the cloister, he executed two violin concertos, one of which was composed by himself and the other by Vanhall. A small harpsichord was then brought in. "On this," says our hero, "I preluded, and played a sonata with variations by Fischer. The others then whispered to the dean, that he should ask me to play as upon the organ. I told him to give me a theme, and, as he declined, one of the brothers gave me a subject. I took it for a little walk, and in the middle (the fugue began in G minor), I began in the major, something quite in the scherzo style, but in the same time. I then returned to the theme, reversed, however, and, lastly, conceived the idea of employing the subject of the scherzo as the subject of the fugue. I did not think long, but immediately carried out my plan, which suited the theme as exactly as if Daser had taken its measure.* The dean was enchanted. 'There is no use denying the fact; it is wonderful,' he said. 'I could never have believed that what I have just heard was possible! You are really and truly a man!'"

The reader will, doubtless, participate in the contrapuntal ecstacies of the good monk, although he may not, perhaps, succeed in exactly understanding how two themes, one in the major and the other in the minor, could blend harmoniously together, and be developed in a series of harmonies. A detailed explanation would take up too much room, and, after all, not prove intelligible to those requiring it. Let them, therefore, be contented with the assurance that the thing is possible, when the given themes are vechselseitig—or, at least, nearly allied. Another point to be observed, is: that the harmony produced by the mixture of the two must be altogether different from that of each of them singly. But, from inspiration alone, and as if it were mere child's play, to hit upon something which would have cost the most ingenious and learned contrapuntist a whole night's labour, followed by a headache the next day, proves the possession of incredible, superhuman, and marvellous superiority, no less than of indomitable will in our hero. Mozart was always indefatigable in his endeavours to please his auditors—or even one of his auditors. We shall presently have fresh proofs of this. Some one brought him a sonata treated like a fugue. Mozart said: "Gentlemen, this is too much; I cannot play this sonata in an off-hand manner." "Ah! I should think not," replied the dean with great eagerness, good-naturedly apprehensive lest his guest might mar his former success by the attempt. "That is too much; no one could attempt such a feat." "'I will try, however,' I continued—'I will endeavour.'" † How Mozart accomplished the task we are not told; we merely read that the dean, who stood behind him, kept continually exclaiming, "Oh, you cunning young rascal! Oh, you young villain!"

After giving a public concert in Augsburg, Mozart set out for Mannheim about the end of October. ‡

* We must bear in mind, that there was a great difference between the old harpsichord and the modern pianoforte, especially when both terms are used indifferently, as is at present the case. (In Germany.—Translator.) But although the harpsichord must be looked on as the predecessor of the piano, it is properly a separate instrument. Stein brought the piano to such a degree of perfection, as to obtain for it the preference over every other kind of harpsichord.—A. Schraishuon.

‡ Mannheim was then the capital of the Elector of the Palatinate. When the male Bavarian line became extinct, Bavaria, as we know, was united to the Palatinate. (To be continued.)

JENNY LIND.—According to the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung, Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt has been appointed Chamber Singer (Kammersängerin) to Her Majesty Queen Victoria. This is like hearing the first news from Vienna of Lord Palmerston's resignation, which caused so much astonishment some time since. If the Queen of England had conferred such a distinction on Madame Goldschmidt, it would surely have been published in London first, unless, indeed, the Earl of Westmoreland, who is not only a first-rate amateur, but an admirable musical diplomatist, got possession of the news by some extraordinary manœuvring of the electric wire.

MR. LESLIE'S "IMMANUEL"

A PERFORMANCE took place on Thursday night, in St. Martin's Hall, for the benefit of three excellent charities—the Governesses' Benevolent Institution, the Royal Society of Female Musicians, and the Choral Fund. A new sacred oratorio, entitled Immanuel, the music by Mr. Henry Leslie, which had been a long time in rehearsal, was produced for the occasion, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The band consisted of eighty chosen players, and the chorus, of two hundred singers, half professional and the rest from the Sacred Harmonic and other societies. Mrs. Endersohn, Misses Dolby and Amy Dolby, Messrs. Lockey and Weiss, were the solo vocalists. The proceeds of the concert being destined for charitable purposes, a heavy price was laid upon the tickets, namely, a guinea to subscribers, and twenty-five shillings to non-subscribers. This, which may account for the audience, though fashionable, being less numerous than is customary at the performances in Mr. Hullah's new music hall, was, we think, a mistake. The public will not pay a large sum to hear an untried work; and the benevolent object of the concert would have had a better chance of success if the charge for admission had been more reasonable.

Mr. Henry Leslie, the author of Immanuel, though an amateur and still a young man, has distinguished himself both as a vocal and instrumental composer. His last and best known essay at sacred music, a Festival Anthem, showed so much promise, that the announcement of an oratorio from his pen was hailed as an event of no common interest. The highest expectations were formed, and something was looked for by his friends and admirers that should not be merely ephemeral. These anticipations have not proved altogether unfounded. If Immanuel be not a perfect composition of its class, it is at least one that is entitled to the respect of musicians, and if not an inspiration of genius, it cannot be denied that it is a work of more than ordinary talent. Mr. Leslie has no need to ask for indulgent criticism, under the plea of being an amateur. He has studied too deeply, and has acquired too much knowledge for that. He is no amateur, no dabbler in the art for mere amusement, but an artist, and a very accomplished one. Not many English composers have attempted so laborious and difficult a task as the composition of a sacred oratorio; and, among those who have, few have succeeded so well as Mr. Leslie in the present instance. He has written a work of which he has reason to be proud, and which contains quite enough to show that he is able and likely to achieve still greater things.

In the choice of his subject, Mr. Leslie has foregone the advantage of the dramatic form. He has taken no story, like St. Paul, or Elijah, or any of the oratorios of Handel founded on Biblical history; nor—except that the Saviour is introduced, preaching the Sermon on the Mount, and the Widow lamenting the death of her son, and afterwards rejoicing at his miraculous restoration—are there any sustained characters, like Adam and Eve, in Haydn's Creation. The oratorio of Immanuel is divided into two parts. The words of the first part, drawn entirely from the Old Testament, would seem to typify the state of man before the Redemption; while those of the second, taken chiefly from the New Testament, with occasional passages from the prophets of the Old, are equally suggestive of the gradual progress of humanity towards that perfect condition which it was the mission of Jesus to point out. Such a theme appeals to the loftiest faculties of an artist, and can only be worthily developed in music of the greatest sublimity. To affirm that Mr. Leslie has written music of such a character, would be to affirm that which is untrue. We say this with no wish to detract from the undoubted merits of his oratorio; but it is as well to state our opinion at once, that Mr. Leslie would have done much more wisely in selecting a subject of less insuperable difficulty, one less likely than Immanuel, or "God with us," to make all artistic illustration, except the very highest, look pale and insignificant.

We have more than once had occasion to speak of the many excellent qualities of Mr. Leslie as a musical composer. His melody, though seldom very strikingly new in form or character, is fluent and graceful; he has a decided talent for orchestral instrumentation; his harmony, often rich, is never common-place; he modulates with ease, and frequently hits on progressions which are at the same time natural and unexpected; he writes carefully and well for voices in combination, has a good idea of elaborate counterpoint, and, to conclude, in the form or plan of his movements, displays an intimate acquaintance with the best models. If we find a bias for any particular composer occasionally leading him to direct imitation, that composer is Mendelssohn; but in this Mr. Leslie only yields to an influence which is universal among the intellectual musicians of the present age. The music of Immanuel is a great advance on all that its composer has hitherto produced. Though less laboured, it is more masterly and flows more easily. Throughout the whole oratorio we only remarked one instance of very elaborate writing—the last chorus of Part I., "Cry out, and shout." This is for two choirs, which, in the second part of the chorus, are employed, in a learned and ingenious manner, upon a fugue with two subjects—the first diatonic and somewhat trite, the second chromatic and more piquant. The full chorus, however—"To God our Saviour"—which concludes the oratorio, though exhibiting none of the devices of fugue, displays a thorough mastery of counterpoint, is more broad and vigorous, and more to our liking. The general style of the music is not only not severe—by which we mean contrapuntally elaborate—it is often simple, and occasionally even theatrical. As an example, we may cite the chorus in C minor—"There is no Hope"—where the words, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry," are set in a manner that would not be out of place in an opera, the triangle itself being introduced among the instruments. This chorus is, nevertheless, full of character and effect, and was one of the pieces which were received with the greatest favour. The quartet and chorus in D flat, "Rejoice with Us," in which the harp plays an important part, although a smooth and clever example of vocal part-writing, is also in the operatic vein. Another indication of the operatic style is the frequent indulgence in obbligato parts for special instruments. Besides the harp, to which we have alluded, we have an oboe obbligato in the soprano air, "O Israel;" a flute obbligato in the soprano solo and chorus, "Remember, O Lord;" and a clarionet and bassoon, in duet, obbligati, in the quartet in A flat with tenor solo, "Take heed, watch and pray." All these are admirably written; but Mr. Leslie need not be reminded that they are more strictly applicable to the operatic style than to that of the sacred oratorio. Among the most genuine pieces are some of the morceaux-d'ensemble; and from these we would especially single out the trio and chorus in G, "Come, pray You," in which the blessing of the children is described. The manner in which the three solo voices are alternated and mingled with the chorus, "Out of the Mouths of the Babes," is both charming and ingenious, and there is a remarkable freshness about the whole. A chorus in D, "The Spirit of the Lord," which immediately precedes this concerted piece, is also to be noticed for its graceful and melodious character. In the solo airs, Mr. Leslie is nearly always successful. Some of them are beautiful; and one more especially, in F minor, "I am bereaved, I am left alone," (the Widow's lamentation for her son), is a real inspiration; the pathos and expression of its melody are enhanced by the accompaniments, in which the alternation of the harmony between the stringed and wind instruments has a peculiarly charming effect. In the soprano songs, Mr. Leslie has been less happy in his treatment of the voice. He has written in most cases both too high and too low. A glaring instance of this presents itself in the air, "Sing, oh, ye Heavens," where in one place he takes the voice up to C sharp, and in another, on the words, "The Lord hath comforted His People," he allots a passage of eight bars to the singer, which in its general bearing would be low even for a contralto.

At present we have neither time nor space to say more about the oratorio of Immanuel—to which, however, we shall shortly recur. Of the general performance, we can hardly speak too well. Mr. Benedict never distinguished himself more. Under his admirable guidance the choruses were sung with extraordinary correctness and precision, the band played to perfection, and the solo singers, one and all, distinguished themselves. Mr. Lockey and Mr. Weiss were faultless; Mrs. Enderssohn did wonders with a more than commonly difficult soprano part; Miss Amy Dolby made herself extremely useful in a subordinate but not unimportant position; and Miss Dolby sang divinely. In the air of the disconsolate Widow, "I am bereaved," this accomplished lady surpassed herself, and entirely captivated the audience. The oratorio was received with the utmost favour. There were three encores—the chorus, "There is no Hope," the trio and chorus, "Come, We pray You" (the Blessing of the Children), and the quartet, "Take heed, watch and pray," being redemanded and repeated. At the conclusion there was a unanimous call for Mr. Leslie, who came into the orchestra, and was applauded with enthusiasm. It was an occasion to be remembered by the young composer, and should spur him on to increased exertion.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT'S SOIRÉES.

The second of these was quite as good as the first. It came off on Tuesday evening, before a brilliant and fashionable audience, that filled the Hanover Square Rooms to the walls. The programme merits quoting:—

Programme.—Part first: Quintet, E flat—Mozart; Sonata, E flat, pianoforte—Haydn; "The Spirit Song"—Haydn; Sonata, op. 28, A minor, pianoforte and violin—Beethoven. Part second: Sonata Duo, op. 32, pianoforte and violoncello—Bennett; Aria, "O! cara Immagine"—Mozart; "Lieder ohne Worte," No. 4, 7th book, Andante Sostenuto—Mendelssohn, No. 4, op. 2, Allegro molto vivace—Fanny Hensel; Songs, "Day and Night"—J. L. Hatton; "Summer"—Joseph Robinson; Selections, Capriccio, A minor, Tema e variazoni—pianoforte—Bennett.

The fresh and unartificial quintet of Mozart (which was composed in 1784), delighted everybody. The parts for oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon, were efficiently sustained by Messrs. Grattan Cooke, Williams, Hardy, and Waetzig, Mr. Bennett himself being at the pianoforte. Equally welcome in its way (though not half so good a composition in the same key) was Haydn's Sonata, dedicated to Madame Bartolozzi (mother of Madame Vestris), which Mr. Bennett played to perfection. The divine (though little) sonata of Beethoven, could not fail to delight, when executed by two such players as Mr. Bennett and M. Sainton. The sonata of Mr. Bennett, for piano and violoncello, improves on every hearing. A more faultless performance of this charming work than that of the composer and Signor Piatti (to whom the sonata is dedicated) was never heard. The beautiful Lied in D, from book 7 of the Songs without Words, was charmingly played by Mr. Bennett, and the sparkling composition of the same class, composed by Madame Fanny Hensel (Mendelssohn's lamented sister, whose sudden death was followed so speedily by that of the great composer himself), was encored. It was new to the audience, and Mr. Bennett, to whose style of playing it is peculiarly suited, did well to introduce it. The selections included the quaint capriccio in A minor, and the Tema con variazioni in E, two of the latest compositions of the author—both bagatelles, but both of the most refined.

The vocal music was well chosen and well sung. Mr. Herberte (who lately replaced, at a few hours' notice, the renowned Sims Reeves, in Elijah, at Exeter Hall) sang Mozart's lovely aria very gracefully; and Miss Dolby was more charming than ever in Haydn's "Spirit Song," and the two pretty ballads of Mr. Hatton and Mr. Robinson. Mr. Harold Thomas (pupil of Mr. Bennett) accompanied the songs exceedingly well. The concert was altogether delightful.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

Mr. Ella commenced his winter series of Chamber Concerts, the avant-coureur of the Musical Union, on the evening of the 23rd ult., before an audience less numerous than select, and more attentive than enthusiastic. The programme included four full-length compositions (two stringed quartets, a duet-sonata, and a trio); and the performances were protracted till a later hour than usual at these meetings. The following was the selection:—

|---|---|
| Quartet—E flat (No. 80) ... ... ... ... | Haydn. |
| Duet—Pianoforte and violoncello (B flat) (Op. 45) ... | Mendelssohn. |
| Quartet—E minor (Op. 45, No. 2) ... ... ... | Spohr. |
| Trio—Piano, violin, and violoncello (E flat) (Op. 70) | Beethoven. |
| Selection—Pianoforte solus ... ... ... ... | Chopin and Mendelssohn. |

The players in the quartets were MM. Molique, Goffrie, Hill, and Piatti. The quartets of Haydn and Spohr were well contrasted, besides being favourable specimens of the masters. The execution was little short of faultless. The finish, precision, and chaste refinement of Herr Molique's playing, make him quite invaluable in quartets. Mr. Goffrie is one of the best "second violins" we know; and Mr. Hill (happily recovered from his indisposition) is still unmatched at the viola. Signor Piatti is the greatest violoncellist in Europe—which has often been said before, but must re-suggest itself on every fresh occasion of hearing him. In Mendelssohn's fine sonata (the first of the two violoncello duets), he "shone like a star;" his execution was, indeed, incomparable. The trio of Beethoven, a mighty work, was marvellously well given by all three performers. The pianist was Mr. Charles Hallé, one of the grandest players in the world; and the pianoforte was one of those gorgeously-toned instruments that have lately issued in such profusion from our great English manufactory, which set competition at defiance, and, in the future history of music, will entitle the makers to a place beside the Straduarii, Guarnerii, and Amati, of Italy, whose violins and violoncellos have never been equalled. Mr. Hallé (who may be styled pianist to His Highness, the Director of the Musical Union—so often does he play at Mr. Ella's concerts—and he cannot play too often for the pleasure of the subscribers and our own), was equally successful in the duet of Mendelssohn and the trio of Beethoven. His playing was intellectual, and his mechanism unerring. The short solo pieces, introduced by Mr. Hallé at the end, comprised one of the nocturnes of Chopin, and one of the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn—No. 1, Book 6, in E flat.

The Record of Mr. Ella continues—as chatty, critical, naïf, and pleasant as ever. Neither the Winter nor the Summer "Sittings" at Willis's Rooms would be themselves without it.

Mrs. Henry Thompson.—This lady, whom our readers will at once recognise as the accomplished pianist and composer, Miss Kate Loder, will make her last appearance in public, as a pianoforte player, at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society, on Monday night. Mrs. Henry Thompson, we hear, will continue her instructions in the pianoforte and music as heretofore.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4TH, 1854.

IN the case of Lumley v. Gye, the counsel for either side indulged in unnecessary vituperation. The most flagrant instance of this, however, occurred in the speech of the Attorney-General. We allude to the following passage:—

"He (Dr. Bacher) belonged to the firm of Lumley, Bacher, and Brandus, who hoped to be enriched with the plunder which they expected to get from the defendant by this action."

This remark, however equivocal in taste, might be passed over as "all fair"—according to the freedom of speech ordinarily permitted to advocates in such discussions—but only when considered in reference to the plaintiff, and to Dr. Bacher, his principal witness. With regard to M. Brandus, it was a gross and palpable injustice. We need not undertake any defence of the character of the Parisian music publisher. He is known and respected, all over Europe, not only as an eminent and spirited tradesman, but as a man of the strictest honour and integrity; and Mr Gye himself, the Attorney General's client, would, we are certain, be the very first to come forward and give his entire assent to this assertion. It is as well, however, since the name of M. Brandus has been so unwarrantably used, and his reputation so gratuitously assailed, to state, in a few words, what his own part has been, from the beginning, in these unfortunate transactions.

M. Brandus, then, has been simply a loser of a very large sum of money, advanced in the fullest confidence, through the medium of a near relative, to the lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre. M. Brandus knew little or nothing of Mr. Lumley, or of the position of Her Majesty's Theatre at the time, but looked to his own relative (to oblige whom was his sole object in providing the money) for repayment, when the accommodation should no longer be needed. He had no advantage to expect in return, nor did he stipulate for any. Had the prosperity of Her Majesty's Theatre turned out as great as its present adversity, M. Brandus would literally have gained nothing. His loan repaid, the matter, so far as he was concerned, would have ended.

When the real state of things became known to M. Brandus, he communicated the affair to a London solicitor of the highest respectability, in whose hands he placed certain securities which he held for the money lent. Since then, through the exertions of that solicitor, a part has been refunded; but M. Brandus still remains a loser of several thousand pounds. In the proceedings of Lumley v. Gye, M. Brandus has taken no part whatever. What excuse, then, had the Attorney-General for arraigning him as one engaged in a conspiracy to plunder Mr. Gye? Mr. Hughes, Mr. Hopkinson, Lord Ward, the Earl of Lonsdale, and any other of the creditors of Her Majesty's Theatre, who were no parties to the action of Lumley v. Gye, might, with equal reason, have been accused, since they were just as much implicated in a plot against the manager of the Royal Italian Opera as M. Brandus. It was hard enough, in all conscience, to lose a large sum of money to no purpose, without being exposed to abuse from the Attorney-General. If that high functionary was instructed to reflect upon M. Brandus, more shame to the Solicitors who drew up the brief; and if the Solicitors were instructed to similar intent, more shame to the Defendant. We cannot mince words in such an argument. M. Brandus is an honourable man; he had nothing to do with the case of Lumley v. Gye; he was a simple creditor, like Mdlle. Cruvelli or Sig. Lablache; and the extremest license assumed by barristers afforded no plea for the introduction of his name, much less in a manner so unworthy.

To strengthen our argument, we shall call attention to the few answers which, in the course of the three days' proceedings, contain allusions to M. Brandus.

No. 1.—DR. BACHER (cross-examined by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL): "I do not know that the result of this verdict is pledged to Mr. Brandus, my brother-in-law, at Paris."

No. 2.—Ibid (re-examined by SIR FITZROY KELLY): "He (Dr. Bacher or Mr. Lumley—either will do) owed Mr. Brandus money."

No. 3.—JOHN MITCHELL (examined): "Mr. Lumley had disposed (previously—omitted) of some of the boxes I had purchased to Mr. Brandus. Mr. Brandus gave me notice that that was in respect of a sum of money which was owing (to him, Mr. Brandus—omitted). I heard no more of it, but engaged the boxes."

These are all; and, except in the speech of the Attorney-General, M. Brandus is no where else mentioned. What authority, then, can be adduced from the above to warrant Defendant's counsel in so severe and unqualified a charge, we leave to the explanation of those who imagined and proferred it. We declare openly there is none.

If the inordinate zeal of advocates at the bar is thus permitted to run riot with impunity, no one's character can be safe; and we humbly suggest that some reasonable limits should be assigned to the display of forensic eloquence.

THE famous "Blaze of Triumph" of Mr. Bunn was simply the heading of a bill, announcing the second performance of an opera which was undoubtedly successful. Not the less, however, was it looked upon as a puff, and criticised as such by the educated and polite. What, then, can be said about the last advertisement of Mr. E. T. Smith, the present lessee of that most unhappy Theatre Royal in Drury Lane? The playgoing public need not be reminded that a piece called The Vendetta (why not La Revenge?) was produced at Drury Lane Theatre, on Monday night, and failed. (A description of the piece, and its failure, will be found in our dramatic columns.) The astonishment of the playgoing public then must have been considerable, on reading the following advertisement in the morning papers of Tuesday:—

"THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.—Lessee, Mr. E. T. Smith.—Another brilliant triumph at this national establishment of Dumas's chef-d'œuvre, the great French Drama, in 5 acts and 9 tableaux, entitled THE VENDETTA; or, The Corsican Brothers, (which commences at 7 precisely, and concludes at 10 o'clock.) The wonderful impersonation of the two characters of Louis and Fabian dei Franchi by Mr. G. V. Brooke.—The resplendent mise-en-scène—the startling and thrilling effects—the imposing tableaux, and the powerful and impressive acting throughout the entire drama—created a perfect furore, and gained from a densely crowded audience an unanimous verdict of approval—the same marked success that insured for it the uninterrupted run in the United States of more than 100 nights. The eminent tragedian, Mr. G. V. Brooke, as the Twin Brothers every evening; Chateau Renaud, Mr. T. Mead."

We have not italicised a single word; but if, by typical display we were desirous of emphasizing so much of the advertisement as might be termed preposterous, we should print the whole of it in glaring Roman capitals. "Brilliant triumph"—"national establishment"—Dumas's chef-d'œuvre"—"great French drama"—"wonderful impersonation" of G. V. B.—"resplendent mise-en scène"—"startling and thrilling effects"—"imposing tableaux"—"powerful and impressive acting throughout"—"PERFECT FURORE"—"UNANIMOUS verdict of approval"—"marked success"—and "eminent tragedian," are but component parts of one enormous fabrication, unsubstantial and delusive as the phantoms which delirium paints on darkness. Even the parenthetical commencing at seven, and concluding at ten o'clock, are contrary to fact. If the advertisements of quack doctors are declined by respectable newspapers, because they are regarded as impositions, what excuse is there for inserting those which issue from the managerial cabinet of Drury Lane Theatre?

In one of the morning papers which contains the advertisement of Mr. E. T. S., there is a notice of the first performance of The Vendetta, commencing thus:—

"The American version of the Corsican Brothers (that of Drury Lane) is no trifle. At the hour of seven it began, and the clock striking eleven found it yet unfinished."

In an estimate of the merits of the piece, in comparison with those of the first English version, the same report goes on to say:—

"A story is told of a respectable Nonconformist divine, who admired the Pilgrim's Progress immensely, but thought it had two faults—viz., that it was too short and too entertaining. He, therefore, introduced a great quantity of additional matter, in the shape of meditation, reflection, and so on; and thereby not only increased the dimensions of the volume, but took off from it that keen edge of enjoyment which he deemed an evil. The adapter of the American Corsican Brothers, if we suppose him to have proceeded with a knowledge of the Princess's piece in his mind, has acted very like the improver of Bunyan," &c.

The "wonderful impersonation of G. V. B." is thus apostrophised, in far too indulgent epigram:—

"Mr. G. V. Brooke's impersonation of the Dioscuri of the modern stage is careful throughout; and, while he makes a 'telling' point or two, he judiciously refrains from attempting too much."

"The "judiciously" is judicious. To sum up, we add the summing up of the report:—

"We would counsel a thorough revision of this new Corsican Brothers if a permanent success is intended. Extension has been obtained by a sacrifice of effectiveness, and much that the American adapter has done should be undone as speedily as possible. Two scenes that intervene between the supper scene and the first duel, merely for the sake of explaining where no explanation was wanted, should be struck out at once; and throughout the whole of the dialogue a lightening process should be carried on; for, as the work now stands, the characters seem always anxious to hear themselves talk, and always unwilling to dash into action. It was to the weariness arising from this constant drag of dialogue that we would attribute the smart sibillations ("Brilliant Triumph!"—"Perfect Furore!"—"Unanimous verdict of approval!") which manifested themselves throughout the whole progress of the piece, and which, although drowned in the applause at the end, were too numerous to be disregarded."

Compare this very mild castigation—for mild it assuredly is—with the managerial advertisement the day after the performance, and one of two conclusions must be adopted:—either, that the newspaper critic is a devoted enemy to Drury Lane Theatre, or that E. T. S. and G. V. B. are ——— arcades ambo.

Our readers may choose between the two.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"SIX COMPOSITIONS POUR LE PIANO."—No. 1, La Mignonne.—No. 2, La Grâce.—No. 3, Tarantella.—No. 4, Scène du Bal.—No. 5, L'Espérance.—No. 6, Mazurka Favorite. HENRI CRAMER. Ewer and Co.

SHORT pianoforte pieces of moderate difficulty, which are not mere arrangements of popular airs, nor variations or fantasias on tunes from the last new opera, are much needed, and are especially useful when written in a healthy, unaffected tone like the above "Six Compositions"—which, by the way, have a right to be styled compositions, since they are really of Mr. Cramer's manufacture, and derive their themes from no other fancy than his own. For striking originality, either in the ideas or the passages, however, we cannot precisely commend them. John Field, John Cramer, Steibelt, Dussek, and Moscheles, are more than once imitated, in certain traits de bravoure which have become somewhat facile and trivial. In No. 1, La Mignonne, a sparkling morceau, supplying excellent practice for close and rapid playing, we are especially reminded of one or two of the more ancient pieces of Moscheles. No. 2, La Grâce, is what it is called, with some confidence, by the composer—a rondo élégant—and begins in this De Beriot like fashion:—

The second theme, in B, is rococo, and the tonic and dominant passage which follows, still more so. It is evident that the bent of Mr. Cramer's talent is to emulate composers of the period immediately preceding Henri Herz—and that, not in their difficult, but in their easy compositions. No. 3, a Tarantella, in G minor, is a spirited imitation of the most popular types of that exciting movement. How original it is, may be guessed from the following:—

This, twice over, forms the subject; and then we have a counter-subject in the relative major as usual, and with a flat sixth as usual :—

But how is it possible to write an original tarantella? Rossini succeeded, and so did Auber, and so did Weber, and so did Mendelssohn; but so has not Mr. Henri Cramer, who, however, must not be blamed for failing in that which it is only the province of genius to accomplish.

No. 4, Scène du Bal, is a brilliant waltz, preceded by a short introduction, after the manner of the famous Invitation of Weber. It is in some respects the most agreeable and the best of the "Six Compositions." The opening subject, in A flat, is bold; and the episode, in D flat, remarkably graceful and pretty. No. 5, L'Espérance, a "song without words," is inoffensive and almost elegant, but we are not pleased with the harmony of the following bar :—

We state our objection without comment.

"We do not like you, Dr. Fell;
The reason why, we cannot tell;
But we don't like you, Dr. Fell."

No. 8, Mazurka Favorite, if the title be taken as a guarantee, must be already known and admired. The more singular, then, that such a bar as the following should occur at least half-a-dozen times :—

The general style of the Mazurka is rhythmical and vigorous, and it is well written throughout.

"Orpheus." A collection of Glees or Vocal Quartets, without Accompaniments, by German composers—Book 25. Ewer and Co.

The present number of this very useful compilation contains four pieces—an Old Romance, in three parts ("Fly hence with Me and be my Bride"), by Mendelssohn; two four-part songs, by Reissiger—"I would that my Sorrows," and "The Brook;" and a winter song, by Dorn, "From Mountains high with hoary Heads." All of these have more or less merit; but the Old Romance by Mendelssohn is worth the whole of them put together. All glee-singers should obtain it. The glees are published, as usual, with English words, and in vocal score as well as in parts—so that an auditor may amuse himself by looking at the former, while the executants are singing from the latter. The dedication "to the glee-singers of the United Kingdom," is appropriate.

"The Remembrance," Mazurka. Dedicated to Mdlle. E. St. Marc. By J. Li Calsi. Webb.

A very elegant and well-written piece, which, if not quite original, wears at least an air of originality. Were Mazurkas much sought after in the drawing-room, Signor Li Calsi's "Remembrance" could not fail to become exceedingly popular. As it is, its claims to favour must depend upon its musical merits, and these are greatly superior to what we often find in dance-music. Signor Li Calsi is evidently a cultivated musician.

"Norah Spinning." Irish Ballad. Composed by Frank Mori. Duff and Hodgson.

Mr. Frank Mori has been very happy in imitating the Irish character and Irish tune in this ballad. The melody is strikingly quaint, and well fitted to the words, which tell how a young girl, spinning beside her blind grandmother at night, in a cabin, is enticed away from her task by a lover who waits without by the light of the moon. "Norah Spinning," in short, is a genuine ballad, which cannot fail to be effective when well sung. Mr. Sims Reeves proved this on Wednesday night, at Mr. Allcroft's concert.

MR. ALLCROFT'S ANNUAL CONCERT.

When a theatre is crammed to excess, the performances never go smoothly. All, except those who occupy reserved seats and private boxes, are discontented. Elbow-room is of great consequence to a crowd that has met for amusement, and people are never so disposed to censure as when they cannot even stand at ease. Dissatisfaction must find an escape somehow. He who cannot fairly accuse his neighbour of designedly breaking his ribs, is as likely as not to vent his spleen upon the singers. Discontent, like canine perspiration, will ooze through the tongue. Such was the crowded state of the Lyceum Theatre on Wednesday night, that the occupants of the pit and galleries were literally jammed together so closely, as to suggest the metaphor of a human jelly. The boxes fared better; but even in them there was no standing-room. The programmes of Mr. Allcroft's Annual Concerts—or "Performances," as he calls them—are so attractive and so long, that they draw everybody, and tire everybody. The selections are made up of slices from every other concert which has taken place during a twelvemonth. If, therefore, you go to one of his entertainments, you have a rifacimento of the musical doings of the whole year. The concert on Wednesday night was, as usual, lengthy, varied, and overdone—although some things were not done at all. The programme comprised fifty-two morceaux, and the names of more than thirty artists. Were we to specify all the pieces, all the instrumentalists and vocalists, and all the encores, we should have to supply four additional pages. "That can hardly be, Master Shallow!" We shall, therefore, make short work of them. It was evident, from the commencement, that the "gods" were ripe for revolt. Three pieces were listened to in silence, and then, no favourite appearing, poor Mr. J. Adlington Walworth came in for the first ebullition of wrath, although he really sang well enough. From this point, however, matters went tolerably well again, until about the thirteenth or fourteenth piece. Miss Rebecca Isaacs and Mr. Augustus Braham afforded so much pleasure in a duet from Linda di Chamouni, that they were encored; and Mr. George Tedder roused the adjacent echoes by a vigorous reading of "Oh, 'tis a glorious Sight." Miss Stabbach and Mdme. Amedei, too, helped to pour oil upon the waters. The terzetto from Guillaume Tell—"Troncar suoi di,"—was put down for Messrs. Sims Reeves, Frederick Lablache, and Weiss. But this not being forthcoming, Mr. Richardson made his appearance, solus, flute in hand, to make amends for the disappointment. Unfortunately there was a programme; and the mob, like a true mob, would have its rights. A mob, like Shylock, will have its bond, and like another mob—a mob-politic—the whole bill, and nothing but it. The flute was declined, and the trio demanded. A hundred throats roared lustily that no substitution would be allowed. "Reeves was down, and Reeves must come." It was "so nominated" in the bond. At last Mr. Allcroft appeared; and the mob listened, with an occasional half-suppressed growl. "The parts of the trio have not arrived"—said Mr. Allcroft—"but Mr. Reeves will sing a song instead." The mob roared again, but this time with delight. All it wanted was Sims Reeves, who now came forward, amid tremendous cheers, and sang "La Donna è mobile." At the end, there was another roar for "My pretty Jane;" whereupon Mr. Sims Reeves made a bow and his exit, while Mr. Allcroft again came forward and stated that it was impossible for Mr. Sims Reeves to sing "My pretty Jane," since Mr. Augustus Braham was put down for it in the bills. Mr. Reeves, however, would repeat the song he had just sung. The proposition was accepted, and the mob appeased. Such is the tax upon a singular popularity like that of Mr. Reeves. This was the principal "row" of the evening; but at intervals there were other "rows," in the course of the performance, less violent because more reasonable. We must hasten to enumerate the principal features of the rest of the concert. Miss Arabella Goddard, just fresh from the triumphs she has been winning in the provinces, performed Wallace's "Maritana," in her most brilliant and animated manner. Mr. Sims Reeves was encored in an extremely graceful new ballad by Mr. Frank Mori, "Norah spinning," and also in "Good-bye, Sweetheart." Mr. Mori's ballad is a genuine melody, and is likely to become popular. Mr. Sims Reeves sang it to perfection. Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mr. Augustus Braham, Miss Poole, Miss Stabbach, Madame and Signor F. Lablache, with others, came in for their share of applause. The concert terminated uproariously at a quarter past twelve; and the mob went away full of song, and hoarse with shouting.

DRAMATIC.

Drury Lane.—Mr. E. T. Smith, the manager of Drury Lane Theatre, is entitled to praise for the strictness with which, in one respect at least, he keeps faith with the public. The novelties he announces are almost invariably produced at the time specified. The new version of the Corsican Brothers, which had been underlined in the bills for some time previously, was brought out on Monday night, under the name of La Vendetta, the title of the French Drama, founded on Alexandre Dumas' romance. We beg Mr. Smith's pardon for calling his the "new version." Mr. Smith states that the Drury-lane, or the American version, is the original, and ignores altogether the Corsican Brothers, produced at the Princess's theatre. According to official announcement, Mr. G. V. Brooke has played the twin brothers of La Vendetta, upwards of 100 times in America, with unbounded success. The scenic effects and tableaux of the production were declared to be such as were never before exhibited on any stage, and, of course, the highest expectations were formed of the performance. Mr. Smith persists in his usual system of puffing extravagantly his "celebrated tragedian," and the transactions of his theatre; and, doubtless, this has its effect on the masses, who read the "proclamations" and put faith in them. We must, however, do the lessee and manager the justice to state, that he has spared nothing within his means to render La Vendetta attractive. The scenery, appointments, and dresses are all to be praised, and the machinery, by which the supernatural effects are produced, says much for the skill of the Drury Lane head-carpenter. The cast comprises the best names of the company, and all the satellites and supernumeraries of the theatre are engaged in the performance. Nevertheless, the first representation of La Vendetta, on Monday night, was a failure. The cause may be attributed to its great length, clumsy construction, and want of sustained interest, quite as much as to the very indifferent acting of Mr. G. V. Brooke.

The Corsican Brothers, at Drury Lane, is divided into five acts. The first act takes place in Paris, in the chambers of Louis dei Franchi. Meynard calls upon Louis, and receives a letter of recommendation to his mother and brother in Corsica, which island he is about to visit. At the Princess's, it will be remembered that all this is narrated in the first scene by Meynard to Madame dei Franchi in Corsica. Nothing is gained by this introduction, if we except a tableau at the end, when Louis retires to bed, which anticipates the dénouement of the last act.

The second, third, and fourth acts are laid out much in the same way as the first, second, and third acts of the Princess's version. The difference consists principally in the greater exuberance of the translation and the consequent flatness of the dialogue. The scene at the Grand Opera in Paris—which, in the original drama of MM. Grangé and de Montepin, takes place in the gallery, between the foyer and the boxes—is represented both at Drury Lane and the Princess's, as passing on the stage. This, we think, is a decided improvement, and, if well managed, cannot fail to be animated and exciting. There were many striking effects in the ball scene at Drury Lane; but, for the splendour and accuracy of the costumes, and the general coup-d'œil, the palm must be awarded to the Princess's. Moreover, it was absurd to introduce ballet dancers, in a pas-de-deux and pas-de-trois, at a masqued ball supposed to take place on the stage of the Grand Opera. It destroyed the whole scenic illusion.

In act the second (act the first at the Princess's) the scene at the supper table, and the subsequent arbitration scene, where Fabian reconciles the Orlandi and Colonna parties, who had been for many years at feud, were received with unmistakeable marks of disapproval. These scenes were spun out to an inordinate length, and it was surprising that they were not unequivocally condemned. Throughout the entire play the audience exhibited dissatisfaction, and the tableaux and supernatural appearances were alone received with applause. The combat in the clearing of Fontainebleau, between Fabian and Chateau Renaud, which results in the death of the latter, was the "hit" of the performance. Mr. G. V. Brooke fences well, and was ably seconded by Mr. T. Mead. The fight was received with hearty and prolonged cheers.

The fifth act, involving the return of Fabian to Corsica, his illness and death, was altogether superfluous. Here, we suppose, were to be recognized the "scenic effects never before exhibited on any stage." The apparition of Louis comes up through the seat of a chair, invites Fabian to join him in the next world, and departs by the way he arrived. Fabian dies, and the two brothers are seen at the back of the stage, in dim perspective, ascending towards heaven, linked together, both dressed, or rather undressed alike, without their coats, waistcoats, braces, or neckerchiefs. Last of all—and this no doubt was intended to be the crowning glory of the performance—we are treated to a "beautiful allegorical picture of a Corsican funeral" (to quote from Mr. Smith's "proclamation"); but, as we could not distinctly see the picture, nor understand what we did see, the beauty and the allegory escaped us. A real funeral would, perhaps, have been more to the purpose.

The curtain descended about 11 o'clock, amid faint applause mingled with hisses, and, a few "voices"* shouting lustily for Mr. Brooke. "G. V. B." came forward, and walked across the stage to a very flat ovation. Then came Mr. Mead; and lastly, Mr. Smith, the manager and contriver of all those miracles and prodigies which have raised the English drama to such an elevation that it has gone completely out of sight. The Drury Lane audience was disappointed with the new Corsican Brothers; they expected too much, and got too little. In one sense they got too much; that is: too much of the piece and of Mr. Brooke; but if "too much of a good thing is good for nothing," too much of a bad thing must be bad for anything.

Mr. Brooke was not at home in his part, or parts. He had no opportunity for vociferation and was thus deprived of his sheet anchor. When Mr. B. ("G. V. B.") is quiet, he is nothing. Repose is not his atmosphere, nor is there any romance about him. His mien and carriage are ordinary; his voice and gesture not extraordinary. Mr. B., moreover, lacks discrimination of character. His Fabian and Louis dei Franchi, contrary to the meaning of the author, are twin in mind as well as body. No one could tell Mr. Brooke's Fabian from his Louis. Mr. Charles Kean draws a nice mental distinction between the brothers, though hardly, perhaps, so subtle and delicate as the original representative, M. Fechter. If he would retain the position he has made for himself with a certain class of the play-going public, Mr. B. must not venture to appear in parts like that of the Corsican Brothers, in which vehemence and rant are of no avail, where physical force and stentorian lungs must give place to calm and quiet bearing, and where the acting requires to be subdued throughout. Mr. B. is himself in parts more stirring and boisterous. A bird that loves the stormy ocean, he is ill at ease on a placid lake. He should abandon the Corsican Brothers as soon as possible. Having no opportunity of stifling his defects in a cloud of bombast, he cannot, as in other plays, throw dust in the eyes and ears of the groundlings. Let him, then, cut the twins, lest the public cry out "O Gemini!"

ADELPHI.—Owing to the fabulous run of pieces at this theatre, we are seldom called upon to exercise our critical acumen on new ones. The Serious Family, first produced under Mr. B. Webster's management at the Haymarket, has been brought out at the Adelphi. It was very successful at the first-named theatre, and bids fair to be equally so in the latter. The cast is excellent. Mr. Webster, of course, plays his old part of Charles Torrens, but all the other dramatis personæ rejoice in fresh representatives. Keeley's Mr. Sleek is a masterly delineation of the drab-coloured, drawling impostor; broad and rich, but true to nature, strongly-marked and individualised. Mr. Leigh Murray played Captain Murphy Maguire—the fidus Achates of Charles Torrens, the good-natured, jovial Irish gentleman, affable and exquisitely polite, but firm of purpose, not to be put down by the frowns of Lady Creamly Sowerby, the repulsive coolness of Mrs. Torrens, or the methodistical arrogance and superb humility of Mr. Sleek—exuberant in spirits, thoughtless and headstrong, but rich in the possession of a good heart, not deserting his friend in a "fix," but immediately setting his shoulder to the wheel, for the purpose of extracting him from his difficulties. Mr. Leigh Murray, we repeat, played Captain Murphy Maguire in the most finished, easy, and artistic style. It was only very recently that we had any idea of the many uses to which glass may be applied, and even now we are unable to set a limit to those of gutta percha, and, therefore, we shall not pretend to say in how many new branches of his profession we may shortly have the pleasure of seeing Mr. Leigh Murray; but of one thing we are sure, that in whatever line we do see him, it will always be with pleasure. One great merit in Mr. Leigh Murray's impersonation of Captain Murphy Maguire is his avoiding the fault committed by most actors of making Irish gentlemen talk like Irish labourers. Mr. Leigh Murray's brogue is not the brogue of a carman, but that of an officer accustomed to the very best society. It does not constitute, as it were, the ground-work of his dialect, but merely gives it a delicate and agreeable zest, as the bean patronised by certain snuff-takers flavours their rappee or Prince's Mixture. The other characters were all well sustained, and among them we may mention the Lady Creamly Sowerby of Mrs. Leigh Murray, whose every gesture and word reminded the spectator very forcibly of Exeter Hall. The piece is received every night with immense applause.

STRAND.—Two new pieces have been produced within the week at this theatre—principally for the introduction of Mr. George Hodson, who is the Sirius of the stellar system at the Strand—No Irish need Apply, a petite comedy, and the Corkonian Brothers, a burlesque, founded on the Corsican Brothers. They are sufficiently amusing, and Mr. George Hodson is the life and soul of both. The Corkonian Brothers is carried to the highest point of extravagance; nevertheless, as everybody has seen the Corsican Brothers, the caricature is at once recognised and allowed. Both little comedy and burlesque are well put upon the stage, and seem likely to hold their place in the bills for some time.

ROSSINI.—Rossini, we are told, lives like a bon bourgeois. He has married Mdlle. Olympie Pélissier, who never calls her husband anything but "Mon Immortel." The establishment of Rossini at Florence is composed of eleven servants, and three women au service de Madame.—There is a morning and an evening carriage, and an open landau for the service of Mdme. Rossini. The maestro makes his visits on foot, like Louis Philippe, with an umbrella under his arm. Every season Rossini goes to take the waters at Monte-Catini, less, he says, for himself than for his dog. "Rossini," says M. Véron, "has just completed the purchase of the Palazzo Pucci, which has cost him 400,000 francs, in addition to which 50,000 francs are to be devoted to furnishing the apartment of his 'Pauvre Femme,' as he calls her."—Fraser.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The illness of Mdlle. Caroline Duprez has kept the new opera of Meyerbeer out of the bills of the Opéra-Comique for these ten days, much to the chagrin of the manager, M. Perrin, who is a severe loser in consequence. There seemed to be but one opinion on the subject of L'Étoile du Nord—namely, that it is a chef-d'œuvre. Some even go so far as to pronounce it the masterpiece of its composer. But let me give you some idea of the plot, by a free translation of part of the feuilleton of M. Fiorentino:—

"In the little village of Wibord, on the coast of Finland, a party of workmen are reposing from their labours. Among these groups of artisans, reclining on the quay, or quaffing their wine in a careless manner, may be seen one, named Peters, whose deportment is at once proud and imperious, though he is indefatigable at work, and a joyous companion. Observe him well: beneath those energetic features, and that fierce decided air, who does not recognise the third son of Alexis Michaëlowitz and Nathalie Narishkin, the Czar Peter the Great, who inscribed his name in the dock-yard of Saardam, as Peter Michaelhoff, and lived unknown among the workmen, partaking of their labours, their pleasures, and excesses? At Wibord, where M. Scribe conducts us, Peters is a stranger to every body. In a moment of passion, attacked with a flow of blood to the head—the germs of that malady which brought him so often afterwards to the verge of the tomb—he is abandoned by his comrades. Regaining his senses after a long swoon, he finds the village to his liking, and establishes himself there. At least such is his story to those who make inquiries about his family, and his antecedents. The truth is, however, that Peters is desperately enamoured of a young and lovely orphan, brought up by a poor gipsy woman, who, when dying, predicted the girl a brilliant destiny. Catherine (the name of the girl, whose birth is involved in mystery) has come to reside in this remote corner of Finland with her brother Georges Sawyouski, over whom she watches like a tender and affectionate mother, and whom she protects at the peril of her life.

"So much courage, presence of mind, and goodness, make a deep impression on Peter; Catherine is not slow in exercising over the pretended carpenter the most absolute controul. An occasion soon arises which shows in the clearest light the ascendancy she has gained over Peter. Sweden and Russia are at war; Catherine has arranged everything for the nuptials of her brother Georges, and her friend Proscovia, niece of Meynolds, the keeper of a tavern; but lo! at the moment when the marriage procession is marching towards the chapel, a horde of Tartars arrives at a given time to interrupt the festival, and threaten to put the whole party to death. The first movement of Peter is to seize a hatchet and attack the barbarians. We now indeed recognise the man who, at the assault of Dorpat, rushed through the streets like lightning, striking and wounding his own soldiers, whose want of discipline he desired to punish, and who, penetrating into the Hôtel de Ville in the middle of an astonished crowd, cast his sword upon a table, and exclaimed, 'It is not with your blood my sword is stained, but with that of my own soldiers; I have returned to save your lives.'

"Woe to the children of the Ukraine! They have roused the slumbering lion. But Catherine, with a gesture, appeases their imprudent wrath; and, by the mere force of her beauty, voice and looks, awes and disperses the savage horde. A witness of the miracle, and yielding, in turn, to charms so irresistible, Peter solicits Catherine to join her destiny to his for ever. She consents; but on condition that the workman becomes a soldier. The proposal is accepted. The Czar places a ring on the finger of his betrothed, and leaves directly for the army with his favourite Danilowitz.

"Catherine, alone, thinks of nothing now but the happiness of her brother. Proscovia, in tears, informs her, that Georges, forcibly enlisted, is to depart immediately. 'If the marriage had only taken place!'—sighed the artless girl. 'If that be all,' said Catherine, 'I will undertake to find him a substitute, provided he promises to join his regiment after the honeymoon.' The bargain is made. Catherine puts on male attire, and in this disguise takes the place of her brother, upon which act of heroism the curtain falls.

"The second act passes in the camp of General Tchérémeteff. Birch-trees on either side, reaching to the top of the stage, form a thick mass of foliage, with their intertwining branches. Rocks, intersected by deep ravines, rise one above the other until they are lost in the clouds. At the first entrance, to the right of the spectator, is a tent. Catharine, decidedly the best looking soldier in the Russian army, goes through the drill with singular grace and precision, to the astonishment of Gritzenko, the Tartar chief, whom she has charmed in her gipsy costume, and who is unable to account for the striking likeness between her brother and herself. He places the young soldier as sentinel near his own tent. Soon afterwards, the Czar arrives incog., under the name of Captain Peters, accompanied by Danilowitz. After giving one or two orders, he postpones business till the next day, and, as usual, drowns his cares in Tokay.

"Catherine, like a true daughter of Eve, peeps through an opening in the tent, and with equal surprise and delight perceives that her lover has kept his word, and won his epaulette. But Peter gets intoxicated, as in the village of old. He drinks to Catherine, his beloved, and she forgives him. But soon after he begins to take liberties with two vivandières, his cupbearers. Excited to tears, Catherine wishes herself far away, but lacks the strength to tear herself from the spot. Gritzenko comes to relieve the sentinel; but Catherine is insensible to his approach. The corporal reminds her of her duty, upon which, losing her self-command, she gives vent to her rage, and strikes him in the face. The Tartar, furious at this insult, drags the offender into the tent, and demands justice of the captain. Stupified by wine, the czar does not recognise Catherine in her disguise, and orders her to be shot. More concerned at Peter's faithlessness than at her impending fate, Catherine utters a cry of anguish and disappears. This brings back the Czar to reason. He recalls the young soldier, whose voice and features remind him of his betrothed. But Catherine has thrown herself into the river, and the soldiers having fired at her, he is uncertain whether she is alive or dead.

"At the same instant, to give the last blow to the czar's grief, a conspiracy, which has been secretly going on, breaks out in the army. Whole regiments project desertion to the enemy; but Peter, with the audacity that so often saved him in such straits, rushes into the midst of the traitors, and offers to deliver the czar, alone and unarmed, into their power. A shout of assent is their reply, 'Behold him!' cries Peter, uncovering his breast, 'now—strike!' At these words, the troops prostrate themselves before the czar, who pardons them; and the first to march against the Swedes are the conspirators.

"The third act takes place in Moscow. In a remote part of the gardens, the czar has built a village, the counterpart of Wibord, which serves to remind him of his lost Catherine, Danilowitz (now a prince and field-marshal), and his carpenter's life. Catherine, however, is not dead, but no one dares to tell the czar. The misfortunes of poor Catherine have been too much for her strength and deranged intellect; a violent emotion alone can cure her, the occasion is at hand. Suddenly finding herself once more in her native village, surrounded by her brother and her friends, Catherine at first imagines herself to be dreaming, but, on beholding Peter, she falls senseless into his arms. On recovering, the purple mantle is thrown over her shoulders, her head is crowned with the imperial diadem, the Czar proclaims her, and the court and army salute the Empress."

I shall not stop to criticise this book, in which you will at once detect a strong resemblance to that of Jullien's Pietro il Grande. Nor am I going to trouble you at present with a long analysis of Meyerbeer's music. When I tell you that, in my own opinion, it is the best ever written by the celebrated composer for the stage, I have said all which my prerogative allows me to say. When you hear it yourself you will be able to judge for yourself. Meanwhile, I cannot find better means of describing the "solemnity" of the first performance than by translating into weaker language the brief but enthusiastic report of M. Jules Janin."

"We have come from the Opéra-Comique"—says the brilliant feuilletoniste—"where M. Meyerbeer has just brought out his new chef-d'œuvre, L'Etoile du Nord (drama by M. Scribe), and, without fear of being contradicted by the learned and competent critic who will render account of it in these columns, we venture to assert that the illustrious master has deserved and obtained universal praise. In the new style of music which M. Meyerbeer has created by his genius and subdued by his talent, L'Etoile du Nord is a puissant work, superior and charming in every respect. Never perhaps in so short a space (a comic opera in three acts) has M. Meyerbeer scattered airs, duets, and morceaux-d'ensemble with so prodigal a hand. For L'Etoile du Nord he has composed an overture, and this overture is a capital work. The introduction to the opera, the invocation to Finland, and the charming romance, "Le Bonnet sur l'Oreille," at once interested, charmed, and enchained the attentive crowd which had flocked to the announcement of the master's latest opera. The whole of the first act is a marvel of taste, grace, and invention. You know not which to admire and applaud the most—the romance so well sung by M. Hermann-Léon, the gypsy rondo, the cabaletta, or the finale. There is, among other things, a scene in which Mdlle. Caroline Duprez, like some fairy of the north, calms and subdues by her touching accents the savage children of the desert.

"In the second act (this second act is full of movement, life, and action), the waltz, which serves as introduction, is then sung in chorus, and to-morrow all Paris will be humming the couplet,

'Beau cavalier
Au cœur d'acier!'

"What spirit and what entrain! Now the chorus of conspirators, and the chorus of the orgy; now the couplets of Bataille, and the irresistible song of the vivandières! The last is a drama in action—a thing so new and strange, that it was redemanded unanimously by the audience, amidst thunders of applause. Three bands, vibrating and sonorous, are employed upon the stage in this morceau. They come and go without confusion, supported by the orchestra which M. Tilmant marshals like a true military commander, while the soldiers of the Czar sing the martial hymn, "Ciel, Dieu Protecteur!" which is echoed by the united chorus, in strains that resound in the distance.

"The third act is, so to speak, the résumé and explanation of all the rest. It is as though the author, anxious to be the commentator upon his own work, brought us back into the midst of the incidents of the first two acts, so that nothing should remain uncertain in the mind and intelligence of the audience. A romance for M. Battaille, "O Jours heureux!" a charming duet for Mdlle. Lefebvre and M. Jourdan, "Fusillé!" the touching narration of the journey of the two lovers; the mad scena, "Enfin l'Aurore;" the song of the mênêtriers, "Zon Zon;" and last, not least, the admirable trio for soprano and two flutes (the favourite morceau of Jenny Lind), were all œuvres capitales, applauded to the skies, and like so many enchantments.

"And then, what a fête!—what enthusiasm!—what incredible success! The excellent artists of the Opéra Comique all sang and played in a manner worthy of the master—Battaille with his powerful voice, Mocker, Jourdan, Hermann-Léon, Mdlles. Lefebvre, Lemercier, and Decroix, and the charming and incomparable Caroline Duprez, worthy of her father, her model, and her master!

"To conclude, the reader will perceive that all this is written in haste, after midnight, and in the enthusiasm of the moment.

"JULES JANIN."

Janin would be puzzled to do the duty of reporter to a London morning paper. Where would he hide himself, if, after a new opera at one of the great Italian theatres, a column and a half, or more, of criticism, in small type, were expected of him, "after midnight," on the night of performance, in order to be published next morning in the paper? He would doubtless plead indisposition.

Next week you shall have some more about the Etoile du Nord. For the present, I am exhausted.

IBID.—Mdlle. Wertheimber appeared for the first time on the 13th instant, at the Opéra, as Fides in the Prophète. She was tolerably successful, but could not have appeared at a less favourable moment, as Mdlle Sophie Cruvelli engrosses all the attention of the public. The Vestale will be produced as soon as possible. In addition to the scenery and dresses, which will be of the most splendid description, M. Labarre is charged with arranging the airs for the ballet, which may delay the piece longer than is expected.—On Friday the 17th instant, the representations of Moïse were resumed for the début of the tenor Sig. Brignoli. A new opera called Maître Wolfram has been accepted at the Théâtre Lyrique. The music is by M. Ernest Reyer, and the libretto by Messieurs Méry and Théophile Gautier.—The management of the Théâtre Italien courts alternately the comic and the serious muse. The Sonnambula has been succeeded by the Elisir, but, although the style of the operas vary, the principal actress remains the same. Under the delicate and coquettish features of Adina, we recognise the tender Amina, although greatly altered. Her lips, which opened but to pour forth her sorrows, are wreathed with smiles; her eyes, formerly drowned in tears, flash forth sparkling light, and her voice, smothered by sobs, has recovered its freshness and brilliancy. Such a transformation belongs to great artistes alone; it is a gift which Mdlle. Frezzolini possesses. If this charming cantatrice would but determine not to substitute her own music for that of the composer! Rossi was Dulcamara; Tamburini, Belcore; and Gardoni, Nemorino.—The third concert of the Société Sainte-Cécile, under the direction of Messrs. Seghers and J. B. Wekerlin, took place on Sunday week. Weber's Preciosa formed one of the attractions. Mdme. Nissen sang an air from Spohr's Faust. The Minuetto of a quartet by Mendelssohn was then executed by all the stringed instruments (!), and the concert concluded with Mozart's eighth, and least-known, symphony (in D).—The new symphony of M. Lefebvre-Wély was executed on the same day by the orchestra of the Jeunes Artistes, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, in the Salle Herz. It was successful.—Mdme. Ugalde has returned to Paris, after an absence of five months. She is said to have derived great benefit from her trip to the south. Félix Godefroid and Emile Prudent have also come back. M. Erard's Saloons are to be shortly opened in honour of Mdlle. Rosalie Spohr, the harpist, a relative of the celebrated composer, Dr. Spohr.

Ibid.—Madame Tedesco passed through Paris last week, en route from Brussels to Lyons. M. Roqueplan has refused to prolong her congé. Madame Bosio has achieved a great success in Rossini's Moïse. Mademoiselle Dameron sings the music of Amenophis charmingly, and looks very interesting. This splendid opera, with Madame Bosio, Mdlle. Dameron, and Messrs. Obin, Chapusi, and Brignoli, helps to back up the still increasing success of Sophie Cruvelli in the Huguenots. The admirers of Spontini are awaiting impatiently the production of La Vestale, which, it is expected, will be brought out next Monday. The receipts of the Huguenots continue at their maximum. M. Gounod's opera is in full rehearsal. The two principal parts are confided to Mdlle. Poinsot and M. Gueymard. La Nonne Sanglante, it is expected, will be ready about the middle of May. Sophie Cruvelli's congé begins on the first of June.—At the Opéra-Comique, besides the two-act opera of M. Bazin, a new work, in three acts, by M. Victor Massé, author of Galatée and the Noces de Jeannette, has been rehearsed.—La Fille Invisible, a new opera, in three acts, music by Adrien Boieldieu, libretto by M. de Saint-Georges, has been given at the Théâtre-Lyrique with success. The music of M. Adrien Boieldieu (son of the great Boieldieu) is much in the same style as his former works—neither better nor worse.—A comic opera, in three acts, from the combined pens of MM. de Leuven, Brunswick, and Louis Clapisson, for Madame Cabel and M. Laurent, will succeed La Fille Invisible. Donizetti's Elisabeth still continues its career. In less than two months it has been performed thirty times. An opera, in one act, by M. Reyer, composer of Sélam, has been accepted.—At the Italiens, Don Juan has been revived with immense success. The cast was powerful—Madame Frezzolini, Donna Anna; Madame Cambardi, Elvira; Mad. Alboni, Zerlina; Signor Sussini, the Commandant; Signor Della Aste, Leporello; Sig. Mario, Ottavio: and Sig. Tamburini, Don Juan. Mario created a furore in "Il mio tesoro;" Alboni sang all her music exquisitely, and was encored in "Batti Batti," which, as well as "Vedrai carino," she gave in the right key. Tamburini is still the beau ideal of Don Juan.—Madame Rossi-Caccia has arrived in Paris. She will sing shortly at the Salle Saint-Cécile, in a concert given under the immediate patronage of some ladies of high distinction. Mad. Rossi-Caccia, during her absence from Paris, has been singing at several of the principal towns of Europe. In 1853, she was at the Theatre San Carlo, at Lisbon, when she appeared in Lucrezia Borgia, Linda di Chamouni, Anna Bolena, I Martiri, and an opera composed expressly for her by Mignone. Mad. Rossi-Caccia, we are told, has declined a very lucrative engagement at the Theatre Royal, Turin—where, by the way, the opera is shut up.—The concert of the juvenile pianist, Theodore Ritter, attracted a large assembly. This little fellow is, in reality, an extraordinary performer. He is a true musical phenomenon, and, if not spoiled by over-praise and over-work, promises to rise to the highest eminence in his art. He played a Fugue, Gavotte, et Musette, of Bach, and obtained a rapturous encore. He was also forced to repeat a morceau, founded on the cavatina in Verdi's Ernani. He displays a real feeling for music, and his playing exhibits both taste and expression. In short, he is a prodigy, and must be heard.

Baltimore.—(Extract from a letter, written by a Member of Jullien's Orchestra.) "But talking of excitement, we had enough of that the other day, in coming here from Philadelphia. On reaching the Susquehannah, we found it a mass of floating ice—the steamer could not leave, the jetty being completely jammed in. As we were announced to play here that same evening, cross we must by hook or by crook. A council of war was immediately held, at which some reckless fiddler proposed to cross on foot, and volunteered to act as pioneer, which he did like a brick: so we at once adopted the resolution. A primitive sleigh was improvised for the ladies, and hauled across by a lot of niggers; the orchestral luggage was loaded into three boats mounted on rollers—all except the monster drum, which had to be taken out of its case and rolled across by two life-guardsmen of our troop. All the musicians armed themselves with huge poles to pick the way, except little Colinet, the flageolet player, who could not be prevailed on any account to make the attempt. Consequently, we had to seize him by main force, strap him on to a violoncello-case, and have him pulled over by a lot of young niggers, shouting like devils during the transit. It was a rich scene, certainly, and would be a first rate subject for Punch, under the head of "Jullien's Passage across the Susquehannah."

Cincinnati.—(From a Correspondent).—The sale of tickets for Jullien's Concert, on Friday, was the cause of a rush and a jam unprecedented even when the Jenny Lind furore was at its height in this city. No sooner were the doors opened at eight o'clock in the morning, than a dense crowd rushed in, filling the spacious wareroom of Smith and Nixon's to its utmost capacity. All eagerly pushed forward to the stand, and the rush for precedence beat anything that we ever saw in the world. It literally baffles description, and could only be appreciated by those unfortunately mixed in it. The pressure was so great, that those engaged in the sale, to avoid being crowded upon, had to suspend their labours several times and retreat from place to place, and commence anew under better auspices. They finally took their station at the door looking out of the Concert room, obliging purchasers of tickets to pass through it one by one, a plan that succeeded to some extent in allaying the confusion. We thought the crowd at one time, in their eagerness, would break down the door, which it required great strength to hold against them. Those who were in were squeezed nearly to death, and many would gladly have got out—but that was almost as impracticable as to go ahead. We saw persons struggling to get at the ticket box at ten o'clock in the morning, who had been there two hours without succeeding, and how much longer they remained we do not know. Almost everyone that did get forward bought a considerable number of tickets for their friends—indeed the most of them were sold in that way. In consequence of the great demand, they are to be sold at auction to-day. The following quaint and clever notice of Jullien's opening concert appeared in our leading paper:

"The opportunity of buying is not generally to be overlooked, and the application of the rule to groceries and the fine arts, is perhaps the result of pretty much the same principle. This bringing music down to a plain tea-and-sugar standard first made Jullien's money (we came near saying fame.) He was the first man of his generation who conceived and executed the idea of giving the public the best article in the greatest quantities and at the smallest price. For his large bills he was satisfied to receive small notes, and accordingly they were pitched in by the hat-full. His grand orchestra at Paris, and his immense promenade concerts at Old Drury in London, brought him a full harvest, night after night, to be threshed out, over and over again, with the same magical and untiring baton. This Orphic full moon, to whom a neap tide of impatient and delighted ears was always ready to rise, has, within the last six months, appeared above our own horizon, and, after shining through the usual morning of a star in the east, now stands at our own zenith. His appearance at Smith and Nixon's last night was of course one of the leading musical events of the winter, and packed the Hall from gallery to foot-lights. We regretted then, more than ever, that the limited capacity of the room prevented many from obtaining admission, and gave us the bugle and drum accompaniments in a quantity of air more mellowing upon our own tympanum than upon their reverberations. Jullien of course did not bring his monster New York band along with him. He proposed it; but Smith and Nixon protested against the danger of having their roof lifted off. Neither did he bring the paper muslin and gilt paper lace that transformed dingy old Castle Garden into a fairy palace, nor did his famous desk, dressed in scarlet and supported by the pensive seraph, petrified into well chased gold, nor the gilded chair with which his dignity had been supported before the Gothamites. A plainer equipment was better suited to the democrative natives of this Anti-Miami country. Neither did he wear that vest we have read of, that seemed to be constructed of etherial soft down and overlaid with a cloud, a mere mist of the finest lace, all of which might have come in for a share of our enthusiasm. No, Jullien was himself only: a substantial looking gentleman, whose sympathy with melody has kept his bile down and his appetite up—a logician in physics, who has sustained the high key his ear has been strained to by a proportionate tension of the epigastrium; an eye that must have been very expressive, if we could have but seen it, and an ear that we would have borrowed an opera-glass to examine, if it had not been concealed by a wealth of shining black curls, hung around them like curtains, to tone down the tempests of sound they are compelled to live in. His dress was as plain as Secretary Marcy could have ordered for a diplomatist; as plain as a candidate for Congress might wear at a soirée, or an editor on his wedding-night, and, upon the whole, was a refined acknowledgment to our democratic simplicity. But then his gloves were immaculate; a telescope would have failed to discover a spot on their taper-fingers—a trifling fact, by the way, which we should not have mentioned, if they had not played the leading part in the orchestra. There were occasions when Jullien looked as if he might be only a conductor, when we should not have suspected that that sedate air and amplitude of shirt bosom concealed more than an ordinary mortal, even in music. But then, when the inspiration of the moment seemed to rest upon him, no general ever led an army to storm a fortress with more enthusiasm than he his orchestra against the complicated difficulties that were heaped up, along almost insurmountable bars of next-to-unconquerable symphonies and variations. He plied his bâton relentlessly, this way and that, as if infinite unseen enemies were being thumped on the head. Then he would have his players touch their instruments so gently that their soft sound should not offend the ear of the old Norwegian God, who would lay and hear the grass grow on the mountains and the wool on the sheep's back. Then so gently Jullien waved his hand, that you would have guessed the music was only the noise of his scented glove coquetting with the enamoured air. He seemed to brood over it as if it were some heavenly stranger that must be delicately nursed to enable it to survive the mutations of our lower atmosphere. But when a grand finale was in order, and avalanches of sound were to be rolled down imaginary Alps and plunged into the profound depths of acoustic Niagaras, and the hall was to be made to rock with the roaring and crashing of forty man power upon all sorts of drums and trumpets, then the king conductor would bow himself submissively—and then throw himself up majestically, as if he would invoke all the thunders of Jove down upon the audience. Jullien is a monarch of sound—a Lord High Admiral on the ocean of melody—a perfect brick in the temple of music—we don't doubt it."

There is every chance of Jullien doing famously in the "South." There has been no real excitement in these parts since the "Swedish Nightingale" was here; Jullien seems likely to awake us—"niggers" and all.

DRESDEN—(From a Correspondent.)—The musical world here has been thrown into a state of real excitement lately. Two concerts were given, at the Theatre Royal, at which Jenny Lind sang. At the first, a prologue was spoken by one of the actors. Beethoven's overture to Egmont was performed by the orchestra, under the direction of Capellmeister Reissiger. At the first concert, Jenny Lind sang "On mighty Pens," from the Creation, a rondo from Meyerbeer's Camp of Silesia, "Die Sterne schau'n in stiller Nacht," by Mendelssohn, and a Norwegian Berglied. At the second, she sang "Casta diva" from Norma; "Glocklein im Thale," from Euryanthe; "Non paventar," from Il Flauto Magico; and German and Norwegian ballads. The renowned songstress sang as marvellously as ever, and her voice is in first-rate order. I have heard more feeling and more power given to the "Casta diva," but nothing could surpass the brilliancy of the "Nightingale" in Meyerbeer's rondo, or the purity of voice and perfect intonation in the difficult and trying "Non paventar." Weber's aria too, was a superb display of vocalisation. Both concerts were given for charitable purposes, and mainly through the suggestion of Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt herself, who offered her services gratuitously. A concert was given on the 14th ult., (February) at Leipsic for the same charitable purposes, at which the famous songstress again gave her invaluable assistance gratuitously. So that, if Jenny Lind has abandoned the stage, she has not forsaken the poor-box.

AMIENS.—The last concert of the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of M. Jules Deneux, took place on the 15th ult. Alboni and Sig. Gardoni were the principal singers. Alboni gave "Una Voce" from Il Barbiere, the "Brindisi," from Lucrezia Borgia, and the rondo finale from Cenerentola, besides singing in a duet from Don Pasquale with Sig. Gardoni. The success of the great soprano-contralto was incredible. Sig. Gardoni charmed every one, as usual, with the purity of his voice, his perfect style, and excellent method.

BERLIN.—On the anniversary of the coronation, the 22nd of January, the following artists received the order of the Red Eagle, fourth class: Herren Kelz, Wieprecht, and Kullak.—The Intendant of the Royal Theatres, Herr von Hülsen, has resolved that, in future, both the opera-houses and the Schauspielhaus shall be opened every night. Up to the present moment each theatre has been open, on an average, only three days a week. Mdlle. Clauss has arrived here, and has been creating quite an enthusiasm by her admirable performances on the pianoforte.

HAMBURGH.—Auber's Marco Spada has been produced with success. The prima donna, Fräulein Babnigg, leaves shortly for Rio Janeiro, where she is engaged at an annual salary of 30,000 francs. The next musical novelty is to be Mr. Pierson's music to the second part of Faust. Mr. Pierson is the author of the oratorio of Jerusalem, which was brought out two years ago at the Norwich Festival.—Theresa Milanollo has given four concerts to crowded houses.

VIENNA.—The representation of Don Juan, on the 17th, was the 344th in Vienna. The house was densely crowded. On the 17th of February, the third concert this year was given by the Akademie der Tonkunst. It was to have taken place on the 3rd of February, in celebration of Mendelssohn's birthday, but was unavoidably postponed. The programme consisted entirely of works by that great master. The various pieces, vocal and instrumental, were entrusted to pupils of the Academy, and, as the latter has not been long established, the execution (of the instrumental pieces especially) was a task beyond the strength of the performers. The first part, consequently, went off in anything but a satisfactory manner. The second was far superior. The choruses: Herbstlied, Lerchengesang, and "Es wird ein Stern aus Jacob aufgeh'n," were admirably rendered. Fräulein Purkinje sang two songs, Sonntagslied and Frühlingslied (the latter in the Suabian dialect), very well, and was unanimously encored. Fräulein Haueis was equally successful in the charming Erntelied, and the incomparable "Da lieg' ich unter den Bäumen," found among Mendelssohn's papers after his death. The choruses were under the direction of Herr Storch.—On the 19th of February, the second concert of the violoncellist, Heinrich Schmit, from Moscow, took place in the Musikvereinsaal.—M. Vieuxtemps lately gave his third concert in the Theater an der Wien to a very crowded audience. He played his concertos in E major and A major, his Norma fantasia on one string, the Caprice-Fantaisie, the variations on Yankee Doodle, Les Arpèges, the Andante Spianato, and the Carnival of Venice. M. Vieuxtemps was rapturously applauded in all of them. The programme was varied by some overtures, under the direction of Herr Suppé, with songs by Herr Rudolf, Mesdames Rudini and Schiller.—Herr Stockhausen's first concert took place on the 26th February. The principal attractions were Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli* (whose singing produced quite a sensation), and M. Vieuxtemps.—M. Leopold de Meyer's first concert is announced for the 4th inst.—Eleven new operas were produced in Germany during the year 1853:—Tony, Zoggeli, Rübezahl, Rübezahl, Die lebenden Blumen, Otto der Falkner, Die Fransosen vor Nizza, Sarontala, Giulia, Indra, and Keolanthe.

MODENA.—Mercadante's Il Giuramento has been produced with great success. Mesdames Boccabadati and Wimmer, Sig. Tamaro (tenor) and Sig. Baraldi (barytone), were the singers.

* Sister of Sophie Cruvelli.

QUARTET CONCERTS, CROSBY HALL.—The selection for the fourth concert, on Monday, was from Beethoven alone. The instrumental pieces were the trio in D for stringed instruments, the quintet in B flat for pianoforte and wind instruments, the grand septuor in E flat, and the quartet in C minor (No. 4, Op. 18). Mr. Lindsay Sloper was the pianist, and Miss Dolby the vocalist. In the quintet, Mr. Sloper's clear and delicate touch was specially effective. The execution of the first four movements of the septuor was perfectly satisfactory: the last two movements might have been better. The last quartet was played very finely. The "Song of the Quail" was charmingly sung by Miss Dolby. The fifth concert is announced to take place on the 13th inst.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN many respects, the events at Mannheim were merely a repetition of those at Munich—a flattering reception at Court, brilliant successes, extensive patronage, promises and honeyed words from the Court Intendant, an endeavour to obtain an appointment, and a flat refusal—in a word, nothing was changed in the comedy except the scene and the dramatis personæ. The only difference was that our hero met with rather more flattery at Court. The impression he had produced in this capital, on the occasion of his first visit, fourteen years before, was still remembered amongst the lovers of music. They crowded round the little prodigy, and Cannabich presented him to the members of the orchestra which he directed. "I thought," says Mozart, "that I should not be able to refrain from laughing. Some, who knew me par renommée, were very polite and full of respect; others, however, who never heard my name, stared at me in the most absurd fashion. They think, because I am small and young, there is nothing great or old about me, but they shall soon learn the contrary." After paying a visit to the Intendant, Count Saviola, Mozart obtained the honour of playing before the Court. The Elector of the Palatinate, Carl Theodore (afterwards Elector of Bavaria), condescended to address him in the following terms—remarkably gracious considering the period: "It is now, I think, fifteen years since He was here?" "Yes, your Highness, it is fifteen years since I had that honour." "He plays incomparably." The Elector proved that he was, in truth, exceedingly pleased. He had four natural children, a son and three daughters, who were studying music. The Intendant was immediately commanded to take Mozart to see them. Mozart went several days in succession, and his visits gradually assumed the form of regular lessons, at which the Elector was present and conversed on various subjects with the new teacher. Some variations composed by Mozart for the young Countess, and a rondo for the little Count, were declared to be most charming. "By the bye, you stop this winter in Mannheim?" said the governess, in a tone which, from the mouth of a patron or superior, conveyed an agreeable piece of news in the semblance of an interrogation. Mozart replied that as yet he knew nothing about it. "That surprises me," answered the governess. "The Elector himself informed me so, a short time since. 'By the bye,' he said, 'Mozart will stop here this winter.'" Full of the most sanguine hopes, Mozart hurried off to Count Saviola. "As the Elector wishes me to remain," said Mozart, "he surely does not intend me to spend my money at an inn, but to continue the course of instruction, which I have hitherto voluntarily given?" The Intendant replied that he should only feel too happy to use all his influence for the protégé of the governess. From another quarter, Mozart was led to hope that he would easily obtain the title and appointments of Chamber-composer, the offices of Capellmeister being already both filled up. His affairs were, therefore, exactly in the position he desired. All now requisite was the signature of the Elector, who was, doubtless, impatient to affix it to the decree which would insure the acquisition of so incomparable an artist. The first obstacles were certain gala days, when it was impossible for the Intendant to speak to his highness on the subject. After these, a hunting-party most inopportunely deferred the conclusion of the matter. Meanwhile, time passed on, and Mozart lost patience. But, alas! while he was running himself off his legs to obtain the decisive answer for which he had been waiting two months, his artistic brethren, who did not, it is true, understand counterpoint like him, but were far better acquainted with the ways of the Court, had succeeded in undermining his influence with the Elector, which had appeared to be daily increasing. They had alarmed Carl Theodore's paternal solicitude, by directing his attention to the unfavourable results which a change of masters must invariably entail. "Who is this Mozart," they would ask, "for whom the former master, an old and well-tried servant, is to be sacrificed?—a little adventurer, a charlatan, with an annual salary of twelve florins, whom the Archbishop of Salzburg discharged—*because he knows nothing, and ought to have been sent to Naples to learn music in the Conservatory. Should such a one be appointed chamber-composer at a princely court! or attempt to teach his highness's children what he did not understand himself!" These and similar arguments accomplished the object for which they were urged. Mozart, remarking that Count Saviola avoided him, requested a decided answer at once. The Count shrugged his shoulders. "What, no answer yet?" demanded Mozart. "I beg pardon," replied the Count, "there is no place for you. "Eh bien!" said Mozart, "the Elector might have told me so sooner. Nevertheless, Count, pray thank him in my name for this gracious, though tardy, information."

The Abbé Vogler, Vice-capellmeister in Mannheim, seems to have been the most active and malicious of those who endeavoured to undermine Mozart's position—at least, according to the decided statement of Leopold Mozart in one of his letters. As the assertion, however, is not easy to be proved, it may, perhaps, have been grounded on mere suspicion. One thing, however, is beyond a doubt, viz., Mozart's repugnance to this same Abbé Vogler. He frequently met him at Mannheim, and his judgment of him, as a composer, a theorist, and a man, was equally severe. We must consider this question somewhat at length, for two reasons: firstly, the Abbé Vogler enjoys, among educated musicians, a threefold reputation—as composer, theorist, and distinguished organ player,* while Mozart formally denies him the least merit in any one of these capacities; secondly, which is far more important, if there was ever a man who judged musicians, living or dead, with the greatest impartiality and penetration, uninfluenced by the ideas and prejudices of the period, that man was Mozart—as we shall see further on. This instance, however, presents an anomaly, or, at least, an apparent injustice, springing from personal motives, which seems to have rendered Mozart guilty for once in his life of wrong towards another. And yet he was not deceived in Vogler, and was equally innocent of injustice to him. Let us hear him :—

"The Vice-capellmeister, Vogler, is a jester, who thinks himself very clever, but knows nothing at all. His history is as follows. He came to Mannheim in a miserable plight—played pianoforte, and wrote a ballet. He was pitied, and the Elector sent him to Italy. When the latter went to Bologna, he asked Father Valotti about his protégé—'O, Altezza, questo è un gran uomo," etc. He also requested the opinion of Father Martini—'Altezza, è buono, ma poco a poco quando sera un poco più vecchio, più sodo si farà, si farà.' On his return, Vogler embraced the ecclesiastical profession, and was appointed Court Chaplain. He composed a Miserere, which, as everyone says, is insupportable, since everything in it is false. Hearing it was not greatly admired, he complained to the Elector that the orchestra had played it badly, on purpose to annoy him. In a word, he managed matters so well (playing also a number of worthless trifles, which ingratiated him with the women), that he got appointed Vice-capellmeister. He is a fool, and imagines that no one is more perfect than himself. His book is more calculated to teach arithmetic than composition. He says he can make a composer in three weeks, and a singer in six months, but no one has ever seen any proofs of this. He despises the greatest masters, and told me that he had a contempt for Bach! I felt inclined to catch hold of him by the ears; but, pretending I had not heard him, I said nothing, and went away."

Mozart speaks in the following terms of a mass by Vogler :—

"I never, in my life, heard anything like it. Very often the parts do not agree at all. He rushes into tune so furiously, that you fancy he will drag you after him by the hair of your head, and without the slightest ceremony,—as if it were unnecessary to attract by any peculiar charm. Of the development of his ideas, I will say nothing. At one moment, I fancy I hear a thought which is not bad; but it is certain not to remain not bad very long—but soon becomes—beautiful?—Heaven forbid that I should assert such a thing!—bad, very bad, and that in two or three different ways. Hardly is the idea presented, when some thing else turns up to spoil it; or it does not end in a sufficiently natural manner to remain good; or it does not come in at the proper places, or else it is spoilt by the instrumentation."

Mozart judges Vogler's organ-playing no less severely than his compositions.

"He is, so to speak, nothing more than a mere trickster. When he wishes to play in the majestic style, he immediately becomes dry, and his audience are extremely glad the affair is as tedious to him as to them, and consequently does not last long. And what follows?—an unintelligible conversation. (I heard him from a distance). After which he began a fugue, with six notes to a tone and presto.* Hereupon, I went up to him, for I would prefer looking on to listening."

Vogler invited Mozart, on several occasions, to come and see him. As Mozart, however, never went, the Capellmeister determined to pay the first visit, so anxious was he to know our hero's strength on the piano, and, at the same time, to exhibit his own. Vogler played one of Mozart's concertos at sight.

"The first movement went presto, the second allegro, and the rondo unmistakeably prestissimo. He generally played the bass otherwise than it was written, sometimes producing quite a different harmony and quite a different melody. To play at sight in this manner, and——is a thing I do not care about. The auditors (I mean those worthy of the name) must say they have ——seen music played upon the piano. They listen and——feel as little as——himself. You may imagine that it was insupportable, by my not being able to refrain from saying: 'Much too quick!' By the way, it is easier to play quick than slow.† In certain passages, the performer can leave a few notes in the lurch without their being missed, but is that fine playing? In rapid execution he can change from the right to the left hand, without being noticed, but is that fine playing? In what does the art of reading at sight consist?—In playing the pieces in correct time, and imparting to every note and appoggiatura its proper expression and character, so that the hearers shall believe that the player and the composer are one. Vogler's fingering is wretched. He plays descending scales with the first finger and thumb of the right hand."

The first thing which strikes us in Mozart's criticisms on Vogler's playing is, that they are supported by sufficient reasons, and grounded on the enumeration of glaring defects which must be at once apparent to musicians. Moreover, he writes to his father, whom of all persons he would least desire to deceive, and whom, indeed, he would have found great difficulty in deceiving. Without wishing to deny that Mozart was inwardly convinced of the justness of his opinions, it may be suggested that he expressed them with a certain degree of harshness. But the fact is, he was as incapable of concealing as of mitigating the truth. This was his greatest mistake and his greatest misfortune. As he always spoke as a man who is invariably in the right, we are hardly surprised that worldly matters should have gone no better with him. The question whether his language, with regard to Vogler, as theorist and composer, did not lay Mozart open to blame, remains to be considered.

Before investigating this point, we must have a clear idea of the time at which he pronounced his decision.

In 1777, the Abbé Vogler was not the man he subsequently became: it was not until after the death of Mozart, who was seven years his junior, that he obtained his reputation in Germany. At the time of which we are treating, nothing was known of him, except his first compositions and his book. Besides, I believe, that which distinguished Vogler in music, was not so much his superior artistic talent, as an assemblage of qualities indispensable to a musician, and which elevated his original and investigating spirit. He had a speculative mind, and was a mass of varied acquirements, some of which did not exactly belong to music, but were connected with it as useful auxiliaries. If he really possessed genius, it was for music and mechanics, as is proved by his system for the simplification of the organ, and by the beautiful instrument called an Orchestrion, which he invented. At a time, therefore, when nothing, or, at least, very little of all this was known, Mozart could only judge Vogler by what he had then done. Mozart was a musician in the fullest acceptation of the term; but he was nothing more. He estimated Vogler as a composer, a practical artist, and the author of a musical theory, and was far less competent to appreciate him in the last character than in the others. Our hero despised theories,* and were we to examine those which were current in his time, we should, perhaps, find his contempt justified. Supposing this to be true, we may be allowed to believe that Vogler improved in composition, became more toned down upon the organ, and played pianoforte music in a manner less offensive to the self-love of composers.

It is, therefore, highly probable that Mozart might have modified his opinion. But would he have turned black into white? I doubt it, and for these reasons. From the biographical notices of Vogler, and the testimony of his pupils, among whom was Gottfried Weber,† we learn that the originality of the learned Abbé was carried to eccentricity, and that his theories were nearly allied to paradox. But very frequently, and this is the worst feature of the whole, his eccentricity and paradox are thin veils for unmitigated charlatanism; for instance, as an example of the application of his theory for composing imitative music, he announces, in the programme of one of his concerts, a sea-fight, the falling of the walls of Jericho, the treading-out of the rice in Africa, and other such tone-paintings, the relation of which to the subjects he sought to represent would certainly have been imperceptible to the public, but for the announcement in large letters on the bills. Vogler had a mania for reviving the music of the Ancients, about which he knew as much as any of us—viz., little or nothing. Nevertheless, he advertised that he would prove its excellence to the artistic world. And what course did he take? He got a few choral melodies, written in the old church-style, which some have been pleased to call the "Greek," the stiffness and extraordinary poverty of which—being composed entirely of scales, deficient in connection and wanting a solid basis—were not adapted to the ordinary transitions from one key to another. It was, therefore, necessary, in order to make the tunes agree with the other parts, to invent a most peculiar combination of chords and the most unusual transitions; something, in short, which had never been attempted. Professional men are aware that, with such means, there is no melody, however vapid, out of which genius cannot make something beautiful—indeed, very beautiful.§ What for instance, would be the part of the ghost in Don Juan, were the accompaniment taken away?‖ There would be absolutely nothing musical in it. In this manner, the Abbé Vogler, by means of a learned and far-fetched system of harmony, produced an effect which the melodies of the chorales could never have produced of themselves, the result being that, with his arrangements, they made an impression both unexpected and majestic. But Vogler said: "There, gentlemen; that was Greek music." The deluded hearers were lost in amazement at its incomparable beauty (!!—Trans.), and the critics seized the opportunity to cry out against modern music, which, in its poverty, had nothing to show but transitions from one key to another, from sharp to flat. The Ancients, on the contrary, who were acquainted neither with the one nor the other, founded upon every scale a separate tonic system, each placed in its own genuine and solemn sphere, and, besides the Diatonic and Chromatic, possessed the wonderful secret of the Enharmonic, which has since become inaccessible to our vulgar ears, because it proceeds by fourths! The mystification is so amusing that we feel inclined to forgive the Abbé Vogler for having played the part of a conjurer. Mystification is the word that best expresses our idea. Vogler knew better than any one that the music of the Ancients was enveloped in impenetrable obscurity, and that under the chaos of uncertainty and inexplicable contradictions which constitutes our whole knowledge of it, there is one fact beyond doubt, viz., that the Greeks were unacquainted with harmony. In order, therefore, to inspire us with a taste for these so-called Greek melodies, he subjects them to the rules of vocal music in parts, and enriches them with additions from the most refined inventions of modern art, of which the Ancients, who seem to have sung only in unison and in the octave, had not the most distant notions.*

This leaning towards charlatanism may have been particularly evident in Vogler when young, and especially while his claims on the respect of the learned and musical world did not meet with the recognition they afterwards obtained. We thus see him striving after effects, contrary to the true principles of art, and only capable of deceiving the ignorant. As a composer of sacred music, he mixes up everything, pell-mell, in one confused mass, and presents his ideas in quick succession, without developing any one of them. As an organist, he degrades the grandest and most sublime of instruments, by his exaggerated execution. As an interpreter of the ideas of others, he changes their respective places according to his own caprice, and confuses them by too great rapidity, even under the nose of the composer—whom he executes, in the judicial sense of the word. Was not this sufficient to justify the repugnance felt by Mozart, that unbending enemy of charlatanism, whatever shape it might assume? Mozart detected charlatanism instinctively, and despised it to the last day of his life; his contempt, indeed, for all calculation based upon the ignorance of audiences, and for effects in opposition to the rules of good taste, went so far, that he would sacrifice his own interests and popularity rather than allow them to obtain the upper hand over his musical convictions. He who affected to despise Bach,† and boasted of being able to teach the art of composition in three weeks, could not possibly be a man after Mozart's own heart. Such a one was necessarily his very antipodes. "Vogler is a musical charlatan," said Mozart, in his somewhat candid language, and this one phrase forcibly expresses the opposition, the complete incompatibility, in the dispositions of the men.

MENDELSSOHN.

After the Düsseldorf festival, the committee of managers presented the composer of St. Paul with an illustrated copy of his own work. The memorable incidents in the life of the Apostle had been selected as subjects, and the five artists who contributed were Schrötter, Hübner, Steinbrück, Mücke, and Hensel, Mendelssohn's own brother-in-law. Many important alterations were made in the score of the oratorio after its first production in public. Ten pieces were cut out entirely, and the first great air of St. Paul (in B minor), as it now exists, is scarcely half its original length. The short air for soprano, in F, which stands in the second part, was added; and the whole of the music, in its renovated state, appeared in another and improved edition. Almost immediately after his triumph at Düsseldorf, Felix set out for Frankfort-on-the-Maine, where he had undertaken to direct the "Cäcilienverein" for his friend Schelble, whose health obliged him for a time to give up working. This society always stood well in Mendelssohn's estimation, in consequence of the precision and correctness with which Sebastian Bach's motets were executed at its performances; but, independently of musical attractions, Frankfort found other substantial charms for him —as we shall see hereafter. It was from this place that he wrote to a friend in the freshness and simplicity of a child's feelings, that, "Wenn er länger in Frankfurt bliebe, würde er gewiss noch ein eifriger Gärtner werden." These are but a few trifling words, but they are from one in whose eloquent songs we recognise the lover of Nature in all her changes, her darkness and light, her rain and sunshine. Rich in his portraitures of Her, he has left us strains which whisper of all seasons. We have his harvest songs, his autumn songs; and, when winter comes, the morose and joyless will smile at those fragments, so full of delicate imagery of the flowers we can no longer gather, and beauty which must be hidden for a time. Here was the secret of the artist, here the talisman of the poet: Felix loved nature, and told of her; the fruits of his converse with her he has left to us; possessed of these, we should adore her likewise. The tender and pathetic strains in the opening of the Elijah:—

> "The harvest now is over,
> And the summer days are gone,"

speak for their author at once as an earnest and faithful devotee of Nature in her daily ministry. In a word, he was one who, with a great modern critic on art, knew and felt that the meadow grass meshed with fairy rings is better than the wood pavement cut into hexagons—that the fresh winds and sunshine of the upland are better than the chokedamp of the vault or the gaslight of the ball-room. But to return to our narrative.

During his stay in Frankfort, Felix was introduced to a family of the name of Jeanrenaud, and found in the youngest daughter, Cecilia, the future partner of his fortunes. We can say but little of this amiable lady, who lived long enough after her husband's death to know and feel the depth of the public regret, as well as of her own private sorrow; but we believe her to have been in every way worthy the love of so illustrious a man.

In the October of 1836, Felix returned to Leipsic, and opened the Gewandhaus Concerts, assisted by David, Graban, and others already mentioned. The only failure of this season seems to have been a Sinfonia Appassionata, by Franz Lachner, which was condemned by the most learned and severe judges, as unworthy of the author and the performers. The resources of this celebrated company of musicians were displayed to great advantage in Handel's Israel in Egypt, on which Felix bestowed the most ardent pains, adding full organ accompaniments, and repeatedly rehearsing the mighty chain of choruses which stamp this oratorio as one of the most enduring works the world has ever heard. It was finely executed in the Pauliner Kirche, on the 7th of November, 1836, by a body of 250 singers, with a powerful orchestra and organ. The solos were given by Henrietta Graban, Augusta Harkort (an amateur), Stölpe, Hering, Pögner, and Richter. The last concert of this season was on the 12th of December. After Beethoven's concerto in E flat had been played by Mendelssohn, the overture called Meerstille und Glückliche Fahrt awoke the old enthusiasm, which rose to tremendous applause in the last chorus of Fidelio, "Wer ein holdes Weib errungen, stimm' in unsern Jubel ein." In these words there seemed a pointed allusion to a certain Frankfort lady, whose fame and attractions had reached the ears of the Leipsic folk; and Mendelssohn, conscious of the good wishes of all before him, seized the moment of inspiration, sat down at the pianoforte, and extemporised in a wonderful manner on the subject of Beethoven's chorus. When he had finished, genuine and hearty as was the applause, it seemed almost a sin to disturb the last echo which his fancy had inspired with such enchanting sounds.

I should have mentioned before that this winter was remarkable at Leipsic for introducing to the public a highly accomplished pupil of Mendelssohn's, whose compositions and pianoforte playing had attracted much attention. William Sterndale Bennett* had shewn good proof of the reality and earnestness of his studies under Mendelssohn by his pianoforte concerto in C minor, and an overture, Die Wald-Nymphe, added considerably to his reputation in Germany and elsewhere. It is no depreciation to this artist's justly-acquired fame and well-earned laurels, when we say, that in his subsequent productions it is easy to see the influence of his great master; nor can it be thought strange that a pupil so deeply versed in Mendelssohn's works should insensibly be led to select them as his models. The Gewandhaus Concerts this season terminated with a grand performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and Felix gave his undivided attention to the rehearsals of his own oratorio lately brought out at Düsseldorf. The choral bodies of Leipsic mustered all their strength, and bestowed the same labour and patience upon the concerted pieces as, on a previous occasion, on those of Handel's Israel in Egypt. Felix attended all the rehearsals, and accompanied the music on a wretched piano. Still, the most powerful impression was made on the listener by the various choruses and chorales which have since become as "familiar as household words." The oratorio was given for the first time, at Leipsic, on the 16th of March, 1837, in the Pauliner Kirche we have before spoken of. Unhappily, a temporary illness deprived Mendelssohn of his chief bass singer, who was to have sung the music allotted to St. Paul. The gentleman who came to the rescue at the last moment sang so far successfully as not to impair the general effect, but Graban seems to have been the most distinguished of the solo singers. The chorus consisted of three hundred voices, and the results of the performance were thus commented on in the Leipsic newspaper:—

* Mr. Sterndale Bennett was never at any time a pupil of Mendelssohn. His third concerto was composed before he went to Düsseldorf (in 1836) where Mendelssohn heard it for the first time.—Ed.

"The powerful orchestra worked in a masterly manner under the bâton of the conductor, Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The choruses, which had been carefully rehearsed, were delivered with a roundness, power, and distinctness of light and shade, that call for the highest encomiums we can with sincerity offer. Above all, let praise be given to whom praise is due—to the composer and conductor, Dr. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The committee are anxious also to express their obligations to the orchestra, the chorus singers, and to Ferdinand David, for their unwearied attention to the rehearsals, which have been productive of such great results."

This celebrated work, the merits of which, as a whole, are now universally recognised, was, and is still, open to a fair and impartial criticism. If viewed in comparison with the prescribed forms of other sacred musical dramas, it must be allowed that St. Paul has its weak points. The personality and presence of St. Paul are kept too much in the background at the time of St. Stephen's martyrdom, and none will doubt that the second part of the work is far inferior to the first in point of dramatic interest.* But the prevalent idea which is current through the whole work, is of a higher and more general importance, and Mendelssohn wished this distinctly to be marked as detached from the individual character of the Apostle himself, whose name forms the title and subject of the oratorio. He had before him the great triumphs of Christianity in the early stages of the gospel mission, the Apostle's humility and gladness to live and die for the Lord, contrasted with the obstinate pride of Judaism and the sensual self-satisfied heathen (die sinnlich heitere Lebensanschauung des Heidenthums). He wished to express the infatuated opposition of the learned and luxurious to the steady growth of the Gospel, and influence of its teachers, together with the glorious victory won by the messengers of divine love, "who preach us the Gospel of Peace." These thoughts are embodied in the music given to St. Paul, Stephen, and Barnabas, while the interest concentrates in the great centre (Mittelpunct) of the work—the conversion of St. Paul himself. An objection has been raised to the composer's assigning the voice from Heaven to a chorus of soprano voices, and it has been urged that it might have been expressed by a powerful accompaniment of a wind instrument; but surely these are futile criticisms, and must give way to the general effect produced on the most ordinary hearer. How are we startled by the chorus, "Mache dich auf, werde Licht," which comes like a flash from Heaven on the earthly darkness below—how majestic the chorale, "Awake, a Voice is calling," and the prophetic songs of triumph in distinction to the clamorous cries of the heathens and Jews. All these fine perceptions of the different states of feeling which pervaded the various sects in the early days of Christianity, can be traced by comparing the different choruses. Such as "Behold, we count them blessed which have endured," and "Oh, the Depth of the Riches, Wisdom, and Knowledge of God," with "This Man ceaseth not," "Here is the Temple of the Lord," "The Gods are come to us in the Likeness of Men," etc. In all these, the elements of Judaism, Christianity, and Heathenism are powerfully marked, and the music owes much of its effect to the grand orchestral combinations with which the work abounds. I believe the chorale is brought to perfection in this oratorio, and though it may be said that a like effect is produced by the great Sebastian Bach, yet even this would enhance the value of a work by one who, a century later, could revive the song in all its freshness, with the additional beauties supplied by modern art.

* We beg leave to doubt both this and what precedes.—ED.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

THE new Prussian law, concerning "The protection of copyrights of works of arts and sciences," contains the following paragraphs, which are of importance to composers:—"Any author of a dramatic or dramatico-musical work publishing it, can preserve for himself and his heirs the exclusive right for public performance of the same work, by claiming a legal notice for the purpose, which, however, must be printed within every copy. This right extends for the life of the author, and remains in force for his heirs for ten years after his death.

"Whosoever, without a proper authority given by the author, shall perform such a work, shall be fined from five to fifty dollars. If such performance takes place on any stage,* half of the proceeds shall be forfeited, two-thirds for the author or his heirs, and one-third for the poor of the place where the aforesaid performance shall take place."

* Without permission of the author, or his heirs.

THE LONDON ORCHESTRA has accepted a lucrative engagement for Four Concerts, to be given on March 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, in the Industrial Exhibition, Dublin. The performances will consist of classical and popular music, and Miss Thirlwall is engaged as Vocalist. Mr. Frank Mori is the Conductor.

MUSIC AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—A court for the reception of musical instruments is in course of construction at the Crystal Palace, the design of which has been entrusted to Mr. Thomas. We understand that some of the most eminent of our pianoforte makers have visited Sydenham with a view of offering practical advice in reference to its general arrangement. The maintenance of an equable temperature has been secured, and scientific attention has been directed to making the court as effective as possible for the exhibition of musical instruments.

MR. LUCAS'S MUSICAL EVENINGS.—An excellent programme was provided by Mr. Lucas for the visitors to his first Chamber Concert, on the evening of the 2nd instant, at his residence, in Berners Street. The selection was as varied as it was sterling. It comprised Mozart's quartet, No. 2; Hummel's grand duet sonata, in A flat, for two performers on the piano; Spohr's quartet, in E minor (No. 2, Op. 45); Schubert's trio, Op. 99, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Beethoven's quartet No. 6, Op. 13. Mr. Lucas was assisted in the quartets, etc., by Messrs. Sainton, Cooper, and Hill. With such admirable executants, the performances could not fail to be satisfactory; and it is hardly too much to say that the three quartets were perfectly executed. Miss Jackson, a pupil of Herr Pauer, is one of the most promising young pianists we have heard for some time. Her execution is neat and brilliant, and her taste unexceptionable. Hummel's clever and showy, but lengthy and patchy duet, was played in first-rate style by this young lady and her instructor. It is invariably asked at these concerts—"Why does not Mr. Lucas, who has written so much instrumental music, treat his patrons and friends now and then to one of his own compositions?"

MR. JARRETT'S OPERATIC TROUPE.—The performances of this Operatic Company in the provinces were brought to a termination on Thursday, the 2nd instant, at Glasgow. Mr. Wood, the entrepreneur for Scotland, was called for, and made a speech, in which he praised the artists and thanked the public. Mr. Wood's address was received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Jarrett and his troupe have gone to Dublin to sing at a concert at the Exhibition. The success achieved by Madame Caradori, Herr Reichart, and Herr Formes, in their late tournée, has been chronicled by the whole provincial press.

A CONCERT on a large scale will be given at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 5th, under the direction of Herr Sommer, for the benefit of the orphans and widows of the workmen killed last year at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham. Mr. Sims Reeves and other artists have volunteered their services.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The second performance of the Creation was given by this society last night, at Exeter Hall, with the same artists as before. The Hall was crowded.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The first concert of the old Philharmonic Society is the alarm bell which announces the commencement of the bonâ fide Musical Season in London. The New Philharmonic follows—then the Italian Opera, with its accompanying flight of exotic singing birds—and then we are in the midst of it. The air is filled with melody, and the fog is dissipated by the sound of the trumpet. On Monday night, in the Hanover Square Rooms, resplendent with the lamps of Leslie, and dingy with the dirt of half a century, the old Philharmonic Society solemnised the inauguration of its renewed life. The skin of the caterpillar which had lain dormant during the autumn and winter broke, and out came the butterfly as gaudy and fluttering as ever. To drop metaphor, however, we subjoin the programme of the concert.

PART I.

"No novelty!" is always the cry, on the occasion of the first performance of the ancient Philharmonic. "No novelty!" Perhaps, however, in this coyness of innovation lies one of the secrets of its strength and durability. Is it not enough, and therefore as good as a feast, to hear the Jupiter symphony of Mozart, and the Pastorale symphony of Beethoven well performed? Does not one represent the might and perfection of orchestral music in the last, and the other do as much for the present century? Are they not both irreproachable models—and therefore immortal—and therefore for ever new? Who will answer in the negative? What then, becomes of the cry of "No novelty!" when the Jupiter and the Pastorale are thundering against each other at one and the same concert? Moreover, there was a novelty in the programme—and one of great interest—the first song of Ottavio in Don Giovanni, which Rubini, Mario, and the rest of them invariably omit. This song unfolds, in a much more intelligible manner than "Il mio Tesoro," the devotion of the lack-a-daisical Ottavio for his mistress, Donna Anna, who will not admit of his protestations after the death of her father, and the cruel outrage upon herself on the part of the libertine, Giovanni. In its way, it is as beautiful as the other. Mr. Sims Reeves sang it to perfection. Had we got nothing else for our guinea, we should have been satisfied. The overture to the Siege of Corinth, one of Rossini's most brilliant operatic preludes, was a quasi "novelty" at these concerts. The Jubilee of Weber was no novelty at all; but the National Anthem of Great Britain which comes in at the end, lifted the audience on their feet—a display of loyalty which was significant enough just now. The air from Jessonda (the war song, "Amid the Battle raging") was sung by Signor Belletti, to the Italian version of the words by Signor Maggioni, Poet of the Royal Italian Opera. It would have been more effective had it been taken quicker and with more spirit by the clever barytone. That part which relates to battle was too much of a hue with that which relates to love; and the contrast designed by Spohr was consequently lost. Rossini's charming camera duet was capitally sung by Mr. Reeves and Signor Belletti, although we should have preferred the original pianoforte accompaniment, clever as the orchestral arrangement, introduced on this and previous occasions, may be considered.

Mrs. Thompson (late Miss Kate Loder) appeared for the last time as a public performer. She was received with high favour, played the concerto of Mendelssohn with unflagging spirit, and was loudly applauded at the end. The loss of this clever lady will be felt in our concerts. Few have obtained, and fewer have deserved, so eminent a name as a pianist of the classical school. An excellent musician, as well as a first-rate executant, Miss Kate Loder (we prefer her maiden name) was admirably calculated to understand thoroughly and perform efficiently a class of music, which, though the highest and most intellectual, is by no means so generally adopted by our native pianists and composers as might be wished.

The band, with an exception or two, remains the same as last year. Bottesini and Piatti have seceded, or at any rate have not been engaged. The first being in America, his absence is explained; but the last being in London, his absence is unexplained. Moreover, we missed Mr. Willy from the ranks of the violins. This was strange, since there is no better orchestral player than that gentleman, and scarcely any so good. Has he been discarded?—and, if so, why? We must inquire further into the matter. The execution of the symphonies was in general very good—that of the Pastorale, a slight defect or so allowed for, more than up to the average mark. The fault we found with the Jupiter was, that, from beginning to end, it was too uniformly loud. The overtures were dashed off with immense spirit. Mr. Costa, who remains at the head of the orchestra, conducted with his usual energy and decision, and was well received on appearing upon the platform. The audience, not very numerous by the way, was one of the coldest and most apathetic we ever remember to have seen at a Philharmonic concert. There was not a single display of enthusiasm throughout the evening. Even the slow movement of Mozart's symphony, an exquisite inspiration, although exceedingly well played, passed off frigidly. How is this to be accounted for? Has free trade in symphonies robbed them of their attraction?—or have the connoisseurs and professors who make up the subscription list of the Philharmonic Society adopted the conviction that they can hear them as well played elsewhere, and for less money? Qui sait? Time will show. Time will enlighten us upon this and other questions. Perhaps it may have been a feeling of disappointment on the part of subscribers at a new sign of economy of the directors, who dispensed with the octave flute. We do not blame the directors for exercising economy. If they were losers by last season, which we understand was the case, they are right to retrench the expenses, and get rid of Signor Bottesini, Signor Piatti, Mr. Willy, and the octave flute. But if they dispense with the octave flute, they should dispense with works in which it is essential—such, for instance, as the air from Jessonda, the overture to the Siege of Corinth, and the Pastoral Symphony. Although in Rossini's overture the octave flute is only introduced to augment the noise, in Spohr's air and Beethoven's symphony (the "Storm"—for instance) it is indispensable. Where was the shrill whistling of the wind? The fact of being deprived of their octave flute, however, may be accepted as an explanation of the frigidity of the audience.

The Beale Tournée.—The artistes forming Mr. Beale's concert party have returned from the provinces, after a very successful tour. Mr. Beale, the entrepreneur, has presented Mr. Land with a piece of plate, as a token of his estimation of that gentleman's services during the tour, in the capacity of manager and accompanyist. The artists who composed the troupe, were Mdme. Amedei, Mrs. and Mr. Weiss, M. Sainton and Miss Arabella Goddard.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The 116th anniversary meeting took place on Tuesday at the Freemason's Tavern. The dinner which, as usual, opened the proceedings, was served at six o'clock, when about 200 musical professors and amateurs sat down. Mr. T. H. Hall, F.R.S., a distinguished amateur, presided.

After the cloth was removed, and the immortal "Non nobis, Domine" had been well sung, the customary toasts and honours were gone through. The Chairman proposed "Prosperity to the Royal Society of Musicians," which, it is needless to say, was drunk with vehement and prolonged cheering. In his preliminary speech, Mr. Hall gave a general statement of the receipts and expenditure of the society for 1853, which shows that it is in a prosperous state. The interest derived from ground-rents and stock, donations, legacies, subscriptions, profits of the annual concert, etc., give a total sum of £2,998 15s. 8d.; while the expenditure for the year, in annuities and gifts, dispensed according to the charity, has been £2,679 14s. 11d. The speech of the President was short, clear, and to the purpose. He discoursed on the merits of the institution, drew striking pictures of the necessities to which musicians of the highest talent had been reduced, adducing Beethoven as an example (by the way, Mozart would have afforded a more appropriate instance), and paid a high compliment to the munificent house of Broadwood and Sons, whose various donations have amounted to £1,000—£700 in money, and £300 realised by the sale of the grand pianoforte which was exhibited at the Crystal Palace, and presented to the society by the Messrs. Broadwood. This last announcement was received with tremendous cheering. Mr. M'Murdie proposed the chairman's health, and read a list of the donations and subscriptions, which betrayed a falling off from former years.

The musical department was unexceptionable. The engagements included the names of Madame Newton Frodsham, Misses Messent and Ransford, Signor Belletti, and Mr. Sims Reeves, vocalists; and Mr. Richardson and M. Sainton, instrumentalists. The ladies all sang their best, and Mr. Sims Reeves obtained an enthusiastic encore in Molique's song, "When the Moon is brightly shining." Signor Belletti was also unanimously called on to repeat Rossini's "La Danza." Madame Newton Frodsham sang an air of Bishop's admirably, and was accompanied by Mr. Distin on the trumpet. Miss Ransford and Miss Messent were also much applauded in their songs. M. Sainton created a furore in his Romance and Tarantella. The Messrs. Distin executed a selection from Der Freischütz with their usual skill and effect; and Spofforth, Bishop, and Messrs. Alfred Mellon and M'Murdie supplied sundry glees, which were sung by Messrs. Barnby, Bayley, J. Coward, W. Coward, Ferrari, Forster, Handel Gear, Donald King, Kinkee, Lawler, Land, Novello, Rovedino, Montem Smith, Whitehouse, and Young. Messrs. Cipriani Potter and Sterndale Bennett were the accompanists at the pianoforte.

The "Non nobis, Domine," by the way, after dinner, was sung much better than the National Anthem after the Queen's health had been drunk, which, as wine had circulated freely, may be readily accounted for. Haydn's March for wind instruments, composed expressly for the Royal Society of Musicians, and a new and highly effective March by Mr. Cipriani Potter, written for the occasion, were both played by the band of wind instruments. The last was encored. On the whole, the 116th Anniversary "Festival" was very satisfactory, and the company departed well-pleased with the entertainment.

The Committee of Management consisted of the following members:—Messrs. Aguilar, Anderson, W. S. Bennett, R. Barnett, W. Card, Coote, J. B. Chatterton, Clinton, R. Clark, Fitzwilliam, Ferrari, Griffin, J. H. Griesbach, R. Hatton, W. H. Holmes, H. Hill, Jewson, A. Mackintosh, M'Murdie, Mellon, Potter, Lovell Phillips, Rovedino, Salaman, C. E. Stephens, and Willy. Messrs. Card, Chatterton, M'Murdie and Rovedino officiated as the Ladies' Committee.

Cheap Music.—At Copenhagen, Mendelssohn's songs are publishing by subscription, at threepence a book, each containing several numbers.

MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S SOIRÉES.

The second and last of these classical entertainments took place on Tuesday evening at the New Beethoven Rooms. The programme was good, and the audience numerous and attentive. Mr. Sloper was in splendid "play," as the term goes, and thoroughly satisfied his most critical hearers. His coadjutors were Messrs. Sainton (violin), Dando (viola), and Lucas (violoncello). The performances began with Mozart's pianoforte quartet in E flat (Op. 13), one of the early works of the master. It was admirably executed by Mr. Sloper and the three gentlemen already named. The other concerted piece was Beethoven's fine and occasionally eccentric sonata for piano and violin in G (Op. 96), the performance of which, by Mr. Sloper and M. Sainton, was beyond reproach. Mr. Sloper's solo performances were highly interesting. Two numbers from Mendelssohn's glorious book of *Six Preludes and Fugues (Op. 35)—a work as transcendent as it is little known—deserve particular mention. The lovely prelude in A flat, with its fugue if possible still lovelier, was followed by the prelude and fugue in F minor. The prelude, which is as passionate as anything in music, was, nevertheless, less thoroughly understood than the fiery and ungovernable fugue, in which the whole genius of Mendelssohn is revealed. The last was superbly played by Mr. Sloper, who neither flinched from the allegro nor from the con fuoco. Better execution of an intricate and very difficult fugue we have seldom heard. The same composer's Andante and Presto Agitato in B minor, which (more shame to our pianists) is almost unknown, was equally well rendered by Mr. Sloper, who is quite at home in this music, which demands especial clearness and decision of execution. Two elegant bagatelles, entitled Day Spring and Valse Capricieuse, the compositions of Mr. Sloper, played to perfection, as might have been expected, terminated the concert with good effect. The first is a novelty of which the title alone is unintelligible to us; the second is an old and deserved favourite. The concert was agreeably varied by the Romance and Tarantella of M. Sainton, executed with wonderful spirit by the composer, who had already performed them on the same evening at the "Festival" of the Royal Society of Musicians. The vocal music was good. A pleasing and well written song by Mr. Sloper, entitled "Seek not to know if all must fade" (the words by Mr. Palgrave Simpson) was very nicely sung by Miss Amy Dolby, who is evidently making progress. In Haydn's canzonet, "My Mother bids me bind my Hair," sung by the same young lady, the signs of improvement were still more evident. The other vocal music was entrusted to Signor Belletti, who (also, like M. Sainton, fresh from the "festival" of the Royal Society of Musicians) was encored in a somewhat stale bolero, "Quand' olezzante brezza," composed by one Bergson, and was not encored in an eternally fresh and spirited aria, entitled "Non più andrai," from an opera called Le Nozze di Figaro, by a composer named Mozart, which Signor Belletti (who is an Italian) sang much less con amore than the somewhat stale bolero. Mr. Lindsay Sloper did the singers the honour of accompanying them upon the pianoforte.

London Sacred Harmonic Society.—The performance of Handel's Joshua, on Monday evening, attracted a crowded audience to Exeter Hall. The oratorio was preceded by Dr. Elvey's anthem "In that Day," which would have made the performance too long, but that the "cuts" in Joshua were plentiful. The principal singers were Mrs. Enderssohn, Miss Alleyne, Miss M. Wells, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Weiss. Some of the choruses went well, and some might have gone better. The chorus of Israelites, "We, with redoubled Rage," was sung with energy, and received with great applause. Of the singers, Mr. Weiss and Miss M. Wells particularly distinguished themselves—the latter in the air, "Heroes, when with Glory," in which she was loudly applauded, and Mr. Weiss in the air, "Shall I in Mamre's fertile Plain," which was enthusiastically encored. Mrs. Enderssohn sang "Oh! had I Jubal's Lyre" with great expression, and Mr. Lockey acquitted himself admirably in the tenor music.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 11TH, 1854.

AN excellent contemporary* has blown the trumpet of the old Philharmonic Society, and proclaimed it, far and wide, the Autocrat of all possible musical institutions, past, present, and to come. The notice of the first concert, on Monday, is made the basis, on Thursday, of an ode (in prose), recounting, one by one, the Philharmonic claims to admiration, and reciting the deeds and achievements of that remarkable body, in language quite as glowing as the improvisations of those ancient bards who, in Pennillion, shrieked the praises of their chiefs at the Eistedvodd. What particular influence can have excited such an unexpected burst of eloquence, we are at a loss to guess. No one has dreamed of calling into question the magnanimous virtues of the Philharmonic Society, or of disputing the "world-wide renown" which its poet-laureate in the Daily News believes that it enjoys. More humble proselytes of music (acolytes in the temple), who would not presume to discuss a point with the Daily News (much less with the Philharmonic Society), might possibly entertain notions that, by some great misfortune, would clash with those expressed in Thursday's "Ode;" but they would never dare to utter them en pleine paix. That the opinions of such proselytes are necessarily untenable, when opposed to those expressed by the Daily News in its hymn to the Philharmonic perfection, we believe, and shall endeavour to show.

A mere acolyte in the Temple of the Muses, in the plenitude of his presumption, might take exception to the following apology for want of novelty in the programme of the first concert of the most glorious and puissant ancestors of the New Philharmonic Society.

"Our musical readers will at once perceive that this selection does not present any novelty whatever; a circumstance which, as usual, will be made the subject of much shallow and petulant criticism. The cry of 'Novelty!' is the easiest thing in the world to raise, if it is not considered whether this object is, in the given case, practicable or expedient. The Philharmonic Society, established nearly half a century ago for the cultivation and improvement of orchestral composition and performance, has acquired a world-wide renown (the word European is no longer applicable now that America forms a part of the world of music), and has done more towards the accomplishment of its end than all the other musical establishments of the Old World and the New, put together. When the Philharmonic Society began its labours the great established symphonists were Haydn and Mozart. Beethoven was rising into fame; but his greatness was slowly recognised in his own country, while in France his very name was unknown. The Philharmonic Society took up his symphonies — such of them as then existed — performed them as they had never been performed before, and taught the Germans themselves to understand and appreciate their mighty countryman. Much more slowly, the French profited by the same lesson, and their boasted Conservatoire has merely followed the footsteps of the Philharmonic Society. It was from our Society that Beethoven obtained the warmest encouragement and best assistance which he ever received, and to which the world owes the very greatest of his works. Spohr owes to the society a similar debt of gratitude, which he has ever been most willing to acknowledge; and the whole musical world knows what it has done to foster the rising genius of Mendelssohn. In this manner, the Philharmonic Society has formed its répertoire, extending from Haydn, the father of symphony, to Mendelssohn, the youngest of his sons. It has frequently attempted still further to increase its store: at different times it has ransacked the Continent for new works, and endeavoured to find them at home; but, with the exception of a few overtures and other pieces of small dimensions, their researches have had little fruit. It is notorious that there is not a single symphony since those of Mendelssohn, produced at a Philharmonic Concert, which has not brought upon the directors the well-founded reproach of having occupied the evening with inferior matter, to the exclusion of some work of one of the great masters. Last year, several such attempts were made; but, for our part, till another Mendelssohn burst upon the world, we have no desire to have them repeated. The symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn furnish materials quite sufficient for a selection ever fresh and delightful; and we trust that the Philharmonic Society will not suffer itself to be induced by the vulgar cry of novelty to mix up those masterpieces with things unworthy of their companionship. In doing so, the Society would injure its own reputation, and frustrate the great object of its existence. Let it continue the course which it has so long and so consistently pursued, of performing the greatest works of the greatest composers, with that care, precision, and power for which its orchestra is so justly celebrated, and it need not fear either detraction or rivalry."

He (the acolyte in the temple) might, we said, take exception; we should have said many exceptions. Let us endeavour to sustain the cause of the ignorant malcontent, and, as if (which Fate forbid!) we were of the same way of thinking, make of him our client, and of ourselves his advocate.

DAILY NEWS—Examined by ———

Q. You said that your musical readers would at once perceive there was no novelty in the programme?

A. It must have been evident to any one that could read.

Q. Good. But you went on to say, that this circumstance would be visited, as usual, by much shallow and petulant criticism?

A. No doubt of it—witness the notices next day?

Q. What do you mean by shallow? And what do you mean by petulant? I cannot conceive, and I wish you to explain, how such epithets can be applied to the simple assertion that there was no novelty in the programme—an assertion you made yourself, in common with the rest of them?

A. Well—to say the truth—I am not prepared to answer you.

Q. Let that pass. You remark, further on, that the Philharmonic Society was established "for the cultivation and improvement of orchestral composition and performance?"

A. Certainly—nearly half a century ago—and, as I added, it "has done more towards the accomplishment of its end than all the other musical establishments of the Old World and the New, put together."

Q. I believe it has done something—though a great deal less than it might have done—for orchestral performance; but what it has effected for orchestral composition, I wish to be informed.

A. I can answer you satisfactorily. Clementi, Cherubini, Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and Potter have all written symphonies, which were ordered and paid for by the Philharmonic Society.

Q. Your answer is to the purpose. In what key was the symphony of Clementi?

A. I think in ——— I believe ——— the fact is, I forget.

Q. When was it last performed?

(A Voice, interrupting). "Nearly fifty years ago."

Q. Silence! (To A.) When was it last performed?

A. I really forget.

Q. That is odd. What symphony did Beethoven compose for the Philharmonic Society?

A. The Ninth—the Choral Symphony—the last he wrote.

Q. He was munificently paid for it, was he not? You have stated that from the Philharmonic Society "Beethoven obtained the warmest encouragement and the best assistance he ever received"—and that to this Society the world is indebted for the very greatest of his works? I presume the composer of the Ninth Symphony received at least £1000 for his labour?

A. I think not so much.

Q. What—with the "warmest encouragement," and the "best assistance?"

A. Not so much as £1000.

Q. Such a symphony, in a musical point of view, is equal to a great epic poem—is it not?

A. Assuredly. Except Homer's and Milton's, no epic poem, in grandeur and elaboration, can compare with the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

Q. And, you say, he did not get £1000 for it?

A. No. I think he had about—about—about——

Q. About how much?—£800—£700?

A. Not quite so much.

Q. How much, then? Cut the matter short.

A. I believe he got £100.

Q. That was, certainly, "warm encouragement!"

(A Voice. "When the Society tried it, they couldn't play it, and they said it was a mad rhapsody, as they did, some years before, of the C minor"——)

Q. Silence. (to A.) The Philharmonic Society, of course, made a great effect with this fine work—for I see that you say, "the Society taught the Germans themselves to understand and appreciate their mighty countryman?"

(A Voice. "The symphony was played in Vienna before it was known in England. The Philharmonic Society had nothing to do with commanding it. It is all humb"——)

Q. Silence! (to A.) You do not reply?

A. It was tried, and, not being found effective, was laid by for some years.

(A Voice. "For fifteen years.")

Q. Quite enough. I can see that you have advanced claims in respect of Beethoven to which the Philharmonic Society have no right, either as patrons of art or as appreciators of good music. About Cherubini's Symphony—it was an original work, was it not?—ordered by the Society?

A. Yes.

Q. How much was paid for it?

(A Voice. "Nothing.")

A. I really cannot remember.

Q. And Spohr's Symphony?—It was the second, was it not?

A. Yes.

Q. I remember—it is a very fine work. How much was paid for that?

(A Voice.—"Nothing.")

A. I really do not remember.

Q. And Mendelssohn's Symphony?

(A Voice—"Nothing for that. Moreover it was condemned, and shelved for years. The band could not play it, and the directors pronounced it a failure.")

A. I really do not remember.

Q. I have heard that this symphony was what is now known as the Italian Symphony?

A. Yes.

Q. Well—that was made popular in London by Jullien at his concerts, and by other societies than the Philharmonic. How did it happen to be so long neglected by the society for which it was composed?

A. I really cannot say. All I know is, that the Philharmonic Society "has done more towards the accomplishment of its end than all the other musical establishments of the Old World and the New, put together."

Q. "Towards its end"—its end; what was that?—I forget.

A. "The cultivation and improvement of orchestral composition and performance."

Q. Composition?

A. Certainly.

Q. Have they rewarded their own countrymen better than the foreigners?

A. Well—let me see. I think—let me see—let me see—

Q. It's no use putting on your moral spectacles. They have behaved better to their own countrymen. They have not got MSS. from them for nothing, or for a miserable sum, and, incompetent to execute or understand them, laid them on the shelf. They have magnanimously excluded "native talent" from their speculations. Am I wrong?

A. I really cannot remember.

Q. Pray refer to your article.

(A Voice. "Macfarren has been treated with contempt. Bennett has been"——)

Q. Silence! (to A.) Have you, or have you not———— (Adjourned till Monday.)

RUBINI.

Letters from the town of Bergamo inform us of the death of this celebrated singer, after a short illness of three days.

Giovanni-Battista Rubini, the most renowned tenor of the present century, was born at Romano, a small town in the province of Bergamo, on the 7th of April, 1795 (or, as some say, 1792—the same year in which Rossini came into the world.) The son of a professor of music, he learned the elements of that art from his earliest infancy. Before he was eight years old, he sang in the churches, or took a violin part in the orchestra. Some time later, he was confided to the care of Dom Santo, a priest and organist at Adro, near Brescia, who had some knowledge of harmony and singing. After having tried the voice of young Rubini, he came to a decision that the child had no dispositions for the vocal art, and sent him back to his father. The latter, however, persuaded that the organist of Adro was wrong in his opinion, continued to give lessons to his son, who at the age of twelve made his début on the stage in a woman's part. After this essay, Rubini went to Bergamo, where he had contracted an engagement to play violin solos in the entr'actes, and to sing in the choruses. His first attempt as a singer in the theatre at Bergamo was in an air by Lamberti, which was introduced in a comedy. His success was triumphant, and he obtained from the impresario a reward in money equivalent to about four shillings. The remembrance of this event was often a source of gaiety to Rubini, when he afterwards became celebrated. Nevertheless, he had the vexation to see his triumph effaced by the refusal of the director of the Opera at Milan to admit him among the choruses, on the plea that he had not sufficient voice. The only resource left him was to embrace an offer to join a strolling troupe of singers who were just setting out for Piedmont. At Fossano, Saluzzo, and Vercelli, he was entrusted with the first tenor parts. At the last-mentioned town he became acquainted with a violinist named Madi, with whom he associated himself for the purpose of giving concerts. A tournée through Alexandria, Novi, and Valenza, however, proved unsuccessful, and they were compelled to return to Vercelli. The ill-luck which accompanied Rubini in all his excursions, induced him to retire from the strolling troupe, and proceed to Milan, in the chance of finding employment. At Milan, the only chance he obtained was an engagement for the autumn season, at Pavia, on a salary of less than two pounds a month. His success there was so great, that he was invited to Brescia for the Carnival in 1815, with the magnificent sum of £40 for three months. This salary was doubled in the spring following, at the San Mose in Venice; and at length Barbaja himself secured his services for the Theatre Fiorentini in Naples, at 88 ducats a month.

At the end of a year, although Rubini had obtained the marked favour of the public, Barbaja wished to get rid of him, and only consented to retain him on condition of his consenting to a reduction of his salary to seventy ducats. Rubini could have found more lucrative engagements, but he was anxious to remain at Naples where he was receiving valuable instructions from Nozzari. Nevertheless, while subscribing to the hard terms of the entrepreneur, he said to Barbaja, with the confidence of an artist who believes in his own talent, and feels assured that he is destined to become celebrated—"You profit by the advantages which my position affords you; but I will repay you for this one day or other." Rubini was not deceived in his expectations. Several operas were written expressly for him in 1816 and 1817; he made a deep impression at Rome, in La Gazza Ladra, and obtained other brilliant successes at Palermo, and at Naples, on his return, all of which tended to raise his name in the market, and to make it worth the while of entrepreneurs to offer him more suitable terms.

On the 6th of October, 1825, Rubini made his first appearance in Paris, as Ramiro in La Cenerentola. The charm of his voice, that peculiar style which belonged to himself alone, and was founded on no preceding model, the elegance of his vocalisation, and the rare good taste displayed in his ornaments and fioriture, ensured his triumph. La Donna del Lago, La Gazza Ladra, and Otello confirmed his reputation, and the critics unanimously pronounced him the "King of Tenors." Barbaja, who had ceded Rubini to the administration of the Théâtre Italien, reclaimed him at the expiration of six months. Once more in Naples, the now great singer was speedily dispatched to Milan, and thence to Vienna, where he had already been in 1824. In the interval, Bellini's Pirata and Sonnambula, and Donizetti's Anna Bolena, had provided Rubini with that particular character of music which specially suited his organization and his talent, and in which he showed himself far superior to what he had been in the operas of Rossini. Bellini and Rubini seemed born for each other, and their mutual glory to depend on their continued union. It was from this epoch (1826) that the incontestable superiority of Rubini, in a special kind of music, over all contemporary singers, was declared. In the operas we have cited, he first made use of those frequent contrasts of forte and piano, which, for fifteen years, was the most distinctive characteristic of his talent, and which he must be admitted to have abused by excess, although by its means he was accustomed to excite the liveliest transports of his hearers. This contrast was the stamp of his individuality; and through it he created a manner, or (mannerism), the imitators of which have unfortunately been always painfully inferior to their model.

Until 1831, Rubini remained the exclusive property of Barbaja, who raised his salary (the greater part of which, of course, went into the pockets of the cunning entrepreneur) to 60,000 francs (£2,400). At length, freed from responsibility, he returned to Paris, where he excited the greatest enthusiasm in Il Pirata, Anna Bolena, La Sonnambula, and other operas of the new répertoire. The absolute frenzy created among the Parisian dilettanti by his execution of the airs, "Tu vedrai sventurata," "Vivi tu," and "Tutto è sciolto," in those operas, surpassed anything before or since.

In the same year, Rubini made his first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre in London, in Bellini's Il Pirata, in company with his wife, Mdme. Rubini,* who was engaged as prima donna. His reception, until the last scene, was cold, and he failed to move the audience into any display of enthusiasm; but "Tu vedrai sventurata" awoke them from their trance, and Rubini triumphed in London as he had triumphed in Paris. From 1831 to 1841 he was engaged alternately, every year, six months in Paris, and six months in London, and at the English provincial festivals —except in 1838, when he passed the summer at his native place in Bergamo. His reputation continually increased, and his great successes caused him to be regarded as the first tenor of the age. His gains surpassed those of any of those singers whom fortune has most favoured. During the year which immediately followed the termination of his engagement with Barbaja, Rubini earned 125,000 francs (£5,000); and, from that time forward, his actual income was something more than 200,000 francs (£8,000.) In 1841, he was supposed to be worth two millions and a half of francs—or £100,000.

For several years, Rubini was engaged to direct the Imperial Opera at St. Petersburgh, where his success was prodigious, and his emolument enormous. His final and his greatest triumph in Paris was in I Puritani, the last opera composed for him by his friend, Bellini (and, indeed, the last Bellini wrote). The music and the singer obtained a success almost without precedent; and "Ella tremante" even threw into the shade "Il mio Tesoro," which, till then, had been considered Rubini's most consummate vocal achievement.

In 1842, in the height of his glory and the zenith of his powers, Rubini visited London for the last time. In the same, if we are not mistaken, he also took his leave of Paris. It was not till a few years later that he quitted St. Petersburgh, and retired altogether into private life. He resided up to the day of his death, at his native place, Bergamo, where he kept a stud of horses, and enjoyed the esteem and affection of a large circle of intimate friends and acquaintances.

* Rubini was married at Naples in 1819, to Mdlle. Chomel, a French singer of some talent. Her last season as a public singer was Rubini's first in London.

MR. CHARLES SALAMAN'S PIANOFORTE SOIREES.—The second came off on Saturday last, when Mr. Salaman was assisted by Messrs. Blagrove (violin), R. Blagrove (viola), and Hancock (violoncello); and by Mrs. Lockey as vocalist. Among the full pieces were Mozart's sonata, in A, for pianoforte and violin; Hummel's trio in E flat, Op. 96, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello; F. Ries's quartet in E flat, Op. 17, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello; and Mendelssohn's Andante and Presto Agitato, in B minor, for pianoforte solo. There was also a quartet by Marschner, in G, Op. 158, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, which, though not a work of remarkable merit, much less of genius, was interesting as a novelty. Mr. Salaman played two solos of his own composition—Romance sans Paroles, ("Clœlia,") Op. 20, and Toccata Brillant, ("La Felicità,") Op. 13. The performance went off well, and Mr. Salaman particularly distinguished himself in Hummel's trio and Mozart's sonata. He had more than enough to do during the evening, but his zeal was unabated throughout. Mrs. Lockey agreeably varied the instrumental entertainment by her quiet and artistic singing. She introduced no less than four vocal pieces of Mr. Salaman's—three English songs, and an Italian canzonet. These were received with great favour. The Italian canzonet pleased us the most. The rooms (at Mr. Salaman's residence, in Baker Street), were quite full.

COLOSSEUM.—An engagement has been entered into with several well-known artistes, and Herr Brandau as conductor, for a series of Vocal Concerts, every evening during the next four weeks of Lent.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

The second concert for the current season took place on Thursday evening, at the usual locale, Willis's Rooms. It opened with Spohr's quartet in E flat (Op. 58). The violins were Herr Molique and Mr. Goffrie; the tenor, Mr. Hill; and the violoncello, Signor Piatti. The quartet, one of Spohr's most melodious, was irreproachably executed. Beethoven's trio in G (No. 2, Op. 1). had for its interpreters Mdlle. Madeleine Graver, her first appearance at these concerts (piano), Herr Molique (violin), and Signor Piatti (violoncello). The performance was excellent; and the lady distinguished herself by a firm touch and appropriate expression. The trio was much applauded. Mozart's famous clarinet quintet introduced Mr. Lazarus this season to Mr. Ella's subscribers. This celebrated English artiste played superbly, and was admirably supported by the stringed instruments.

Mdlle. Graver also played Liszt's fantasia, "Les Patineurs," from the Prophète, which was injudicious, since that morceau is quite beyond the lady's mechanical powers. Mdlle. Graver, who is so efficient in Beethoven, should avoid the Liszt school as much as possible. Previous to the Patineurs, a very animated performance, by the Brothers Holmes, of a very silly piece, by Kalliwoda, called "Introduction et Variations," attracted much attention, and brought down considerable applause. The Brothers Holmes play with a spirit and precision that remind us of the Mollenhauers. They are very young—the eldest sixteen, the youngest fourteen—but they have already won a name in the profession. The talent of the younger appears the more remarkable. The solo was accompanied on the pianoforte by Herr Rummel.

Harmonic Union.—Handel's Judas Maccabæus was performed on Wednesday evening, at Exeter Hall, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The Hall was quite full. The principal singers were Miss Stabbach, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Sims Reeves.

The chorus of the Harmonic Union is audibly improving. On no former occasion have we heard them sing with so much force and precision. An occasional unsteadiness—as in the grand and picturesque chorus, "Fallen is the Foe,"—was observable; but, "We come, We come in bright Array," "Arm, arm, ye Brave," "Hail, Judea, happy Land," and others, were all that could possibly be desired.

Mr. Sims Reeves sang the three airs of Judas magnificently, and created an immense enthusiasm. He was encored in each of his songs, but judiciously declined to accede to the desire of the audience, except in one instance—"Sound an Alarm"—the demand for which was too unanimous and loud to be resisted. A nobler specimen of Handelian singing than that of Mr. Sims Reeves, in "How vain is Man," has rarely been heard. Mr. Weiss gave the dashing air, "Arm, arm, ye Brave," with great and appropriate vigour; and Mrs. Weiss, in the lovely song, "Wise Men, flatt'ring, may deceive You," displayed congenial sweetness and expression. Miss Stabbach was hoarse, and a written apology was distributed for her in the Hall. Miss Dolby had little to do, but that little she accomplished, as usual, like a thorough artist. To Mr. Benedict's admirable conducting, no little of the excellence of the general performance was due.

Mr. Salaman's Amateur Choral Society.—The sixth meeting took place on Wednesday evening, when Mr. Barnett's Mountain Sylph was performed. The choruses and concerted pieces were well given, especially the fortune-telling scene, and the chorus, "Oh! drink to our Master." Of the airs entitled to particular notice, we would mention the duet, "Some Magic seems stealing," the scena, "Man's Misfortune," the duet, "Farewell for ever," and the air, "Deep in a Forest Dell." The audience was select and attentive, and Mr. Salaman presided at the piano, with his usual ability.

Signor Briccialdi, the eminent flautist, has returned to London from Italy, where he has been sojourning for two years. He intends passing the season here.

Signor Pavesi, a tenor, well-known in Italy, made a successful début at Amsterdam on Saturday last, as Edgardo, in Lucia di Lammermoor.

Herr Ernst Pauer's First Soirée Musicale.—This took place at Willis's Rooms, on Wednesday. Herr Pauer had provided an attractive programme, which included Beethoven's Sonata, for pianoforte and violoncello, in A, Op. 69; a Song without Words of Mendelssohn; a pianoforte duet by Onslow; a violin solo by Herr Molique; a new trio, in C minor, of his own composition; besides the grand soprano air from Fidelio, and some vocal pieces of less importance. The pianoforte duet of Onslow, the best of the two by that composer, was among the most attractive performances of the evening. It was admirably played by Miss Jane Jackson and Herr Pauer, and received with much favour. Herr Pauer's trio—first time of performance—was another feature of interest, and was done ample justice to by the composer, Herr Molique and Signor Piatti. The trio, which we hope to hear again, is highly creditable to the talent of Herr Pauer. It is well written and effective, and presents some ingenious combinations for the three instruments.

It is a pity Miss Fanny Rowland should have chosen the scena from Fidelio, since it only served to show her incapacity to grasp with such grand and exacting compositions. Miss Fanny Rowland has a charming voice, and sings very well; but something more is required for the "Song of Hope;" and, for the sake of song, and Miss Fanny Rowland, we hope the fair vocalist will not attempt it again——. Miss F. Rowland was much better suited in a romance, by Gordigiani, which she sang very neatly and brilliantly. Herr Molique played a solo of his own to perfection; and the incomparable Piatti was as incomparable as ever, in the Beethoven duet, with Herr Pauer. Mr. N. de Becker, a bass singer, with a very nice voice, sang an air from Elijah, and a song by F. Schubert, in both of which he showed feeling. Herr Pauer, who finished the concert in dashing style with his own spirited Tarantella, also officiated as accompanist in the vocal pieces. The concert gave entire satisfaction.

Mrs. Plummer's first Soirée musicale was well attended, and the programme was light and agreeable. Mrs. Plummer sang "Auld Robin Gray," and took part in several concerted morceaux, giving great satisfaction. Miss Messent sang an air by Ricci, and an English ballad, and was encored in the latter. Mr. Williams, a tenor, sang once or twice, and his voice was much admired. The pianist was Mr. Ferdinand Praeger, who played three compositions of his own,—Nocturne Romantique, Chanson d'Amour, and Les Flocons de Neige—which were much admired. There has been so much rain lately, that Mr. Praeger is to be commended for attacking the snow.

Hackney.—Miss Ada Thomson and Mr. J. W. Janson gave their first Annual Concert on Thursday evening, at the Manor Rooms, Hackney. The singers were Misses Messent, Cicely Nott, E. and J. Brougham and Julia Harland—Messrs. Sims Reeves, George Perren, Tillyard and Herr Clausthal. The instrumentalists: (harp) Herr Oberthur, (flute) Mr. Hird, (concertina) Messrs. G. Case and Janson; (pianoforte) Miss Ada Thomson, (accompanyist) Mr. Haskins. Mr. Sims Reeves, who, of course, was the star of the evening, was encored in Hatton's "Good bye, Sweetheart." Herr Clausthal (his first appearance in England) is a Swiss vocalist of extraordinary pretensions. He sang, in native costume, three Swiss songs, in such a manner as to gain an encore in each. The accompaniments to these songs were well played by Mr. Haskins. Miss Cicely Nott was encored in her "Echo" song. Herr Oberthur's solo was a specimen of sterling harp playing. Mr. George Case was encored in his concertina solo. Miss Ada Thomson was successful in her solo for pianoforte. Miss Julia Harland arrived so late, that the concert terminated with her song. Mr. H. R. Allen, who was engaged, refused to appear, because his name was not announced in the bills in type as large as that of Mr. Sims Reeves.

Walworth.—Mrs. Constantine Newman gave her first concert at the Lecture Hall on Monday last. The arrangements were under the direction of Mr. George Lake. The vocalists were Miss Messent, Miss Dolby, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Distin, Mr. Genge and Mr. Suchet Champion. The programme was diversified—the Hall pretty full—the encores numerous; the concert began and ended in good time, and the order of the pieces was not once changed! Miss Messent was loudly encored in Mr. Frank Mori's new song "Norah spinning."

Literary and Scientific Institution, Pimlico.—A concert was given here on Thursday evening. The performers were Messrs. Clifford and Morell, the Misses West and the Misses A. and J. Poole.

DRAMATIC.

DRURY LANE.—On Wednesday, a morning performance took place at this theatre, in aid of the wives and children of the British soldiers who have been sent on the Turkish expedition. La Vendetta; or, the Corsican Brothers, had been announced, but, from some cause—which, though unexplained, was not difficult to guess—Virginius was substituted.* The theatre was filled in every part, the performance being under the patronage of the Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Mary, and a long list of the nobility and gentry—the Lord Mayor, the Lady Mayoress, the Sheriffs, and sundry "furred gowns" of the City, also appending, or prefixing, their names to the demonstration.

The "National Anthem" and "Rule Britannia," which preceded the tragedy, were sung by the Misses Stabbach, Cicely Nott, Poole, Featherstone, Madame Newton Frodsham, Mdlle. Rita Favanti, and Mr. St. Albans, supported by a large choir, the band of the Life Guards, and the orchestra of the theatre. The Anthem produced an inspiriting effect, the whole house rising and cheering for several minutes at the end. "Rule Britannia" excited a similar demonstration; and Mr. Smith being summoned, answered the summons instanter, and was vociferously applauded. Mr. Smith, by the way, is entitled to the heartiest acknowledgments of the public for thus taking by the hand all the wives and children of the absent warriors. When he dies, if the public be not unmindful, he will be buried with military honours, and have three volleys fired over him. The Drury Lane manager has set a good example, and, as in the case of the blankets and soup, we have no doubt he will be followed by other lessees in "national demonstrations in aid of the wives and children of the British soldiers sent as an expeditionary force."

Mr. Brooke's Virginius does not please us, nor would it, we think, satisfy Mr. Sheridan Knowles. It is, however, less faulty than any of his Shaksperian characters.

OLYMPIC.—As if to make amends for a recent failure, the new comedietta, To Oblige Benson, produced on Monday evening, achieved a brilliant success. Mr. Robson had a part which suited him admirably, and his acting was prodigious. Indeed, we doubt, if, in a piece of so trifling a structure, we have ever seen it equalled. The plot of To Oblige Benson is evidently taken from the French.† It turns on the indiscretion—more properly, indiscreetness—of a young married lady, Mrs. Benson (Miss Wyndham), who, being somewhat neglected by her husband (Mr. Emery), whom she really loves, admits the attentions of a young man, Meredith (Mr. Leslie), without intending any harm, and yet goes so far as to address him a letter. At a pic-nic party, Meredith slips a note into Mrs. Benson's glove, which falls accidentally into the hands of Mrs. Southdown Trotter (Mrs. Stirling), a friend of Mrs. Benson. Mrs. Southdown Trotter knows the ways of the world better than her friend, and, seeing the possibility of mischief arising from this flirtation, attempts to open the eyes of Mrs. Benson to the danger she incurs of risking her domestic happiness. Mrs. Benson cannot be persuaded that she has committed any wrong, and Mrs. Southdown Trotter, anxious for one whom she loves, hits upon an expedient which will give her proof positive of the scrape into which she is likely to bring herself by her thoughtlessness. Having prevailed upon her husband (Mr. Robson)—a good easy sort of man, whose time is mostly absorbed in agricultural pursuits and vegetable experiments—to personate a jealous man, she tells Mrs. Benson, that she herself had been indiscreet enough to correspond with a gentleman, that her husband had found it out, and that he had gone half mad with jealousy. Here begins the fun. Trotter's mild endeavours to assume the transports of jealousy are infinitely amusing. The bye-play with the wife, when he asks her, aside, "What next to do," his furious strides, and violent gesticulations, contrasting with his sober voice and his carefulness to avoid committing any outrage, were inimitably assumed by Mr. Robson. We entirely differ from a great authority on stage matters,‡ that Mr. Robson did too much in this scene of pretended jealousy. We consider that he was singularly happy—that his exaggeration was thoroughly justified. Benson, who has heard Mrs. Benson's version of the story, tries to pacify Trotter, and tells him that a married woman may write to a male friend and mean no harm. Trotter, perceiving that Benson is serious, thinks his wife has played him a trick, and becomes jealous in downright earnest. Here was another phase of the acting for Mr. Robson, and none but those who have seen him play little serious bits, can have any idea of the reality and life he infused into the real jealous scenes. It is in such situations he chiefly differs from his contemporaries, and individualises his acting. Mr. Robson is as profoundly absorbed in his part as if he were sustaining a character of the deepest tragic interest. There is no understanding between him and the spectator, as if there was written on his countenance—"You see how I'm doing it." Mr. Robson, in his earnest moments, never seems to bestow a thought upon the audience. He does not see Lord This in the stage-box, nor Mr. That in the upper-circle; nor does he calculate the number in the house. Applause itself come to his ears as an interruption. This entire abstraction in comic situations enhances their effect. We are more inclined to laugh at a man seriously perplexed and angry at nothing, than when simulating rage and perplexity, and in a grotesque manner. In such scenes, with Mr. Wright we laugh at the actor; with Mr. Robson, at the author. That Mr. Robson can be as funny as any one, we need not say; but it is in the serio-comic that he has established his fame as an entirely original actor.

The dénoûment is brought about very neatly, Southdown Trotter being kept on the tenter-hooks of jealousy until the last moment, when all is explained to him, by his seeing a fragment of the letter written by Mrs. Benson. Not the least amusing part of the piece is the manner in which poor Benson—the really injured individual—is made the butt of everybody, and, even at the conclusion, is left in ignorance of the true state of affairs. This is according to the French morale. However, Mrs. Benson is made to own her thoughtlessness and folly, and repents; and so poetical justice is conciliated. The piece was well acted by all the performers, and, at the fall of the curtain, there was a universal demonstration in its favour. Mr. Robson was summoned on, and received with enthusiastic cheers.

The author or adapter of To Oblige Benson is Mr. Tom Taylor.

* "The twin ghosts had been laid, by public opinion."—Times.

† The name of the French piece is Un Service à Blanchard. M. Numa played the principal part.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—A new symphony of M. Lefébure-Wély, organist of the Madeleine, was executed some time since by the Société des Jeunes Artistes, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup, in the Salle Herz. It was favourably received by the best judges, among whom we may mention the illustrious Auber. The symphony was repeated on Sunday week with the same success.—The Court Concerts commenced at the Tuileries last Saturday. The performers were the members of the Imperial Chapel, and some singers from the Théâtre Italien.—A series of concerts has also been inaugurated in the salons of M. Abatucci, Minister of Justice. If we may judge from the artistes who appeared at the first, viz.:—Mario, Sophie Cruvelli, Alboni, Vivier, and Félix Godefroid, these distinguished réunions promise to create much excitement among Parisian dilettanti. In speaking of "the inimitable Vivier," La France Musicale expresses itself as follows:—

"Monsieur Vivier is not prodigal of his talents. With an originality peculiar to him, this celebrated artist is always seeking for the impossible! He disappears for months, and no one knows where he has gone. If you think he is in London, he is sure to be—in Constantinople; if you are told he is at Vienna, lo and behold him in Paris, concealed mysteriously, like some fantastic animal that shuns the light. The eccentricity of Vivier is the wittiest and most inscrutable of eccentricities. By force of assiduous and ardent study, he has now succeeded in producing no less than five notes simultaneously, from the horn—all distinct from each other, though harmonising perfectly. Thus his hearers are led to imagine that they are listening to five different voices. By what alchemy has Vivier contrived to master this inexplicable riddle? A tooth stood in the way of his researches—Vivier, without hesitation, snapped it in two. This is no fiction; and those who know the man will easily credit it. You should hear him execute his fanfares, and sing his delicious melodies. His horn speaks with a truthful expression and charm that belong to the miraculous. In the beau monde, which he delights with his wit and his genius, he is sought after, admired, and monopolised to such an extent, that it is with the greatest difficulty that a few intimate friends can get an opportunity of hearing and applauding his original and admirable talent."

In anticipation of the revival of La Vestale, the performances at the Grand Opera alternate between Les Huguenots with Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli, and Moïse with Mdme. Bosio. Twelve representations of Madlle. Sophie Cruvelli have realised for M. Roqueplan the entire amount of the appointements guaranteed to that eminent artist, for the first year of her engagement. This is the best answer to those who blame the management for having agreed to such apparently extravagant terms.—The Emperor and Empress, accompanied by the reigning Duke of Saxe-Cobourg, were present at the last representation of Moïse.—The first performance of Spontini's La Vestale is fixed for Monday.—M. Théophile Gautier's new ballet, which has been set to music by Count Gabrielli, is again in rehearsal. Mdme. Cerito, who composes all the pas, and superintends the arrangements, is to sustain the principal character. The ballet will be given on the off-nights of La Vestale.—M. Labarre is also commissioned to write the music of a ballet for Mdme. Rosati, who will make her re-appearance some time in the month of April.

A new opera, in two acts, by MM. E. Sauvage and F. Bazin, is in active rehearsal at the Opéra Comique. The principal parts are entrusted to Messrs. Couderc, Sainte-Foy, Faure, Ponchard, Lemaire, Mdlles. Andréa, Favel, Bellia, and Talmont. The next novelty will be an opera, in three acts, by M. Victor Massé.—At the Théâtre-Italien, La Donna del Lago, and Le Tre Nozze (Alary), are in rehearsal. There is also some talk of Pacini's Gli Arabi. The Barbiere still attracts. Mdme. Gassier and her husband are positively engaged for next season.—At the Théâtre-Lyrique the entertainments consisted, last week, of La Fille Invisible, Elisabeth, and Le Bijou Perdu. The last-named opera will shortly be replaced by a new one from the pen of M. L. Clapisson.—On Saturday, Mdme. Pleyel, who is here for a short time, played at a concert, the proceeds of which were destined for charitable objects. The celebrated pianist was rapturously applauded. Her magnificent talent seems to grow with years. If it were possible for Mdme. Pleyel to improve, we might say she had improved.—M. E. Deldevez, one of the three leaders at the Opera, lately invited his friends and the members of the Press to a performance of several works of his composition at M. Pleyel's. The instrumentalists were Messrs. Deldevez, Sänger, Viguier, Regnault, and Goria. The vocal music was executed by M. Boulo.—Mdlle. Ida Bertrand has declined a lucrative engagement for the Opera at Rio Janiero.

Lyons.—Mdme. Tedesco has appeared in the Favorita with great applause.

Madrid.—Verdi's Trovatore has been well received here.

Bologna.—Teresa Bertinolli, formerly celebrated as a vocalist, died on the 12th of February, aged seventy-eight.

Rome.—A new opera, by Sangiorgi, entitled La Mendicante, was produced, on the 11th of February, at the Argentina Theatre. It succeeded.

Vienna.—Staudigl has not renewed his contract with the Opera. Hölzl has been engaged in his place, to sing the part of Rocco in Fidelio.—Mdlle. Maria Cruvelli, it is understood, has declined an engagement at the same theatre.—Herr Goldschmidt has returned to Dresden, to bring Jenny Lind, whose first concert at Vienna is announced to take place on the 28th, in the Redouten Saal.—Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord will be brought out here under the direction of the composer.

Brunswick.—Verdi's Rigoletto has been very creditably brought out, under the direction of Herr Abt.

Funfkirchen.—The flautist, Prosper Amtmann, a native of Hungary, died on the ninth of January. He was one of the best performers on his instrument. His tone was considered one of the sweetest ever heard, and his shake was perfect.

Berlin.—The Brothers Leopold and Moritz Ganz gave a vocal and instrumental concert on the 24th ult., in the Royal Concert Rooms, which was honoured by the presence of the King and Court. The following artistes from the Opera assisted:—Mdme. Tuczek, Mdlle. Trietsch, Herr Theodore Formes, and Herr Düffke. Madame Parish Alvars played a solo on the harp, the composition of her husband, and was encored. The brothers L. and M. Ganz played several solos and duets on the violin and violoncello. The orchestra was directed by Herr Leopold Ganz. The overtures to Oberon and Fidelio were played. Herr Eduard Ganz was the accompanyist on the piano.

Verona.—At the Imperial Theatre, Verdi's Il Trovatore has been produced with great success. The Veronese dilettanti declare the new opera to be superior to Rigoletto. The cast is excellent, embracing, in the principal characters, Mdlle. Lotti, who has a magnificent voice; Bettini, the tenor; and Sig. Veroni, the new barytone. The last named is an Englishman, and, though he was not warmly received at first by the public, in a few nights he completely won their suffrages. Sig. Veroni has a good appearance, a fine voice, and real artistic feeling. He only wants a little more experience to be a real acquisition to the operatic stage.

Constantinople.—Rigoletto will succeed Il Trovatore, after which La Fiorina is to be produced.

PROVINCIAL

Manchester.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The eighth and last concert of the present series of the Classical Chamber Music Society, took place in the Town Hall on the evening of the 2nd instant. M. Sainton (violin), Charles Hallé (pianoforte), and Sig. Piatti (violoncello), were the performers. The hall was well filled with a select and attentive audience. The first part of the programme was devoted to Beethoven, and included the trio in G (Op. 1), and the sonata for piano and violoncello in A (Op. 69). Both were admirably executed, and thoroughly appreciated by the audience. The playing of Sig. Piatti in the sonata was perfection. Mendelssohn's fine trio in C minor, which began the second part, was equally well played, and equally enjoyed. M. Sainton performed a Romance and Tarantella of his own composition in a very remarkable manner, and was greatly applauded. M. Hallé, as usual, terminated the concert with a selection of short pieces for piano solus. It being the last night of the season, when he came on to play them, he was greeted with more than the accustomed applause. The selection on this occasion included Henselt's study in B, one by Mendelssohn in F minor (from the Etudes de Perfectionnement, edited by Mr. Moscheles and M. Fétis), and the last movement of Weber's first grand sonata, which to our surprise was announced in the programme as "Le Mouvement Perpetuel (Rondo in C)—Weber." It is strange enough to find M. Hallé mutilating a classical sonata; still more so when the fact is attempted to be disguised from the audience. If M. Hallé was in want of a quick movement by Weber, there was the Moto continuo, in B flat, at his orders, which would have been decidedly better than cutting off the tail of a great sonata.

Leeds.—The Leeds Mercury informs us, that the Recreation Society is about to lose the services of its conductor, Mr. Spark. Mr. Spark will direct the concerts already announced.

Edinburgh.—(From our own Correspondent).—The operatic season came to a close on Friday evening, when acts were given from L'Elisir d'Amore, Les Huguenots, and Lucrezia Borgia. The principal artists, Madame Caradori, Miss Huddart, Herren Reichardt and Formes, and Signor Bettini, were recalled several times, with enthusiasm. The applause given to Miss Huddart's "Il Segreto per esser' felice" seemed interminable. The speculation must have been highly successful for Messrs. Wood and Wyndham, who certainly did their utmost to give the public complete representations.

On Monday, Miss Fitzpatrick made her first appearance as Lady Teazle, and acted in her usual spirited and lady-like manner. She was received with marked favour. Mr. and Mrs. Wyndham played Charles Surface and Mrs. Candour; they were both excellent. Mr. Lambert's Sir Peter Teazle is too well known in the metropolis, to need comment.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM WEBER.

[The following is a translation of a letter addressed to the father of Mr. Benedict, the well-known composer, when, as a boy, he was studying under the illustrious author of Der Freischutz.]

Dresden, 10th February, 1822.

I HAVE been always prevented from thanking you for your esteemed letter and your kind present. I wished to write you a long and detailed letter, but could not find leisure for it. Now, at last, only a few hours before starting for Vienna, I claim the greater indulgence for brevity.

My excellent Julius gives me real gratification, and I trust that time, severe study and application, combined with his true talent and intellectual endowments, will some day present him to the world as a genuine artist. Such a long separation from your dear son must indeed be a great trial for you, but I think it my duty to urge upon you not to do the thing by halves, but secure yourself twofold joy and comfort for your whole life by what you now deny yourself.

A serious and deep study of the art must progress slowly and by degrees, and can only thus give self-possession to the artist's mind. Indeed it is a lamentable symptom of our time, that we are all content with the mere surface; and, casting off too soon the band of apprenticeship, henceforth, in ever vacillating weakness, aim at producing effects, which, glaring without substance, quickly vanish. It excites a sad smile when we think how everybody admits that the business of a merchant requires several years of application, and that even for a mechanic, besides the three or four years apprenticeship, other probationary years are deemed essential. In art only—the profoundest and most comprehensive study of life—probably a few months of superficial observation are thought sufficient to accomplish the task.

Instead of giving your son the twelve lessons a month I promised, I have had him with me daily. I do not mention this in order to obtain your thanks, but merely to show you what time is required for the simplest elementary studies. To keep alive his inventive faculty, I have even now let him venture upon compositions, which he ought not yet to have been allowed to undertake; but, thank God, I have found my rich reward in his own good sense, since through these very compositions he has acquired the conviction of how great the distance still is to the goal. I must leave off, as the abundance of my subject would carry me too far. The little I have said comes from my inmost heart and conviction, and from the truly sympathetic interest and affection I feel for my dear Julius.

In my thoughts I share with you the joy of your meeting again. My wife unites with me in kindest regards, and I remain, with greatest esteem,

Yours faithfully,
C. M. VON WEBER.

DUBLIN.—The Royal Choral Institute performed Schumann's Peri, for the second time, on Wednesday, the 8th instant. Mr. Geary was the treble, and Mr. J. Glover the bass; the Misses Cruise and Keane the soprani. The members also gave, on the same evening, selections from Handel's Judas Maccabæus, and some sacred pieces from various oratorios.

THEATRES IN PARIS.

At the Théâtre Français, the petite comédie of Madame de Girardin, La Joie fait Peur, has been completely successful. Mdlle. Augustine Brohan has nearly recovered from her ophthalmic attack, which threatened to deprive her of sight, and will shortly, it is hoped, return to her duties.—The Odéon is rehearsing a new comedy by M. Henri Monnier, entitled Les Dernières Armes de M. Coquerel.—One of the proverbes of M. Octave Feuillet has been brought out at the Gymnase, as a comedy, in four parts, under the name of La Crise.—The Vaudeville has revived the comedy of Hortense de Cerny, by the late M. Bayard and M. Arthur de Beauplan. A new piece by M.M. Clairville and J. Cordier, Mesdames les Pirates, has also been produced. On dit, that M. Bocage will be engaged for a drama called Le Marbrier, by M. Alexandre Dumas.—At the Variétés, the Carnaval Partout has been succeeded by Deux Femmes en Gage, a work of the same description. A proverbe—Où passerai-je mes Soirées?—by Messrs. Charles Potier and De Montheau, has been produced with success, for M. Numa and Madame Fitzjames.—A drama in five acts, by M. Théodore Anne, is playing at the Ambigu-Comique, under the title of L'Enfant du Régiment.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—LATEST INTELLIGENCE.—(By Electric Telegraph).—Friday, March 17.—A grand "solemnity" is to take place to-night at the Académie Impériale de Musique, in honour of Prince Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen (and perhaps to console him for the failure of his diplomatic mission). His Majesty the Emperor has commanded the first representation of Spontini's grand serious opera, La Vestale, the revival of which has been anticipated for so many weeks, with a curiosity and interest quite equal to that which attended the début of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli at the French Opera, in the Huguenots of Meyerbeer. It is well known that Cruvelli has been studying the character of the Vestal, and it is the general opinion that the part, one of the most arduous ever written, will prove eminently suited to her. Mdlle. Poinsot, M. Roger, and M. Obin, are also in the cast. So great has been the demand for places, that the most "fabulous" prices have been paid, and at present not a seat can be obtained on any consideration. On Wednesday, in consequence of the Emperor's desire, there was no performance at the Opera. A full rehearsal took place instead; so that the relâche was not without its uses. The Vestale is said to be in a high state of preparation, and an immense success is expected. If this is realised, M. Nestor Roqueplan, director of the Opera, will be again on the broad road to fortune. Before the engagement of Mdlle. Cruvelli, it was the general belief that he was on his "last legs."

IBID.—At the Fourth concert of the Conservatoire, Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night was performed for the third time, in a much more satisfactory manner, both as regards choruses and solos, than on the former occasions. Two unpublished pieces formed part of the programme of the fifth concert: a motet and chorus, "Inclina Domine," by Cherubini, and the fragments of a ballet, *Gli Uomini di Prometeo by Beethoven. The principal features of the last are an overture, a tempest, an adagio, an allegretto, and a finale. The audience, proud of their new discovery, were enchanted with the music and with themselves. Mdlle. Wertheimber has appeared as Leonore in La Favorite. Rossini's Moïse retains its place in the bills. La Nonne Sanglante will shortly be produced, the principal parts by Mesdames Poinsot, Dussy, Wertheimber, MM. Gueymard, Depassio, and Merly.

IBID.—At the Opéra-Comique, La Dame Blanche has been revived for the new tenor, Puget, from Rouen. The fifth representation of the Etoile du Nord was attended by the Duke of Saxe-Cobourg. At the conclusion of the second act, his Royal Highness went upon the stage, and, after congratulating M. Perrin upon the mise-en-scène, and general execution of the opera, caused all the actors to be presented to him in succession, and complimented them in terms which were the more flattering as emanating from one who is himself a composer and the author of Casilda.† The prince highly complimented M. Meyerbeer, who was present, for the beauty and science displayed in this, his latest, chef-d'œuvre. L'Etoile has reached its twelfth representation; all the places are taken up to the 20th. The new three-act opera by M. Clapisson about to be produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique, is entitled La Fleur de Provence. The principal part is confided to Mdme. Marie Cabel.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The frequenters of the Imperial Italian Opera have presented Mdme. La Grange with a magnificent bracelet worth £500, with the name of the donors engraved on it. She is re-engaged for next season, on the same terms as those of Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli at the Grand Opera in Paris—viz.: £4,000. (Query?)

VIENNA.—At the Imperial Opera House, the tenor, Herr Ander, has re-appeared as Stradella, in Flotow's opera, after a long absence.—Mdlle. Plunkett is dancing in La Vivandière, which was originally written for Mad. Cerito and M. St. Léon. After a long period of retirement, M. Leopold de Meyer once more appeared in public on the 4th inst. As a proof of the great excitement caused by the début of this celebrated pianist, we may mention that, in spite of the late hour (half-past ten o'clock), the large room of the Musikverein was crammed to suffocation by the élite of Vienna. "M. Leopold de Meyer," says the Neue Wiener Musik-Zeitung, "was received with thunders of applause, that lasted for several minutes. The peculiar characteristics which have raised him to the high position he occupies on both sides of the Ocean, on the banks of the Neva and the Seine, of the Thames and the Donau, are, if possible, more marked than ever. His touch is more elastic and rounder, his mechanism has reached a marvellous state of perfection, and his execution, without having lost anything of its strength, certainty, and bravura, has become still more delicate and graceful. Of the four new compositions introduced on this occasion—Souvenir d'Italie, Tableau Caractéristique, Grande Fantaisie sur le Prophète, and Das Kosakenlied—the second and third pleased the most, being especially distinguished by their melody and the effective manner in which they are treated. M. de Meyer was rapturously applauded, and called for by the audience." Herr Ander and Madame Hermann-Ezillag, from the Imperial Opera, were the singers, and Herr Schmit played a solo on the violoncello. Among the accompanyists on the piano, was Herr Proch. The Gesellschaft der Musik-Freunde gave their third concert in the large Redoutensaal, on the 5th. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony (choral), Mendelssohn's overture, Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt, and a chorus from Handel's Sampson were the full pieces. The solos in the symphony were taken by Fräuleins Tietjens and Bury, Herren Erl and Hölzl.

ROSTOCK.—Mdlle. Therese Milanollo has given three concerts, which were well attended.

STUTTGART.—At the Subscription Concerts of the Royal Chapel of which there are twelve annually, under the direction of the Hofcapellmeister Klicken, works by Mendelssohn and other great masters previously unknown here, have been performed. Verdi's Attila has been given for the first time at our Opera.

ZURICH.—The Allgemeine Musik-Gesellschaft is giving a series of concerts under the direction of Herr Richard Wagner. Among other works of importance produced, we may mention Beethoven's Symphonies in F and B flat, the music to Egmont, Haydn's Symphony in D, Weber's overture to Euryanthe, and the female chorus and march from Herr Wagner's opera of Rienzi. Concerts have also been given by the two Männergesang-Vereine—Harmonie, and Stadt Zürich. Herr Seitz, from Reutlingen, lately inaugurated the new organ built by Herr Walcher for the Frauenmünster.

MANCHESTER.—A dress concert was given at the Concert-Hall on Wednesday evening, the 8th instant. The programme was a first-rate one, including Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, Beethoven's overture to Fidelio, Mr. Sterndale Bennett's overture to the Naïades, and Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, with Mr. Charles Hallé at the piano. The vocal selection was from Mozart, Guglielmi, Weber, Marschner, etc. The solo parts in the Walpurgis Night were taken by Miss Dolby, Herr Reichart, and Herr Formes. Mr. Hallé conducted the whole concert, with the exception of the Choral Fantasia, when, Mr. Hallé being engaged at the piano, Mr. Seymour wielded the bâton.

BRIGHTON.—Mr. J. Marshall, a pupil of Mr. Bond, gave a Sacred Concert at the Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 20th. The whole of the Messiah has not been performed in Brighton, since the opening of St. Peter's Church, when Braham, Phillips, Mrs. Knyvett, and Madame Brambilla took the principal parts. On the present occasion, the principal singers were Mrs. Bond (soprano), Miss C. Henderson (contralto), Mr. G. Perren (tenor) and Mr. Marshall, the bénéficiaire (bass). We cannot speak too much in praise of Mr. Marshall; his singing would have done credit to the Exeter Hall Concerts. "We must not criticise the performance of the choruses, for we believe the Sacred Harmonic Society of this town, of which the chorus was composed, had not sufficient time to get the whole of them up. The orchestra was led by Mr. Gutteridge. Mr. Bond was conductor. Mr. Surman, the well-known director of the Sacred Concerts at Exeter Hall, was in the body of the room with his score of the Messiah, watching every bar with as much interest as if he were wielding the bâton himself."—Brighton Gazette.

DUBLIN.—The London Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Frank Mori, gave a concert on Wednesday morning, in the Exhibition Building. The Lord Lieutenant and Countess of St. Germains, and several of the nobility and fashion of Dublin, were present. The vice-regal party were received at the state entrance by the Lord Mayor, etc., the band playing the national anthem as they entered. The concert was an excellent one. The instrumental features were the overture to Guillaume Tell, and the Coronation March from the Prophète. Miss Thirlwall was very much applauded in the new Irish ballad, "Norah spinning," written by Mr. Frank Mori. In the evening, the London Orchestra gave a soirée at the Music Hall. Mendelssohn's march from Athalie was received with immense favour, and Miss Thirlwall was still more successful than in the morning. The University Choral Society gave a concert the same evening. The Lord Lieutenant and Countess of St. Germains were present.

LEEDS.—Haydn's Creation was performed at the People's Concert on Monday evening week. The band and chorus consisted consisted of one hundred and twenty performers, amongst whom were Mr. Bowling (the leader), and several of the best instrumentalists of the town. Mrs. Sunderland, Mr. Perring, and Mr. Winn were the principal vocalists. Although the performance was not without fault, yet on the whole the oratorio went well. The band and chorus, conducted by Mr. Spark, were very efficient.—Leeds Mercury.

LIVERPOOL.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed at our Philharmonic-hall on Monday evening. The principal singers were Miss Birch, Miss Fanny Huddart, Herr Reichardt, and Herr Carl Formes

---

* The Men of Promotheus, well known to all but the French. The overture is the most familiar of Beethoven's!—ED.

† An opera which was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1851, with Mdme. Charton as the heroine.

THE prayer for victory has been propitious, and Theseus returns, bringing, as glorious trophies of his triumph, the rescued daughters of the fated King. The enraptured Œdipus checks the overflowing expression of his joyous welcome, to pay his debt of thanks to his children's deliverer, and to ask of him the history of his contest with Creon. We have already seen how essentially a nationalist was Sophocles, and this is further shown in his dignified delineation of the character of Theseus, the Athenian king: thus we ever find him, throughout the work, displaying to his countrymen the greatness above all other greatness of their happy state, great in the gods' protection, great in its natural endowments, great in its people, great in its laws, great in its hospitality, and greatest in its noble race of heroes, showing, through all and beyond all, the glory of their own age, the emulation of all time to come. Thus, for a poet to teach a people, was, indeed, to nurture them upon the milk of lions, to feed them with the radiancy of glory, till it became an element essential to their existence, and to implant in them a thirst for it in its utmost refinement, through the medium of an ideal beauty, that was unquenchable. Theseus is presented as a mighty conqueror, but with no words for his deeds, conscious of his own power, but with no tongue for its achievements; the honoured of all men, best honouring himself in shunning the applause that waits upon his acts, in which, and not in their acknowledgment, lay his true greatness.

Returning from the field of fight, the monarch passed the altar of Neptune, upon which he was offering a sacrifice when summoned to the relief of Antigone and her sister. A stranger, from Argos, sitting in the sanctuary, whose occupation of which entitled him to the protection of the god, appealed to Theseus to obtain for him speech with Œdipus. Œdipus forebodes that the only one from Argos who can require a meeting with him must be his son Polynices, whom, in his long-treasured resentment, he refuses to see. He yields, however, to the urgency of Antigone and of the King, who goes to send his client to the desired meeting, still assuring Œdipus of his continued protection.

VI.

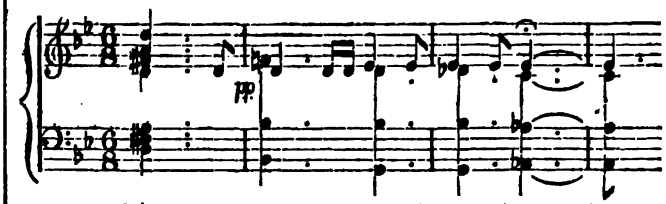
Here follows another Ode, the third, which is a reflection on the vanities of life, a subject little indeed fitted for lyrical illustration, but one that has called forth one of the most easily appreciable, and, on this account, at least, one of the most pleasing compositions in the entire work. The Strophe speaks of the folly of age in clinging to the world and its sorrows; the Antistrophe, of the recklessness of youth in plunging into the snares that beset us; and, the Epode draws a conclusion from these two that human life with its passion, its crime, its disappointment, its remorse, is like a northern shore beaten by the tempestuous waves of winter. This, it will be seen, is a different form from that of the preceding Odes, upon which also the musical construction of the dialogue scenes between the principal characters and the Chorus is modelled; and the plan of this piece accordingly differs from that of the others.

The Strophe is set to a mournful and very peculiar melody, extremely simple in its progressions, but powerfully marked by the singularity of its rhythmical divisions. As though especially to confirm the didactic character of the piece, by recalling our associations of the inspired strains of the classical muse with the lyre to which they were sung, the melody given in unison by all the voices is accompanied in full detached chords by the harp, and so stands out in very powerful prominence. Thus, it commences:—

and the rhythmical peculiarity to which I have alluded is pointed out by these signs '', which mark the divisions of the verse that define the metre of the music. I must particularly notice the very original effect of the phrase comprised in the fifth and sixth bars, and again upon the charming extension of the last phrase of my quotation in the repetition by wind instruments of the two prolonged concluding notes of the voices. There is great earnestness in the passage to the words,

"Even its wishes end in Hades."

The very individual harmony of which, given in sustained notes by the string instruments, embodies the solemn mystery of the words.



The final lines enumerate the fancied joys which excite our hopes, and which each and all in common fade when we believe we possess them. This is most expressively rendered in a passage that gradually rises with the rising of the sentiment, and suddenly falls at the concluding words.

Here is word-painting, if you will, but of how different a character from that punning upon the technicalities of our art which deforms—or worse, which renders ridiculous—even some of the masterpieces of the greatest musicians! An artist has no right to turn to account the grammar knowledge of his audience as an illustration of his subject; but, what else can we call the curiously-twisted vocal passage that represents the word "crooked" in the first song in the Messiah, or the alternate low notes and high notes that image the successive phrases, "How deep the Ditch," and "How high the Walls," in the Chorus of Babylonians reviling the besieging Persians, in Belshazzar.

Digitized by Google

Here, on the contrary, passing from the thought of death, hope is built upon desire, and expectation upon hope, in exciting climax, the pinnacle of which is disappointment, the tomb of all; and the following of this course of the sentiment, in the music that embodies it, is indeed a beautiful and most ideal enforcement of the poet's thought.

The Antistrophe is an exact repetition of the music of the Strophe, with some very slight additions to the instrumentation. The composer has taken advantage of the very complete symmetry of the poem, in which there are words of corresponding importance, and of more or less analagous purport, at every relative point where the Strophe has given occasion for particular verbal expression or declamation. Thus, the passages which I have particularised, as being no less pertinent to the text than musically interesting, are applied with similar propriety to the sentiment of this portion of the poem.

The Epode is distinguished, first, by a change to the major key; next, by the combination of the two choirs which have successively sung the Strophe and the Antistrophe, and by their being distributed in full harmony, instead of concentred in unisonous melody; and, lastly, by the continuous motion in quavers of the accompaniment, all of which give great freshness to the new musical ideas that are now introduced, while the continuation of the same measure and the same tempo preserves such connexion between this and the preceding portion of the movement as to establish the unity of the whole. I confess myself less delighted with this portion of the present piece than with the greater part of the work; and I am disappointed to find that with all these accessories to musical effect which I have described, there is but little of that especial beauty which results not from accountable causes, and, arbitrariiy, being beautiful because it is beautiful, enslaves our admiration and defies our definition. Bear witness, however, that I am stating an impression, not pronouncing a judgment; and if any of you find in this Epode the charm by which I am unaffected, resist it not, but yield a willing sympathy to its influence, and be the happier for its effect. The beautiful in art is, indeed, a witch's elixir that inspires us with youth, and power, and love, and woe to him that hangs a horseshoe over the threshold of his imagination to exclude its magical fascination! I cannot dismiss, however, the music under discussion with indifferent disregard. Not to be equal to the rest of the work, is, certainly, not to be uninteresting, and I still find much to admire, if not to delight in. I will especially notice the concluding passage of the voices, in which, after the bright effect of the chord of C at the end of the crescendo, the softness of the unaccompanied voices is charming, and the perfectly exquisite effect of the bass note for the orchestra, extra to the vocal harmony, which comes in a bar later, and of the entry of the additional instruments that fill up the chord upon the final close, is one of those very felicitous novelties in which Mendelssohn more frequently than any composer succeeds.

The Argive stranger proves to be Polynices. He is lovingly greeted by his sisters, but Œdipus, blind in heart as eyeless to external nature, has no paternal consciousness beyond the memory of the wrongs he has endured. His son appeals to him to give the propitiation of his presence to the struggle for the Theban crown. He professes penitence for his unfilial crimes, and claims his father's preternatural support of his contest for his birthright throne. In majestic silence, standing like a monument of his own misfortunes, affecting all who see him, but immovable, insensitive, himself, the blind parent hears his son's adjurations. Entreated by Antigone and by the Chorus, he, at length, loosens his stern severity in speech,—but his speech is a curse, the most deadly, the most awful. In words of deep prophetic purpose, he calls down upon his rebellious sons death by each other's hands, and Polynices departs, unable to retract his advances in the war, certain of the fate denounced against him, exacting Antigone's promise to inter with funereal rites his remains. Thus is accounted for the play of Antigone, the sequel to the present work, in which the heroine, against the command of Creon, who fills the throne left vacant by the death of both the brothers, accomplishes her vow to the departing Polynices. G. A. Macfarren.

Quartet Concerts, Crosby Hall.—The fifth took place on Monday. The selection was by no means the best of the season. A quartet of Pleyel (first time of performance) was a novelty. This quartet is exceedingly simple in combination and development. It was loudly applauded. Miss Ransford sang Mozart's aria from Don Giovanni, "Crudele ah no." Hummel's trio (op. 83), for piano, violin, and violoncello, was played by Miss Binfield Williams, Messrs. Dando and Lucas. Miss R. Williams afterwards gave Weber's "Invitation à la Vals." Miss Ransford sang Sterndale Bennett's charming song, "Maydew," and a ballad of her father's. The two quartets (Haydn No. 81 and Mozart in D) were played with the usual refinement and precision. The last concert was announced for the 27th inst.

Sussex Hall.—Mr. George Perren gave a concert on Monday evening. He was assisted by a long array of vocalists, and by Mdlle. St. Marc, (piano), Mr. G. Case, (concertina), and the Brothers Holmes (violin), as instrumentalists. The vocalists' names were "legion." We may mention as those who distinguished themselves, Miss Fanny Ternan, Miss Stabbach, Miss Ransford, and Miss Alleyne. Mdlle. St. Marc was loudly encored in the Lucrezia Borgia fantasia, when she substituted the "Carnival de Vénise." The conductors were Herr Meyer Lutz and Messrs. Simpson and Broadman.

Panopticon.—On Thursday we were admitted to the subscribers' view of the building, which was crowded. There was a military band on the platform in front of the organ. The stalls round the galleries were filled with their occupants. There were solos on the organ at intervals; and a new instrument, called the Euphotine, was exhibited in one of the lecture rooms. It is a keyed instrument, having a tone nearly resembling the musical glasses. The regular musical performances and lectures will not begin until to-day, when the building will be opened to the public. The fountain in the centre of the floor throws its middle jet through the glass dome, the entire height of the building. Among the sculpture, "The Houri," by Monti, an Italian artist, and "The Deer Stalker," by Stephens, attracted most attention. Of the trades, we have only room to mention Dart's patent printing machine, and the cork hats of Mr. Gaines, who can reduce the weight of a hat of this material to four and a half ounces. There is every prospect of the Institution extensively exciting public attention.

Crystal Palace, Sydenham.—Mr. Schallehn, bandmaster of the 17th Lancers, was appointed, on Wednesday, Musical Director of this national establishment. The orchestra will consist of above Sixty Performers on wind instruments. The salary is £500 a year with residence. There were upwards of one hundred candidates.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

After his unsuccessful application to the Elector, the only alternative for Mozart was to proceed further on his travels. His friends, however, called attention to the season of the year (midwinter), but would probably have failed to detain him, had they not adduced more weighty reasons than the severity of the weather, and the bad state of the roads. Cannabich promised him a large number of pupils; another proposed to board, and a third to lodge him; while a rich Hollander, a great lover of music, offered him 200 florins for three short and easy pianoforte concertos, and two compositions for the flute. It was also suggested that he should write some duets for pianoforte and flute, to be published by subscription. Here was work enough for at least two months, and, as the propositions were advantageous, Mozart determined to remain. Soon afterwards, he made a trip to Kirchheim-Boland, then the residence of the Princess of Weilburg Oranien, whose love for music was well known. He stopped there eight days; and, as the reader will readily believe, was actively employed the whole of the time. But, in spite of the agreeable connections he had formed in Mannheim, and notwithstanding other reasons still more attractive, Mozart longed to start for Paris.

"I am a composer"—he writes to his father—"and was born to be a capellmeister; I cannot, therefore, bury the talent with which the Almighty, in his bounty, has so richly endowed me (I may assert it without arrogance, since I feel it more than ever); and this would be the case, if I had a great number of pupils to teach. The idea of writing an opera is always in my head—but rather in French than in German, and rather in Italian than either. All at Wendling's† are of opinion that my compositions would please extremely in Paris: I am tolerably successful, as you know, in adopting and imitating all sorts and styles of composition."

No sooner had Mozart arrived in the "Great City," than his hopes seemed actually on the point of being realised. Dame Fortune, who, in Germany, had passed him on the road, appeared to be waiting for him at the gates of Paris. A face of good augury—that of a well-tried friend—was among the first to meet his eye, on re entering the capital where he had gathered so many laurels in the famous period of his childhood. Grimm, whose social position, a short time previously, had considerably changed, was the same as ever towards his old acquaintance. The author turned into an ambassador, the plain gentleman into a baronet, was, nevertheless, still attached to Mozart. His influence in the fashionable and musical worlds was again exerted in favour of the young composer. Mozart was invited to dine with Mdme. d'Epinay, MM. Noverre and Le Gros. The last, while no less celebrated than the others, being director of the Concerts Spirituels, was of more consequence to Mozart than either of them. There were many occasions on which it was thought that Mozart's talent might be turned to account, and ere long an opportunity presented itself. Capellmeister Holzbauer, of Mannheim, had just sent a Miserere of his composition to Paris, which was to be executed in Passion Week. Holzbauer had adapted his music to the means at his disposal in Mannheim, where the choruses were bad and few in number, while in Paris they were both numerous and excellent. On this account, Le Gros commissioned Mozart to write choruses better suited to the resources of the Concerts Spirituels. The offer was highly flattering; but there were only a few days to Passion Week, the Miserere had to be retouched from beginning to end, and, whatever the inconvenience, it was necessary that the work should be done in the director's room. The reason is not given in the correspondence. Mozart, who saw no obstacles, and was never at a loss, no matter what the restrictions imposed on him, when he was required to compose, completed his task before the time appointed.

"I assure you I am very glad"—he writes to his father—"that I have finished this scribbling work; for, when you cannot compose at home, and, moreover, are pressed for time, you are placed in a confounded dilemma."

The choruses were shown to Gossec, who pronounced them admirable. "Gossec is a very good friend, and a very dry fellow," says Mozart—and, he would have liked to add, "the person most capable in all France of appreciating me." Judges of this stamp were rare in Paris. As soon as the Miserere was arranged, Mozart was requested to compose a symphony concertante for four artists of the Concerts Spirituels:—Wendling (flute), Ramm (oboe), Punto (horn), and Ritter (bassoon); while Noverre engaged to procure him a libretto for an opera, with the aid of a friend to whom he had communicated the plot. This person had already written the first act, but was not decided about the name of the opera. Mozart was of opinion it should be called Alexander and Roxana. The letter in which he discloses this important intelligence, concludes as follows:—

"Baron Grimm and myself often vent our musical indignation on the performances here. N.B. This is between ourselves; for, in public, the cry is always: 'Bravo, Bravissimo,' and people applaud until their fingers tingle. What makes me most angry is, that my worthy friends, the French, have only improved their goût so far as to be able to listen to good music as well as bad. But as to perceiving that their own music is bad——they can't do that on any account!——and their singing! Oime!——If French women would give up singing Italian airs, I would excuse their French squalling: but for such people to spoil good music is insupportable."

To this, Leopold Mozart returned the following oracular answer:—

"I am sorry the French have not entirely changed their taste; but, believe me, they will do so gradually. It is no small thing to improve a whole nation. It is enough that they can listen to what is good as well as bad; by degrees they will understand the difference."

At present the French do understand it, but neither father nor son was destined to witness the great and wonderful fact of their musical transformation.

Wishing again to introduce Mozart to the Princess de Bourbon, who had known him as a child, Grimm gave our hero a letter of recommendation to the Duchess de Chabot, one of the Princess's ladies of honour. The letter was delivered, and Mozart commanded to attend on that day week. He was punctual to the time appointed. The weather must have been very cold, to judge from what follows:

"I had to wait half-an-hour in a large icy-cold apartment, without a fire and even without a fire-place. At last, Madame de Chabot appeared, and, in a very polite manner, begged me to content myself with the piano. None of hers, she said, were in a proper condition. On her requesting me to try, I said I would play with all my heart, but that, for the moment, it was impossible, as I could not feel my fingers for the cold, and begged that I might, at least, be shewn into a room where there was a fire.

'O, oui, Monsieur, vous avez raison,' was all she replied. She then sat down and began to draw, en compagnie with a number of gentlemen, who were seated round a large table. In this condition, I had the honour of waiting for one whole hour. The doors and windows were open, and not only were my hands cold, but my body and feet; I also began to suffer from headache. There was altum silentium, and I did not know what to do for cold, headache, and ennui. I often thought that, were it not for M. Grimm, I should instantly take my leave. To be brief, however, I played upon the wretched piano; but what most annoyed me was that the lady and her gentlemen never ceased drawing for a single instant, so that I played merely for the benefit of the table, chairs, and walls. In this disagreeable position, I lost my patience; I began Fischer's Variations, which I played half through, and then rose, upon which I received a great deal of applause. I was obliged to say, however, that I could not do myself justice on such a piano, and that I should very much prefer to come another day, when there would be a better instrument. The Duchess would not hear of my going, and I was compelled to wait an hour longer, until her husband came. He sat down beside me and listened with the greatest attention, which, when I perceived, forgetting cold, and headache, and everything, I played, in spite of the villanous piano, as I can play when I am in a good humour."

The naïveté of this communication strikes me as throwing a light upon Mozart's character, in more than one particular. Never before, perhaps, had he met with such a reception. The lady of the house allowed him to wait like a lackey, said nothing about the object of his visit, but pointed to a piece of furniture, representing a piano—which was as much as to signify, "You understand nothing else; go and seat yourself at the instrument, while we devote ourselves to other matters." He complained of the cold, and was laughed at. What was the more astonishing—Madame de Chabot behaved in this manner to a celebrated composer at a period when the nobles of France were proud of the society of scholars and artists, whose reputation they absurdly endeavoured to emulate, by the composition of four line stanzas, insignificant water-colour drawings, or trumpery ballads. Imagine a French musician of eminence in Mozart's place, and think what epigrams couched in obsequious language, what searching though respectful sarcasm, would have been launched at the Duchess for her arrogance. Any other German musician would have told her his mind in a manner less polite, or, without a word, have turned on his heel and left the room. But Mozart, who of all men in the world possessed least of the courtier's talent, and who had so sensitive a feeling of his own worth, though treated as if he were a mere automaton, remained patient and enduring for an hour! What prevented him from going away, or from making one of those cutting remarks, which he never hesitated to use before reigning sovereigns when he thought they were called for? Was he fearful of displeasing the Duchess, or of missing an interview with the Princess de Bourbon, together with the present she might be disposed to offer him? Not at all. Mozart pocketed the affront simply because he was loth to annoy or to compromise his friend Grimm. It never occurred to him to pretext the ordinary excuses which at once suggest themselves to those who are desirous of retiring from disagreeable company, although he might thus easily have reconciled the duty he owed to himself with the consideration due to friendship. His pure soul disdained a lie, even when it obtruded itself in the form of harmless stratagem, and when the concealment of the truth was imperative. The conclusion of his interview with the Duchess, however, was still more characteristic.

We all know what is artistic self-love. A moderate amount of praise, a compliment not exaggerated, or a comparison which the speaker may himself think flattering is sometimes construed into an insult. Artists have a keen recollection of persons who listen to them with indifference. It is difficult, frequently impossible, to atone for a fault of this description. In the present instance, we have an artist, in his own estimation inferior to none of his contemporaries, but, on the contrary, unrivalled in the world—and who only differs from others in this high degree of self-respect, inasmuch as he is not mistaken in his belief—utterly humbled, and with physical discomfort added to moral degradation. Mozart had every reason to be indignant: but, on the arrival of some one who appears to take pleasure in listening to him, he forgets the pain and slights he has endured for upwards of two hours, sits down to an execrable spinet, and plays as he is accustomed "when in a good humour." This is precisely the behaviour of a good-tempered child, who, after having been submitted to unjust punishment, laughs through its tears at the first passer-by who takes notice of it. The desire of charming his hearers, was with Mozart, a matter of feeling not of self-esteem. It was, as we shall see, the result of his passion for music, causing him to feel so much the more pleasure himself when he was the cause of pleasure in others. In the letter from which we have quoted, he says:

"Had I the best piano in Europe, with a set of people for listeners without either the power or the will to understand anything, and, therefore, unable to feel with me while I am playing, I should myself lose all enjoyment."

No young traveller, attracted by curiosity or business to Paris, was ever, perhaps, more quickly satiated with its pleasures than Mozart.* Parisian manners did not suit his German straightforwardness. The French struck him as being far less amiable than fifteen years before. Their national character was full of faults, which, in his reckoning, were summed up in the general accusation that they did not understand music. There was everything in Paris, except an Opera with singers, and a public with ears; consequently, for Mozart, there was nothing. His frequent and energetic complaints establish his discontent. He writes, for instance:—

"Were there only some place here in which the people had ears to hear, hearts to feel, and taste to understand a little music, I could willingly laugh at these things; but in the midst of such brutes (as far as music is concerned) how can things be otherwise? In all their dealings, sentiments, and passions, they are no more than what I have just mentioned. There is no place in the world like Paris for this. You must not think I am exaggerating when I speak of the music here; ask whom you will—except a Frenchman—and you will be told (if it is a person you ought to ask) the same thing. As I am here, however, I will put up with everything for love of you. I shall thank the Almighty if I leave with my taste unvitiated; every day do I pray to God that he will, in his goodness, grant that I may hold out manfully, and do honour to myself and the German name, and that he will suffer me to make my way and earn sufficient to help you out of your hitherto wretched circumstances, and that we may soon have it in our power to meet again, and, happy and contented, live together."

Mozart could not endure the French language—although he spoke it with tolerable fluency—because it was the least calculated for singing of any in Europe.

"If I write an opera," he says, "I shall have to contend with great obstacles in the language; but that will not trouble me so much, as I am already used to it. But their confounded idioms are so ill-adapted for music that it makes me almost despair. German is heavenly in comparison. And the singers—good heavens!—the singers! They ought not to be called singers at all, for they shriek and bellow till your ears tingle again."

Had Mozart been fond of compliments, he would soon have become tired of them in Paris, where his visits were frequently paid with such base coin alone.

"People appoint such and such a day," he writes, "for me to visit them. I play; they exclaim: 'O, c'est un prodige! c'est inconcevable! c'est étonnant!'—and then, 'Good-bye.'"

In spite of the resolution Mozart had made to give no lessons, and his extreme repugnance to the profession of a music-teacher, he took three pupils, among whom he particularly mentions a daughter of the Duke de Guines. This nobleman played the flute excellently, and the young lady was a no less admirable performer upon the harp. Her father desired that she should study composition, but his pretensions were by no means exorbitant.

"I do not wish," he said to Mozart, "to make a great composer of my daughter; I do not want her to write operas, airs, concertos, or symphonies, but merely grand sonatas for her instrument, as I do for mine."

After four lessons, the master gave a highly flattering account of his pupil's progress—declaring that she easily understood the rules, that she had put a right bass to a minuet, of which he had given her the melody, and that she had already begun to write vocal music in three parts. This was certainly a great deal in only four lessons, and any other master would have trumpeted forth her progress to the world. But Mozart despaired of Mdlle. de Guines.

"She has no ideas," he says; "she can produce nothing. I have exerted myself in every possible manner. Among other things, it struck me that I would write down a very simple minuet, and try whether she could not compose some variations on it. But it was of no use. Perhaps, thought I, she does not know what to do or how to begin. I began, therefore, to vary the first bar, and told her to continue in the same manner, adhering to the original idea. She succeeded pretty well. When it was completed, I told her to do something of her own—merely the first vocal part—the melody. She reflected for a quarter of an hour, but could hit upon nothing. Hereupon, I wrote four bars of a minuet, and said, 'Just see what a donkey I am; I have begun the minuet and cannot even finish the first part; be kind enough to complete it for me.' She looked upon this task as impossible. At last, however, after a great deal of trouble, she produced something. If she has no ideas, and as yet she has not proved the contrary, heaven knows I cannot furnish her with them."

Leopold Mozart, who was distinguished in a high degree for the very qualities in which his son was deficient, and especially for patience (that first of all virtues in a teacher of music), and the art of turning people and circumstances to account, wrote very seriously to his son on the unreasonable nature of his expectations.

"You have, as you say in your letter, only just given the Duke's daughter her fourth lesson, and yet you expect her already to write original ideas! Do you think that every one possesses your talent?"

But Leopold Mozart was still more astonished that a young man, endeavouring to make his way in Paris, and fortunate enough to be known and esteemed by the Duke de Guines, should know nothing of the high favour that nobleman enjoyed with the king!

"The young lady," he writes, "has no ideas! To make up for this, she possesses an excellent memory.* This being the case, with the help of a little skilful management, it will be an easy task for you to make her steal, or, in polite words, adapt some from other people. How pleased will the Duke be, when he hears his daughter's compositions, played by herself! Can this influential man refuse a request made by the master who has procured him such gratification? Must not every road to fortune and to fame be opened to this fortunate professor?"

Leopold Mozart was in hopes that the portals of the Royal Academy of Music, which had been those of the Temple of Fame for Gluck and Piccini, would soon be thrown open to his son. There he would have to undergo the grand ordeal, to pass through which successfully, every means that could be thought of were to be employed. The clever, circumspect old man did not forget a single one.

"Study the national taste," he says; "hear their operas; I know your powers; there is nothing which you are not capable of imitating. Do not hurry yourself in writing, ponder well over your subject; read through the poetry with Baron Grimm, and get Noverre to enlighten you as to expression and effect. First sketch your work and then shew it them; every one does so—Voltaire reads his pieces to his friends. For vocal music, especially, you must adapt yourself to the national taste; you can elevate your production by your own modulation and arrangement of the vocal parts. If you can only be successful and gain money, the devil take the rest."

There is a certain kind of advice, which, although well meant, it is better not to follow—that is, according to the person from whom it emanates or to whom it is addressed. Leopold Mozart's counsel, however correct in a worldly sense, could not be adopted; at least, not all of it. Our hero, already ripe for the composition of Idomeneo, placed a somewhat greater value upon the rest, which, fortunately, the devil did not take. In this instance, too, the father's advice was superfluous, for another reason. Mozart never composed an opera for Paris. I am unable to point out with certainty the rock on which all his fondest hopes were destined to be wrecked, in spite of the active exertions of Noverre, and the influence and friendship of Grimm, and many other powerful patrons. The correspondence affords us very little information on the subject. The following passages alone refer to it.

"It is very difficult to obtain a good poem; the old ones, which were the best, not being adapted for the modern style, and the new being all worthless. Poetry, the only thing of which Frenchmen have a right to be proud, is becoming worse and worse, and the poetry is here the sole thing which must of necessity be good, since the public do not understand music.—There are only two operas I could write, one en deux, and the other en trois actes. The one en deux actes is Alexandre et Roxane, but the author is still in Champagne. That en trois actes is Demophon (by Metastasio), translated and interspersed with choruses and dances, and especially arranged for the French stage; but this I have not been able to see."

Why did not Mozart compose Demophon? Why was it impossible for him to obtain the libretto? We do not know, nor seemingly do the writers of the letters. Like them, we must confine ourselves to supposition.

* She played two hundred pieces by heart.

M. Sedlatzek, the well-known flautist and composer, has arrived in London with his daughter, who is reported to possess considerable talent as a vocalist. Fräulein Sedlatzek has been very favourably noticed at Vienna and Amsterdam, where she has been singing.

Camberwell Musical Evenings.—The Third "Evening" took place on the 26th January, and the fourth on February 23rd. At the last, Miss Albyn Stewart, Miss Eyles, Mr. Suchet Champion, and Mr. Leffler, were engaged as vocalists; and Mr. Richardson (flute), and Mr. George Lake (pianoforte and concertina), as instrumentalists. Four compositions by Mendelssohn were introduced.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18TH, 1854.

THE contemporary who took up the gauntlet for the Mendelssohn Fund Committee, who were accused of apathy and forgetfulness unbecoming the cause they had in hand, has returned to the charge. He arraigns us for two misstatements—or, to adopt his own courteous language, "blunders." To the first we have already alluded, (ante p. 125). On the second we are equally glad to be set right, and hasten to publish the statement of our contemporary.

"The facts are, that Mr. Benedict, the conductor, was one of the Committee; and that none of the singers and instrumental performers gave their services gratuitously, with the exception of the amateur choristers belonging to the Sacred Harmonic Society and to Mr. Hullah's schools."

The fact of Mr. Benedict being one of the committee was admitted in our first article (ante p. 89); so that on that head we are not indebted for much to our contemporary, who seems to know more about the transaction than the apathetic gentlemen who "resolved" themselves into a committee. That "none of" the singers and instrumental performers gave their performances gratuitously may be true, though we were led to believe that Miss M. Williams, Mr. Phillips, and the principal singers had followed the example of Mdlle. Lind, and placed their talents at the service of the committee. If not, the more's the pity.

We must take leave, however, to remind our contemporary—who speaks with an ex cathedra tone, which, doubtless, imposes on certain readers—that these small matters have little or nothing to do with the question at issue. We accuse the committee of the Mendelssohn Fund of promising that which they have not performed—of obtaining the gratuitous services of Mdlle. Jenny Lind for the promotion of an object which they have not carried out, or attempted to carry out—and of realising a large sum of money by the aid of that lady's unprecedented popularity, which has not been applied to the purpose for which it was professedly intended, and for which alone the committee would have presumed to ask, or Mdlle. Lind have been induced to grant, her valuable assistance. The Mendelssohn concert at Exeter Hall, as the committee well know, and as our contemporary ought to know (or to hold his pen) was intended as the beginning towards an end. It was proposed to raise a fund, to be devoted to an object then much talked about in London and elsewhere—the institution of some testimonial of respect to the memory of Mendelssohn, in England. The first idea—a monument—being abandoned, that of a scholarship for gratuitous education in music, to be called the Mendelssohn Scholarship, was substituted. In "serious furtherance" of the plan, it was then suggested, and unanimously decided, that a performance of Elijah, at Exeter Hall, would be a very appropriate and eligible first step. Mdlle. Jenny Lind, being appealed to, at once consented to sing; while the committee of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and Mr. Hullah (one of the Mendelssohn committee) promised to strengthen the choral force by the co-operation of their most efficient members. We also thought (but it appears we were in error) that certain English singers, who had known Mendelssohn and been honoured by his friendship, were equally anxious to come forward in such a cause. The concert was given, and a considerable sum of money obtained. Since that, however—except some discussions about the propriety of founding the Scholarship in London, or in Leipsic, which terminated, most unmeaningly, in favour of Leipsic—not one step has been taken. The committee have remained as supine and unconcerned as if no such scheme as the Mendelssohn Scholarship had been broached, and as if no such money as constituted the Mendelssohn Fund had been in existence. This is "the head and front" of the offence with which we have charged, and persist in charging, them; and this has been altogether evaded by our contemporary, in what he is pleased to term the "setting right" of our misstatements—or "blunders." We are glad to be set right; but, at the same time, must insist that his rejoinders to the charge we have preferred amount to little better than equivocation.

It may be considered certain, that, had not The Musical World called attention to the subject, nothing more would have been done until the members of the committee were old, decrepid, and incapable of doing anything. Six years would have gone on to six and twenty, and the Mendelssohn Scholarship have remained—in nubibus. It is beside the purpose to cast reflections on the dilatory conduct of the Leipsic people, who, as our contemporary is perfectly aware, have treated the whole matter with indifference. Five years ago, when it was found they were silent and inactive, Leipsic should have been abandoned, and a more genial place selected for the foundation of the scholarship.

Some good, however, has been effected by our strictures. The committee have met; and, although we are at present unacquainted with the result of their deliberations, it is at least a consolation to be able to state that fact. Meanwhile, if it is intended to consider the concert at Exeter Hall and its proceeds as final, the affair becomes really too insignificant for further notice. If, out of such small means a "scholarship" is eventually instituted, the "Jenny Lind Scholarship" would be a more just and appropriate name for it than the "Mendelssohn Scholarship." As all the other performers were paid, Jenny Lind alone contributed anything in "serious furtherance" of the plan. The members of the committee—who knew Mendelssohn so well, loved him so much, talked about him so eloquently, and set the matter on foot in 1848, with such eager precipitation—although they could well afford to contribute £20 each towards the fund, have contributed nothing; and, since their extraordinary and unprecedented labours in getting up the concert at Exeter Hall, have done nothing. The fact is, they had no enthusiasm themselves, and no faith in that of others. Had the musical profession in England, and the amateurs in England, been properly informed and solicited, more than ten times the sum realised by Mdlle. Lind's generosity might have been raised for such a purpose, in a short space of time. Many a poor musician would gladly have given his mite towards the Mendelssohn Testimonial; and many a prosperous one have afforded substantial support to so worthy and admirable a project.

The idea of turning such a small sum as that in hand to account is simply ridiculous. Nothing worthy of Mendelssohn can be done with it; and if the committee have no intention to proceed further, they ought, in strict justice, to send the money to Madame Goldschmidt, and leave it to others, who have the cause of music more nearly at heart, to recommence—not where they left off, but at the beginning—and carry on the original plan, which, by this time, had it been zealously persevered in, might have produced magnificent results.

By the way—apropos to the Mendelssohn Testimonial—what became of the monument which the Sacred Harmonic Society intended to raise to the memory of their second Handel, and for which a subscription was set on foot and a considerable sum of money obtained? We find our labours extending, our task of inquiry branching out into other channels; but we shall not shrink, either from the pains and time it may cost ourselves, or from the displeasure it may give to others. Such things are too sacred to be allowed to evaporate like bubbles.

 Since writing the above, we have received the following statement—the result of a Committee-meeting at the residence of Sir George Smart, on Friday evening, the 10th inst.:—

"MENDELSSOHN SCHOLARSHIP FUND.

"As erroneous statements have been made with regard to the Mendelssohn Scholarship Fund, the following account is published by order of the Committee:

| | £ | s. | d. |
| Gross receipts from the performance of Elijah at Exeter Hall, on the 15th December, 1848 ... ... | 1427 | 7 | 6 |

"A first investment of the above balance was made in January, 1849, when £1050 Three per Cent. Consols were purchased, and the dividends thereon were invested from time to time, so that the capital standing in the name of the trustees now amounts to £1250, Three per Cent. Consols.

"The Committee not having received the aid from Leipzig, which at the period of the concert and subsequently they were led to expect, have determined to allow the dividends to accumulate still farther, in order to enable them to carry out effectually the purpose for which the concert was given.

"London, 10 March, 1854.

CHARLES KLINGEMANN, Hon. Secretary."

So that, besides Mdlle. Lind and Mr. Benedict, Mr. Lockey, principal vocal tenor, and Messrs. Vincent Wallace, Ella, and Helmore, who played in the orchestra, renounced their professional terms in favour of the fund. We publish this fact to their honour. The other singers and players (amateurs excepted) including Miss M. Williams, Miss Duval, Mr. Machin—besides Miss Dolby, and Mr. H. Phillips, who did not sing, owing to a mistake, which was explained in the Morning Post (ante p. 99)—were paid their terms in full.

The "statement" of the Committee is to be advertised in the morning papers; but, as we were the first to call attention to the matter, we have felt ourselves justified in anticipating that announcement. The last resolution of the Committee is of a piece with the line of policy which has been pursued from first to last. Having met and consulted, the matter is to be left where it stood; the dividends are to be allowed "further to accumulate," and, as we hear, Mdme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is to be consulted about a further course of proceeding, when she comes to this country!

Conductor ... ... Mr. G. A. Osborne.

The Amateur Musical Society may now be considered established. Seven years of uninterrupted success must be accepted as a guarantee that it is built upon a solid foundation. Good has been effected in more ways than one by its co-operation. It has helped to promote a highly desirable object—viz., the association of amateurs and professors of music in a common pursuit; and, while the professors have enjoyed the advantage of this association, it has not been to them a mere empty honour, since they are paid their own terms for their services. Thus both parties have been gainers. On the other hand, although much music of a light and ephemeral character is introduced in the programmes, the symphonies, overtures, and concertos of the great masters, of which a good number are presented every season, not only tend to improve the taste of the amateur executants, but also that of their hearers, who belong almost entirely to the same class as themselves. Moreover, the Amateur Musical Society, whose policy is liberal, has been able to bring forward, from time to time, compositions which, in spite of their merit, have failed to obtain a hearing in other places, where greater pretensions are accompanied by greater exclusiveness (not to say prejudice). Among these, it is enough to name the symphony in F of Mr. H. Leslie, an amateur, and that in D of Mr. Macfarren, a professor, both of which are well worth a place in any programme. It is to be hoped that some new works of similar interest and importance will be produced in the course of the present season.

The band—in numbers nearly the same as that of last year—consists of about seventy performers, upwards of twenty of whom are professors, and these chiefly among the wind instruments—although in the wind instrument department are to be found some of the best amateurs. Mr. G. A. Osborne, one of our most eminent musicians, retains the post of conductor, the duties of which—to judge from the decided improvement exhibited by the band on Monday night, in more than one instance—he accomplishes with great efficiency. The symphony of A. Romberg (a sort of cross between Haydn and Mozart, without the depth or inspiration of either) was played with spirit throughout, and for the most part with more than ordinary correctness. This, it is true, is comparatively an easy work; but the noble overture of Beethoven to Goethe's tragedy of Egmont is a very different matter; and, to the credit of the amateurs be it said, their execution of this very difficult composition was in many respects entitled to the warmest praise. The weakness of the stringed instruments when, in the forte passages, they had to contend with the full power of the wood and brass, was occasionally evident; and here and there a want of delicacy was observable; but, on the whole, the performance was highly creditable. In the polonaise of Meyerbeer—which is very long, and loses much of its effect away from the stage—there was a good deal to wish for, in the coda more especially, although the horns in the trio were unexceptionable. The two movements by Mr. Waley are, we presume, from a symphony. The andante, which begins with the violins muted, is flowing and melodious, and contains some passages of graceful instrumentation. The flute part, introduced as an ornament on the first recurrence of the subject, is well imagined, but apparently not easy to execute. The minuetto and trio are formed on the pattern of Haydn. In the latter, however, there are some orchestral combinations, which must be attentively considered in order to be well brought out; and this was hardly achieved on Monday night. The selection from Spohr's opera included one or two of the most beautiful and least hackneyed pieces, and among others the spirited march from Act II., where the games of the soldiers are described. The cornet solo, played with admirable tone and expression by Mr. Tatham, was an arrangement (with very little addition) of the well-known and popular barytone air, "Pour tant d'Amour." The two songs of Mr. Leslie and Mr. Waley are both attractive, and both written in a musician-like style; moreover, there is a certain similarity of character (not of melody) between them. Miss Birch, the vocalist of the evening, sang them in such a manner, that if the composers were not satisfied they must be hard to please. Mr. Waley was the accompanist, and performed his task irreproachably—which, as he is an excellent pianist, was not surprising. The quaint and brilliant overture to Le Domino Noir, exceedingly well played by the band, brought the concert to a close with effect. The audience was attentive, but not easily moved to excitement or enthusiasm.

The following statement of accounts for the season 1853 shows the Amateur Musical Society to be not only solvent, but flourishing.

Some gallant gentlemen, who belonged to the band last season, will be missed from the ranks; but their duty to their country has called them to the East, to listen to and assist in making another kind of music, at which ladies are not admitted.

It is our intention to notice all the performances of the Amateur Musical Society, since we regard them as beneficial both to art and artists. One of the reasons of the marked improvement of the band is the recent institution of several extra rehearsals in Blagrove's Rooms, besides the ordinary ones, on the Fridays preceding the concerts.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S SOIRÉES.

M. Alexandre Billet's performances of "classical" pianoforte music belong to the same category as those of Mr. Sterndale Bennett and Mr. Lindsay Sloper—with one material difference, however, since, while those of our talented countrymen are addressed to fashionable audiences at fashionable prices, those of the foreign pianist invite the people, at a charge within the people's means. Instead of in the silk and satin atmosphere of Hanover Square and Queen Anne Street, M. Billet holds his sittings in the more populous and popular arena of St. Martin's Hall, the minor room in which new and remarkable building was crowded to the walls on Tuesday evening, by an audience that it did one good to see. It was the first concert of the fifth season, which was thus auspiciously inaugurated. As M. Billet's programmes are always worth quoting, we quote that of Tuesday, which presented the same interest and high tone as its predecessors.

Part First.—Grand Sonata, "Plus Ultra" (Dussek); Aria, "Non mi dir" (Mozart); "The Temperaments," Book 2nd (Mendelssohn); The Mermaid's Song, Miss Palmer (Haydn); "La Gaîté," rondo brilliant, op. 62 (Weber).

Part Second.—Sonata G, op. 14, No. 1 (Beethoven); Song (Molique); Selections of Studies (Kullak, Billet, Thalberg).

The most important feature, because of its very rare appearance in our concert programmes, was Dussek's sonata in A flat (Op. 71). Our readers are aware that the English edition of this grand but unequal work was christened Plus Ultra by the publishers (not by Dussek), and dedicated by them to a sonata-fantasia in F of Woelfl. By the title of Ne Plus Ultra, Woelfl seemed to arrogate for his sonata a supremacy (either of merit or of difficulty) over all preceding compositions for the pianoforte. Dussek's sonata, Le Retour de Paris, however, which had just arrived from the Continent, appeared to the English possessors of the copyright to exceed that of Woelfl in difficulty, to say nothing of its musical beauty; and their Plus Ultra was a sort of defiance to the almost Muscovite swagger of the Ne Plus Ultra. Neither of these works is generally known to modern pianists, although, for more reasons than one, both deserve better to be known than nine-tenths of the pianoforte compositions at present in vogue. The first movement of the Ne Plus Ultra is very fine, and, as an exercise for double notes, is worth the attention of advanced students. The last movement consists of some ingenious variations on Mozart's air, "Life let us cherish," among which will be found the origin of the double octave skips for the right hand, of which Henri Herz, in his Joseph variations, is generally thought to have set the first example. Every movement of Dussek's sonata bears the stamp of genius, and is full of musical interest. The allegro, in spite of its diffuseness and excessive modulation, is large and magnificent, some of the bravura passages seeming to give a foreshadowing of Carl Maria von Weber. The adagio (in E) is one of the most expressive and faultless of Dussek's slow movements. The minuet, which, oddly enough, begins in F sharp minor and finishes in A flat, is as original as it is beautiful, and the trio (in E), while contrasting with it admirably, is its worthy companion. The finale, a delicious and animated rondo, is somewhat lengthy and spun out, but extremely brilliant and showy. Both the admonitory "Ne Plus" and the defiant "Plus" have been introduced, more than once, by M. Billet to his audiences.

The sonata of Beethoven is one of the most playful and thoroughly charming of his early works. The first movement is perfect; the andante and rondo finale are pretty and piquant, but on a less extended scale. The Sieben Caracterstische Stücke of Mendelssohn (Op. 7), composed in his boyhood, cannot fail to strike the cultivated hearer with wonder at the genius and precocity they display. As they all describe certain phases of mental feeling, they have not been inaptly christened "Temperaments" by their London publishers.* The second book, which is very seldom touched by our pianists, is, nevertheless, quite equal in interest to the first. The long and elaborate fugue in A, with which it commences, is a prodigy of ingenuity and learning, exhibiting almost every possible device of fugal counterpoint. The andante in E minor is a lovely bit of mournful sentiment and the finale a sparkling presto, in syncope, almost throughout, and excessively hard to play, is one of the most genial of the Mendelssohnian family of scherzi. Every one knows the genuine and vivacious rondo, in E flat, of Weber, to which the London publishers have given the sobriquet of La Gaîté, and though not, perhaps, so thoroughly satisfactory as the Polacca in E (L'Hilarité), is superior to the Polonaise in E flat of the same composer. Of the three studies introduced by M. Billet—Perles d'Écume, La Sylphide, and Impromptu, Thème et Etude—the first and last (by Kullak and Thalberg,) are familiar to every modern pianist. The second (one of a set composed by M. Billet,) is a light and brilliant caprice of the bravura school, and extremely effective when played with ease and decision.

We need say no more of M. Billet as an executant, than that, by his reading of the various masters from whose works he had made out his programme, he showed himself, not for the first time, a pianist "de la première force." He was repeatedly applauded, and was called upon to repeat his own study and that of Kullak.

The vocal music was of a colour with the instrumental, as will be seen by the programme. Madame Newton Frodsham sang Mozart's fine aria with her usual care, and was encored in Herr Molique's delightful little song of "May," which she prefaced by another, equally good, of the same composer—"If o'er the boundless Sky," or "Could I through Ether fly," or ——, we know not how many more titles it enjoys in England. Miss Palmer, a débutante, has a pleasant mezzo soprano voice, with very good lower tones. Though rather nervous at first, she satisfied the audience so well that she was compelled to sing the "Mermaid's Song" twice. M. Billet accompanied the vocal music. The pianoforte upon which he performed was Woolley and Co.'s Patent Grand, with "Entire Metallic Permanent Frame," etc., which has been already exhibited with success at a series of concerts in the provinces.

APOLLONICON ORGAN ROOMS.—A performance on a new organ, just completed for the cathedral church, Malta, by Messrs. Robson, took place on Wednesday evening. Mr. W. Rae was the Organist. Particulars next weeek.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—On Wednesday last, Mendelssohn's oratorio of Elijah was performed under the direction of Mr. John Hullah; the choruses being composed as usual of the members of the first Upper Singing School. The solo parts were confided to Mesdames Dolby, Enderssohn, Weiss, and Dianelli, and Messrs. Augustus Braham, Montem Smith, Buckland, and Weiss. The orchestra was announced to be "complete in every department." We may be allowed to state, however, that it wants strengthening before it can be so considered; it lacks number and weight in the "strings," which are essential requisites to "completeness in every department." With this single exception, the execution was on the whole highly satisfactory. We would impress upon the members of the Upper Singing School that invariable attention to the bâton of their conductor is indispensable, and that each member is not called upon to distinguish himself individually, but to conduce to the general effect. We make this remark because we observed that the young ladies who composed the soprani in the chorus were at times more zealous than discreet, singing loud when piano would have been more in accordance with the composer's meaning. The tenori, on the other hand, were at times nearly overpowered by the weight of their more vigorous companions. The bassi are decidedly good, and well up to their work; they never wavered for a moment. We may say as much of the contralti. The first chorus, "Help, Lord!" was given with hesitation, and was wanting in ensemble. The ladies were in too great a hurry to begin, and consequently created some confusion. They were, however, soon brought to order by the conductor. With a little more attention to light and shade, however, the members of the Upper Singing School bid fair to rival any choral body in the metropolis. As regards energy and enthusiasm, there is a superabundance of both: the curb is wanted more than the whip. The choruses, "Blessed are the Men," "Hear our Cry, O Baal," "The Fire descends," "Thanks be to God," "Be not afraid," and "He that shall endure," were given with vigour, precision, and correctness. The audience more than once expressed their satisfaction by the warmest applause. The double quartet, "For He shall give his Angels," was well given on the whole by the solo-singers—although the effect was somewhat marred at the commencement by a false start. Two pieces were encored—the unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine Eyes," sung by Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, and Miss Dianelli, and the contralto air, "O rest in the Lord," given with admirable simplicity by Miss Dolby, who was in excellent voice. Miss Dolby's reading of the recitatives was most impressive, and, being utterly devoid of affectation, was so much the more effective. Mrs. Enderssohn sang her music exceedingly well, and was warmly applauded in her duet with Mr. Weiss, "What have I to do with Thee?" and in the great air, "Hear ye, Israel." Mrs. Weiss also sang well, and contributed very much to the effect produced by the unaccompanied trio. On Mr. Weiss devolved the arduous and difficult music of the Prophet, of which he acquitted himself most admirably. Mr. Augustus Braham was much applauded; and we have no doubt that, when he is more accustomed to sacred music he will prove a great acquisition to our oratorio performances. We must congratulate Mr. Hullah on the result he has already obtained, and we doubt not he will exert all his energies to advance still further towards perfection. The hall was crammed in every part. The accommodation was excellent, except in one respect: those who were seated on the left, facing the orchestra, were roasted by the fire on one side, and chilled by the draught on the other. We can stand roasting or freezing—but not both together. A screen would remedy the evil.

ROBERT SCHUMANN.—It is reported that this well-known composer is suffering under (what it is hoped will turn out) a temporary derangement of the senses, and that it has been found necessary to place him under personal restraint. Herr Schumann had already suffered from an attack of delirium tremens.

ON DIT.—Mr. Charles Cotton, the barytone, has taken the premises lately occupied by the followers of the celebrated Irving, to open them as Concert Rooms, etc. The large room, we hear, is capable of accommodating 2000 persons. Benjamin West, the painter, held his exhibition in the same premises.

DRAMATIC.

DRURY LANE.—Tragedy retreated before music on Tuesday night, and made way for an operatic drama in three acts, which the author, for want of English, has styled "opéra comique." Léonie is founded on the French piece which (itself a translation from the German) furnished the materials for Monsieur Jacques, some years ago rendered so popular by the acting of Mr. Morris Barnett. The libretto is from the pen of Mr. Henri Drayton, and the music is the composition of Mr. F. Duggan. These gentlemen had previously combined their artistic powers, and submitted the result to the public. Our readers cannot have forgotten the operatic sketch of Pierre, produced under one of Mr. Stammers's flying managements, at the St. James's. If they have, it is not our fault. But the first combined effort of Messrs. Henri Drayton and Duggan was merely a sketch, while the present essay is an opera—at least an "opéra comique," though not a comic opera. Mr. Henri Drayton might have found a happier subject out of which to construct a libretto; and Mr. Duggan's muse might have been more advantageously exhibited, had he been provided with real musical situations and incidents. The story of Monsieur Jacques is entirely opposed to lyric treatment, and Mr. Duggan could do little or nothing with it. For this reason, the ballads, which do not in the least interfere with the plot, are decidedly the most effective parts of the music. The concerted morceaux, duets, and trios, are tedious and out of place. Either they, or the greater part of the dialogue, should be omitted, even at the sacrifice of Mr. Drayton's slow and elaborate acting. There was no chorus in Léonie, by which Mr. Duggan is deprived of one of the principal elements of operatic effect. The composer of Léonie must, under these circumstances, rest his claims to success upon his songs, one or two of which promise to become popular.

The cast of Léonie, on Tuesday night, included the names of Miss Susanna Lowe, Miss Featherstone, Mr. Henri Drayton, and Mr. Elliot Galer. With the exception of Miss Featherstone, it was the same as in Mr. Duggan's first work, Pierre.

Of the acting, the less we say the better. The singing, however, was occasionally entitled to praise. Miss Lowe has a nice voice, a little hard, but pleasing. Her intonation is generally sure, and she sings with a good deal of energy and spirit. On the other hand, Miss Featherstone possesses a really fine voice, but her style and method are so faulty as to destroy its charm. It is a pity that this lady, who has undoubted talent, cannot afford to retire into private life for a year and a day, and devote that year and a day to arduous study. If she had no other fault than that of not knowing how to pronounce her words distinctly, it would be sufficient to prevent her from becoming a singer. Miss Lowe sang a cavatina, "Sweet Sleep," with much taste, and was greatly applauded in a duet with Mr. Elliot Galer. Both of these compositions are flowing and graceful. Miss Featherstone produced a good effect in a melodious ballad, "How oft in Childhood;" but her aria buffa, the words of which are in imitation of "Largo al Factotum," was altogether out of her element. Not one word could be distinguished, and, consequently, not one of Mr. Drayton's "points," if there are any, told upon the audience. Nor does Mr. Duggan appear to shine as a buffo composer. The "hits" of the evening were made by the gentlemen. Mr. Elliot Galer was encored twice in a romance, "Yes, 'tis a Spell," and Mr. Henri Drayton loudly applauded in a pleasing and sentimental ballad, "Oh, let me gaze," which deserves to become a favourite.

Seldom has an audience appeared more entirely satisfied with a performance. G. V. B. himself, in Richard III. or Macbeth, could hardly have excited more enthusiasm. At the end of the first and third acts, all the singers were called for and pelted with bouquets; and at the end of all, Mr. Duggan appeared to a loud summons, and was received with vociferous cheers. Léonie has been repeated twice since Tuesday—once at a morning performance.

HAYMARKET.—When Frankenstein created his man-monster, he selected his materials from different animals, with an eye to fitness and proportion, and, combining them together into a perfect whole, Prometheus-like, stole fire from heaven and breathed life and animation into the inert and senseless mass. The Frankenstein of the new melo-drama, produced at the Haymarket on Monday night, was neither so judicious nor so successful. He chose his materials from sources as remote, but paid no attention to accuracy of parts or consistency of form. He combined them without method, and stole fire neither from above nor below. The production was, therefore, a mere chaos, shapeless and confused. What we know, we know; what we see, we see; but we know not what we saw on Monday night, so impossible was it to hold and compare in our minds the strange pictures that passed before our gaze, like the shadows of a sick man's dream. The plum-pudding of the Frenchman, who, having procured the proper ingredients, mixed them according to the cookery-book, and boiled the whole without a cloth, might aptly represent the new play in its concoction, but that the ingredients, in place of being right, were wrong. Plot without story, character without purpose, scenes with no whereabouts, incidents that lead to nothing, action without progress, passion void of object, beginning without end, are among the defects of the new tragedy. The worst sins of the most ranting melo-dramas of George Lillo may be found in it; but Lillo's plays have, at least, the advantage of coherence and plain language.

To describe the plot is not in our power. The play is entitled Duchess Eleanour, and the scene lies, we believe, in Ferrara. An actress, whose father is a murderer, a robber, cheat, burglar, incendiary, and perjurer, marries the Duke, who is a hypocrite, impostor, deceiver, and roué. The Duke has a friend—Count somebody—who is a brawler, a scoffer, a hater of everything good, and a champion in the cause of iniquity. The Duchess has a friend, who is beloved by the Duke, and marries her cousin. To make up the ingredients of this dramatic cauldron, there is a friend of the father of the Duchess, a juggler, who imposes on everybody, and, in the end, murders his only friend for the sake of a reward. The Duchess's father kills the Duke, the father's only friend kills the father, the Duke's cousin marries the Duke's mistress, and the Duchess, after making a public exhibition of her husband's remains, and beholding her father die by the hand of the assassin, instead of the executioner, retires into a convent.

We never saw Miss Cushman to less advantage than in the part of the Duchess. She was struggling throughout the piece with a load on her shoulders; and, though she bore up nobly against the weight, her strength was evidently giving way, and nothing short of transcendent genius could have endowed her with the power to outlive five acts of such intolerable pressure. More than once she saved the piece from condemnation, and but for her abrupt entrance, and the commanding look she darted at the audience, the coffin scene would have settled the matter. As it was, her presence and striking appearance, her intense feeling and pathos in the last scene, converted the dissentients into supporters, and the curtain fell with much applause, intermingled, however, with hisses. Miss Cushman was summoned, and cheered enthusiastically, and Mr. Howe announced the new play to be performed three times a-week; but it was withdrawn from the bills after the second performance.

To write a burlesque upon a burlesque was a new thought, but we think it was a mistake. The element of success in a burlesque is strong contrast; and where you take a tragedy for your subject, you have already made a step in the favour of the audience. Tom Thumb, Bombastes Furioso, Chrononhotonthologos, and pieces of that class, were not burlesques upon particular pieces, but were intended to ridicule particular modes of composition. This nearly amounts to the same thing. Besides, all the parts in the above pieces require to be played seriously; and therein consists the point. We believe until Mr. Sterling Coyne coined his burlesque, called Willikind and Hys Dinah—produced for the first time on Thursday evening—no author had written a burlesque upon a comic subject, however well known. Of pantomimes there have been many; but that is a very different matter. The immense popularity obtained for the comic song, "Villikins and his Dinah," by Mr. Robson at the Olympic, induced Mr. Sterling Coyne to select it for a subject.

The burlesque is well written, and is admirably acted. The actors are Miss L. Howard, Willikind; Mrs. Fitzwilliam, Dinah; Mr. H. Corri, the hard-hearted "parient;" Mrs. Caulfield, the soft-hearted "parient;" and Mr. Buckstone, Lord Pellemelle. The music of Mr. Fitzwilliam was characteristic, and well selected. The incidents are not entirely borrowed from the ballad, and those which Mr. Stirling Coyne has introduced, though not particularly new, are decidedly of the order of risum movere. A dance at the end makes a very pretty and lively climax. The piece was received with great applause, at the fall of the curtain, and will no doubt have a good run.

Query—Why did not Mr. Stirling Coyne write the whole of the piece in doggrel rhyme, in the place of blank verse?

PRINCESS'S.—A new farce, called Away with Melancholy, was produced on Monday night. It is almost a literal translation of the French piece, Un Homme entre Deux Airs. The plot is very slight. The principal incident is that of a gentleman, Mr. Windsor Brown, who meets an old sweetheart at a boarding-house at Bath, and agrees to run off to London with her by the eight-o'clock train, the signal to be given being the air "Away with Melancholy." Directly afterwards, he meets a fair pastry-cook, with whom he had previously carried on a flirtation, and, to get rid of her, agrees to carry her off by the nine o'clock train, the signal to be given being "Buffalo Girls." Mr. Brown, who has no ear for music, confounds the airs. He is thwarted in his intentions in various ways, the details of which are sufficiently amusing. At the end, the pastrycook meets an old lover, and leaves her new one free. Mr. Fisher played the man of two airs with remarkable ease and lightness. The piece had a decided success; but it is not one of Mr. Morton's most "pointed" adaptations.

RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and CO., 100, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, have the honour of announcing that they have been appointed the Sole Agents in Great Britain for the Sale of the SAX-CORNETS, SAXOPHONES, SAX-HORNS, and all other Brass Military Instruments invented and manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, to whom was awarded the only Council Medal of the Great Exhibition for Military Instruments in Brass, a list of which, with the prices, may be had on application, post free. It will be seen from this list, that M. Sax's Instruments can now be supplied direct from his own Manufactory, at a price not higher than the numerous imitations of them.

ROMAN VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, HARP, AND GUITAR STRINGS. J. HART, of 14, Princes-street, Soho, begs to inform the Amateurs and Professors of the above Instruments, that in consequence of the great demand he has had for his celebrated Roman Strings, he has made arrangements with his string-makers in Rome, to send a fresh consignment every two months, when he hopes for a continuance of that liberal support he has so long enjoyed. J. H. has the largest collection of Cremona and other Instruments in England, ranging in price from 1 guinea to 400 guineas. Instruments repaired in the best manner, and taken in exchange. Stewart's celebrated Violin-holder, and all articles appertaining to the above instruments. JOHN HART, 14, Princes-street, Soho.

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTES, with PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, for all Climates, and NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. Pianists, and the Musical World, are respectfully invited to inspect and test these Pianofortes, which have now attained the long-sought properties of permanence, quantity, and quality of tone, standing well in tune, with the most prompt and light touch. The purchasers of Pianos have now the advantage of selecting an Instrument to their own taste, which, being of itself permanent, can be sent to any distance without injurious effects. The great improvements taking place around us in the mechanical arts and manufactures, has rendered it necessary that the Pianoforte should be included in the number. The difficult obstacles to conquer in the making of Pianos is, without doubt, that which results from the pressure occasioned by the extreme tension on the strings, and also from the dryness or humidity of the atmosphere, causing the wood placed at the back to expand, sometimes to unglue, and always to force them to rest upon the sounding-board, rendering the instrument (sooner or later) valueless, and significantly expressed by the common observation of "My Piano has lost its tone!" The defects of the ordinary, inefficient, and too weak construction in wood—or with metallic plates—is completely superseded by WOOLLEY'S PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, FOR ALL CLIMATES. The frame consists of an entire construction of iron, preventing the possibility of the least shrinking in any direction, and producing positive permanence; a frame of wood is also attached to the iron, which gives it the desired quality of fulness, and greatly increased duration. It is obvious that any thickness of stringing can be put on these frames, without fear of giving way—the tone is increased in volume—is rendered perfect in quality—and from the enormous resistance contained in the frame, the strings throw off their "Real Harmonics."—MECHANISM.—THE NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. The power of tone and resistance in the frame, suggests the desirability of a very powerful blow in the hammer. This is completely effected by the "New Royal Victoria Repeat;" the addition to these Pianos having a blow much more powerful than any hitherto produced—combing all the requisites of force, ease, variety of light and shade, superior damping, perfect check, and an untiring repetition, which is produced from an action not likely to get out of order. Mr. Woolley, in drawing attention to the applause which M. Billet elicited at St. Martin's Hall on Tuesday, March 15th, for the beautiful intonation of this instrument, begs to state that M. Billet will again perform on it at his next concerts, Tuesdays, April the 4th, and 11th. These Pianos may be seen and purchased at L. L. Lee's Warerooms, 48, Albemarle-street, London; and all the principal Provincial Towns. Woolley and Co., Patentees and Manufacturers.

MISS URSULA BARCLAY begs to inform her friends and pupils that she has changed her residence to No. 44, Upper Charlotte-street, Fitzroy-square.

C. BOOSÉ'S
MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Messrs. BOOSEY & SONS in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends.

A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument.

CLARIONETS,

Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 18 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 18 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 16 Keys of the same metal.

The whole of these comprise every new improvement.

FLUTES AND PICCOLOS,

In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement.

FIFES,
(BOOSÉ'S IMPROVED)

Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys.

BASSOONS.

The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys.

BOOSÉ'S
UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.

The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra.

CORNETTO SOPRANO,
In D or E Flat (for Brass Band),

VALVE TRUMPETS,
ALTHORNS (Barytone),
With Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F.

EUPHONIONS (Bass),
In B Flat or C, with Four Valves.

BOMBARDONS (Bass),
In E Flat, or F, with Four Valves.

All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action.

The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide.

FRENCH HORNS

Either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action.

These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.

TROMBONES,
ALTO, TENOR, AND BASS.

In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.

THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION.

With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.

Valve, or Field Bugle,
IN B FLAT OR C.

By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.

OPHICLEIDES,
In B Flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys.

CAVALRY TRUMPETS, TURKISH CRESCENTS,
TRIANGLES,
MILITARY TAMBOURINES,
DRUM HEADS,
REEDS, MUSIC STANDS,
MUSIC PAPER,

And every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.

DRUMS (BASS),
BOOSÉ'S IMPROVED, OF BRASS,

The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad.

Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.

BASS DRUM STICKS.

Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no coveting, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of recovering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

SIR JOHN HAWKINS'S GENERAL HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE AND PRACTICE OF MUSIC. Price 35s., bound in Two Volumes. Supplementary Volume of Portraits, 14s., in paper covers; 16s., bound in cloth. In the present age, when public attention is so extensively directed towards the study and practice of Music, it has been thought that a new edition of SIR JOHN HAWKINS'S valuable HISTORY OF MUSIC would prove peculiarly acceptable, as being by far the best history of the art extant. It was formerly a very scarce and expensive book, but the present price, 35s., bound in two volumes, places it within the reach of both amateur and professional musicians. The large subject of a History of Music, embracing heterogeneous matter, and the result of wide research, makes it a storehouse to which a definite clue is required to give ready access. This will be found in the new and compendious Indexes, which have been carefully compiled, and added to the present edition. The whole matter occupies more than 1000 large pages of close print, with more than 200 wood-cuts, and provides the material for many a long winter evening's amusement by their perusal. Novello, London and New York.

WAS SPOHR A TRUE PROPHET?

In the year 1823, the great German musician, Louis Spohr, addressed the following letter to the composers of his own country:—

"The long expected moment seems at length arrived when the German public, cloyed with the insipid sweetness of the new Italian music, longs for that which is of real and intrinsic value. All the operas that Rossini has lately brought out have more or less displeased, and managers already find the necessity of looking out for something else. Even in Italy, where the public must have been satiated with his music to excess—even there, the credit of this, till lately, universally idolized composer has sunk deeply. Vienna alone, the city in which true German art originated, still forms an exception. There the public, cheated of their better judgment by the Italian virtuosi, are still charmed by the syren spell. Yet, if the downfall of this music is deferred in this quarter, it is only to precipitate it the lower when it does take place, particularly if the director of the Italian Opera there has no new singers in store to keep alive the zest for this novelty; for the old ones will, from their hackneyed and eternal repetition of the same insipidities, soon weary the patience of the fickle amateurs of Vienna. This was the case of their former idolized David, who, on his return among them, was not received with half his former enthusiasm.

"The important epoch seems now arrived at which German art will resume its former dignified attitude on the stage; and the object of these remarks is to call on the German composers to use every becoming exertion to regain the former footing which they held in the opera and to remove from thence everything that is foreign, provided that it be not found to possess intrinsic value. The former and dangerous predominance of the French school has now ceased, since the more eminent among them are either no more, or have ceased altogether to write for the stage; and those that still remain, being of second rate abilities only, give no cause for alarm. This call is principally addressed to those composers of distinction and general estimation, who, from having been discouraged by a few unsuccessful trials, seem to have entirely given up all theatrical composition, and devoted themselves exclusively to church and chamber music, in which they feel no apprehensions as to their success. This aversion on their part I can easily account for from my own feelings and experience; therefore, for the sake of the rising artist, I shall not suffer the cause that gave rise to such a feeling to pass unnoticed.

"It is very discouraging, for example, that the success of an opera should, in a great measure, depend upon accidental causes, over which the composer has no control; as, for instance, the distribution of the different characters, the external decorations, the proper rehearsal of the music, the preparation of the public for the reception of a new opera, and more than all, the art of inspiring the singers with a proper interest in the characters they have to personate. It is still farther discouraging to a composer to see the merit or demerit of his works decided, not by those that are scientific judges, but, by the casual frequenters of the theatre, and consequently by those who are not in the slightest degree qualified to pass a sound and critical opinion.*

Lastly, it can afford but little encouragement to the composer who has to live by the benefit of his labours, when, as is the case at present, less is to be gained by the composition of an opera, than by the making up (for we will not dignify it by the name of composing) of bagatelles for the flute, guitar, etc., or of the arrangement of foreign productions; which labours are well rewarded by publishers, while the benefit to be derived from an opera, even if it should generally please, remains very uncertain. One of the causes is, that scarcely has an opera appeared, when the traffickers in petty larceny fall foul of the score, which no precautions on the part of the author, or any protests in the public journals, can prevent. Thus they steal all the choicer parts of the composition, and defraud the author of what he has so dearly earned by the laborious efforts of his genius.†

"In order to remedy these evils, and to give general encouragement to German composers to write for the stage, the directors of theatres must do their part, and direct their particular attention to these two important points: 1st, to purchase works of no one but the composer himself, as the natural and legal possessor of the rights to his own productions; 2ndly, to remunerate his talent justly and properly. This latter stipulation will doubtless appear quite extraordinary to the managers of theatres, as heretofore the whole requisites of an Italian or French opera were to be obtained at merely the price of the copyist's labour; and even when, on one occasion, a stipulated sum was paid for a German opera, it was so inconsiderable, as probably to form one of the meanest expenses attached to bringing it forward.

"The consideration for a great opera should be proportionate to the labour, time, and powers of mind requisite for its composition, and should, at least, be in a two, if not in a three-fold proportion to what is paid for original MSS. of tragedies, comedies, etc., particularly when we take into calculation the additional advantage that the author of a play has over the composer of an opera, in his privilege to publish his own work. How far this has been hitherto attended to, the German composers know, alas! but too well.

"But now let us, on the other hand, consider what motives there are to encourage German artists themselves to apply to the task of dramatic composition.

"Neither the church nor the chamber can afford the composer such a mass of effective means as this. In proof of the truth of this remark, it may be mentioned that many theatrical composers, whose talents were not sufficient to produce anything of sufficient value for the church or the concert room, have been able, by an effectual application of these means, even without the aid of any strength of invention, to produce very considerable effects. The charm of scenic representation, the combined effect of almost all the arts, everything is in his favour, and serves as a motive for encouragement. Now, if he be possessed of real talent, an opportunity here presents itself for portraying all the passions of the human heart, which could not be found elsewhere; and what glory, what applause, if he has been successful with one opera! Let him furnish the church and the chamber with productions of the most excellent kind, still he will be known only to a small portion of the public; but, if he obtain success in the theatre, his name will be on every tongue. Therefore, let the German composers exert their energies, let them be active, for the moment seems arrived when such efforts will be crowned with success! Before concluding, let me be permitted to offer a few observations for the benefit of the young and rising composer.

* I cannot let this occasion pass without noticing the general complaint, that the more cultivated part of the audience seem, daily more and more to disdain giving any audible signs of their approbation or disapprobation; whereby encouragement is given to the crowd to occupy the field of criticism, and reject all that does not accord with their ideas of excellence.

† The unblushing impudence of these gentlemen goes so far, that one of them lately sent a list of the scores he had on sale, among which, besides a multitude of others which are known to be surreptitiously obtained,—for example, the Cantemire of Tesca, and the Libussa of Kreutzer—there were two of my own operas, Faust and Zemire und Azor, which had been plundered in the same manner.

"In Germany, as in France, the fate of the opera depends in a great measure upon the poetry, with this difference only that the pit of a French theatre shows an infinitely more refined taste in its judgments on the merits of a composition, and would not tolerate the absurdities with which our opera-books abound; while, on the contrary, in forming a just estimate of the value of the music, the French are infinitely behind the Germans, since even in the taste of the most refined among the French, a Grétry and a Dallayrac are allowed to rank so much higher than a Cherubini and a Méhul. Our first object, therefore, must be to select a subject that shall have sufficient interest to attract the multitude, otherwise our opera will have no chance of standing its ground long. If it attract only the small number of the elect—the cultivated sons of taste—the manager's pocket will soon be left empty, and it will very shortly be quietly laid on the shelf. But if we have been compelled to sacrifice the subject to the taste of the multitude, still we ought to be independent in the choice of our style, and clothe it in such music as is solid and expressive; this will at once be tolerated by the crowd and indemnify the chosen few for the loss they sustained in the choice of the subject. If we have the power to invent national melodies, we may by a due admixture of these please the multitude, and have the satisfaction of hearing them chaunted at fairs and ground on barrel-organs; but the dignity of music must necessarily suffer by it, for valuable as a national song is, as such, still it is not fit for the more ennobled music of our theatres, from which the music of an ale-house ought as scrupulously to be excluded as its jests and vulgarity.* The opera-book must either be enlivened with broad humour, or strongly seasoned with witcheries and incantations; it must at the same time afford scope for splendid decorations, marches, and processions, to gratify the eye. Now as, together with external pageantry, a reasonable action may be blended, hence the problem of writing a lyric drama, which shall at once please the mind endowed with taste and that which is uncultivated, is easily solved, as some few existing instances prove. If we have been happy enough to obtain such a subject, we should no longer be merely solicitous to please, we should no longer speculate on mere theatrical effects, as several of the modern composers do, but we ought to follow the bent of our feelings, and compose music of a true dramatic character adapted in every respect to the subject, both in tone, style, and character; nor ought we, at the same time, on such occasions as are suitable, to neglect the employment of those means with which the modern orchestra is provided, and to which the public is now but too much familiarized. That music which is not enforced by the drum and the trombone must possess great original power in itself to allow this strong exterior incentive to be dispensed with and yet to give general satisfaction.

"We have abundant proofs that not only a poem full of situations and effects, and adapted to the taste of the multitude, is capable of being clothed with good music, but that a subject which is altogether insipid, cannot possibly maintain its place on the theatre. Now, the modern Italian opera proves quite the contrary, and teaches us that such music as is adapted to the conceptions of the multitude, can make even a perfectly insipid subject (such as most of the modern Italian are) supportable. But in this mode there are no laurels to be gathered by us; for, in the first place, we want the gift to invent those sweeter melodies, and to practise those artful refinements of the voice which constitute the charm of that music; and, in the next place, because the whole species has already outlived itself, and is near the point of dissolution. Let us, therefore, add here to our old manner. Another question is, whether we could not succeed in giving the German opera greater variety, by changing the dialogues into recitatives. If the critic reject the opera as a product of art, and call it monstrous, it is the sudden transition from speech to song that justifies him in so terming it. In truth, it is only the force of habit that renders it supportable. Yet I am far from wishing that dialogues upon the common occurrences of life, of which our operas contain such abundant examples, should be set to music; for the same might with equal consistency be done with the paragraph of a common newspaper. No; an opera in which all is to be sung, must, in the first place, have a poetical action from the beginning to the end; secondly, it should be so simple, that a spectator, without knowing the subject, should be able to guess at the tenor of the story; thirdly, it should be limited to a small number of characters, not exceeding five or six at the utmost. The second of the conditions is necessary, because the greater part of our singers pronounce the text in an unintelligible manner; and the latter, because fewer still are qualified to sing the recitative, and do justice to the peculiar expression which it requires.*

"If a lyric drama have not these necessary requisites, the form of the dialogue ought in preference to be adhered to. In operas without dialogue, care must be taken that the recitatives, as well as the concerted pieces, should not be too long, and that the acts, for the greater relief of the singers, as well as of the hearers, should not be too much protracted. For this purpose, it appears to me advisable that the operas usually compressed into two, should be divided into three acts.

"The young artist who wishes to try his powers in an opera composed with recitatives, must, next to those acquirements that it necessarily presupposes, exercise himself with all possible diligence, in this particular branch of his art. Though, at first sight, nothing appears more easy than the composition of the recitative, yet to do justice to it will be found no common task. In this also, we are surpassed by the earlier masters, who have exhausted all the materials for the recitative, and left us nothing but the field of imitation.

"If these suggestions shall have the happy effect of stimulating one man of talent to the composition of an opera, which he would not have attempted without them; and if these hints should prove useful but to one individual amongst those youthful students who are exercising themselves in the study of music, then the author will not think that he has communicated his thoughts in vain."

Thirty years and more have passed away since Spohr, now Dr. Spohr, published the above manifesto to the composers of Germany. The lightning course of the greatest genius of modern art† began and finished in scarcely more than half of that period. Rossini himself composed Moïse, Guillaume Tell, and other great works. Weber ran through his short career, which finished with Oberon. Auber wrote La Muette de Portici, and a dozen other masterpieces. But, all this apart—considering the positions of Spohr and Rossini as operatic composers, and the comparative popularity of their works at the present period, we repeat the question which stands at the head of our first page. Was Spohr a true Prophet (in 1823—thirty-one years ago)? We think not.

† On the appearance of Weber's Freyschütz, it was remarked in some of the public journals that there could not be a more unequivocal proof of the excellence of this opera, than that its melodies were in every mouth, and were heard in every public place, and that a composer could not enjoy a more perfect triumph than this. According to this theory, there never was a greater or more happy composer than Kauer and W. Müller, and never a worse and more unhappy one than Gluck! In the regeneration of the German opera, and for its credit, it is fortunate that the Freyschütz has merited the great applause of the public, not merely by those melodies that have become so popular among the lower classes, but also by beauties of a higher kind.

* The opera of Jessonda possesses, at least as I flatter myself, all these requisites. In its representation, I shall shortly be able to obtain a convincing proof whether the theory I have laid down above will hold good in practice, and if, through an imposing display of pageantry, the multitude will find attraction, at the same time that the more cultivated will be pleased by the music and by the action itself.

MENDELSSOHN.

I BELIEVE most people will agree with me in saying that the chief interest of the music in St. Paul lies in the choral and concerted pieces,* though some of the solos are among the happiest efforts of Mendelssohn in writing for the voice, and I need scarcely add that the recitatives, as specimens of musical declamation and dramatic power, are very grand and effective. The two songs of St. Paul "Consume them all, Lord Sabaoth," "God be gracious to Me after thy great Goodness;" the soprano air, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets," and "But the Lord is mindful of His Own," are replete with depth and earnestness of feeling. Art has done her utmost, if, in uniting words of truth and life to her own conceptions, the reality and power of the language are not marred by the incompetency of the composer. In this case, truth and beauty are inseparably joined, and there is no fear of St. Paul being recognised as any other than a great standard work in the history of sacred music, as long as the divine art has power enough to command a listening.

In the spring of 1837, Mendelssohn was married, at Frankfort, to Cecilie Jeanrenaud, and in August of the same year he visited Düsseldorf, accompanied by his youthful bride, who had not so monopolised the attentions of her husband as to arrest his exertions as an artist. They were greeted on their arrival by a performance of St. Paul, in honour of the composer, under the direction of his friend and pupil, Julius Rietz. As a proof that love and a honeymoon ("Schäferzeit") had not damped his ardour for composition, Felix produced at this time the music for Psalm 42 (Op. 42) a second pianoforte concerto with orchestra in D minor (Op. 40), and the stringed quartet in E minor (Op. 44). Besides these, he forwarded to Simrock, in Bonn, three motets for soprano voices, which were composed partly at Rome, and now appeared fit for publication.

St. Paul was produced in England at the Birmingham Musical Festival in September of this year, Mendelssohn himself being present, and the same year it was heard, for the first time, at Berlin. On the 2nd of October, Mendelssohn returned to Leipsig to resume the direction of the Gewandhaus Concerts. The Society inaugurated their campaign with Weber's Jubilee overture, a chorus of Haydn's "Des Staubes eitle Sorgen," Beethoven's C minor symphony, and a concerto composed and played by the author, Ferdinand David. The chief vocal attraction was the "Wie nähte mir der Schlummer," from Weber's Freischütz sung by Louise Schlegel, a pupil of Pohlenz. But it would be wearisome both to me and the reader also to catalogue the various performances of this season, and I shall only speak of those which have more immediate reference to Mendelssohn himself. At an early stage of the season, Clara Novello was first introduced to the Gewandhaus. Mendelssohn had written a church service, in 1832, for the father of this lady, whose engagement at Leipsig proved very successful, hundreds flocking to listen to a voice almost unequalled for purity and power and which was displayed to great advantage in such songs as the "Ecco il punto, O Vitellia," from Mozart's Titus, "Casta Diva," of Bellini, and last not least the great scena of Beethoven, "Abscheulicher, wo eilst du hin." At the third subscription concert, Felix played his pianoforte concerto in D minor (Allegro appasionato Adagio and Scherzo giojoso) and on a subsequent occasion the quartet in E minor, op. 44, was first heard at Leipsig. On the 16th of November, Handel's Messiah was given very effectively with Mozart's accompaniments, and a brilliant staff of singers—Novello, Möllinger, Gebhardt, and Pögner.

The new year, 1838, will long be remembered as introducing the music of the 42nd Psalm, which Mendelssohn had shewn in manuscript to his Düsseldorf friends on a previous visit. It opens with an expressive chorus "As the Hart pants after the Water-brooks, so longeth my Soul after thee, O God," and a soprano solo, "For my Soul thirsteth," follows, of a plaintive and earnest character, embodying the same ideas conveyed in the concerted piece. Next we have a soprano chorus "For I had gone forth most gladly with the People," and another for men's voices "Why art thou so heavy, O my soul," "O trust in God," and which is answered by a keen voice of lamentation and mourning in the words "My God, my Soul is vexed within me, all thy Waves and Storms are gone over me." A quintet succeeds, accompanied by stringed instruments, "The Lord hath promised his Goodness, and at Night I sing unto the God of my Life." Throughout all these different pieces, doubt, despair, and bitter sense of solitude are opposed to each other till faith seems to have at last gained the mastery, and all the voices unite in a choral hymn to the glory and praise of the God of Israel. The whole forms a small but compact religious drama, and its excellence was recognised on the very first hearing. Clara Novello sang the soprano part, and did her duty admirably.

In the course of this series of concerts, several new and interesting symphonies were produced, by Burgmüller and others; while Felix brought out his music adapted to the 115th Psalm, composed at an earlier period than that we are treating of. A series of historical concerts was now agreed upon by the directors, at the suggestion of Mendelssohn, and the first of these commenced on the 15th February, with specimens of Sebastian Bach, Handel, Glück, and Viotti. The second comprised selections from Haydn, Cimarosa, Raumman, and Righini. The third was made up of Mozart, Salieri, Méhul, and Andreas Romberg. The great novelties on this last occasion were the performance of an unknown quartet, from the Zaïde of Mozart, and a selection from Méhul's Uthal, an opera written by Napoleon's command, on a subject from Ossian, and entirely without violin accompaniments.* The names of Beethoven, Weber, and the Abbé Vogler, appeared in the fourth and last of these meetings, which answered the most sanguine expectations of the public, and had been so ably carried out by Mendelssohn and his friend David. In the summer of this year, Felix conducted the festival at Cologne, and Handel's Joshua was given, with new organ accompaniments. On the third day Felix played his "Allegro giojoso" (Op. 43), and directly after the festival returned with Ferdinand David to Leipzig, where he had promised a second hearing of his oratorio. The day was fixed for the 15th September, but a sudden indisposition of Mendelssohn obliged the Gewandhaus to give the direction to David, who followed his friend's example as closely as possible. It is remarkable that, on this occasion, a new alto air, "Thou who turnest Men to Dust, and sayest, Come again, ye Children of Men," was inserted after the Chorale (No. 9), "To thee, O Lord, I yield my Spirit;" and I should mention, also, that the chief soprano solos were sung by a lady who had retired into private life, but who appeared once more before the public, purely out of respect for, and appreciation of, the composer of an oratorio which became a general favourite, having been heard already in Germany, the Tyrol, Switzerland, Denmark, Holland, Poland, Russia, England, and America.

Felix soon recovered from his illness, and the public welcomed back their favourite with heartfelt joy on the second night of the subscription concerts, inaugurated with his gloomy overture to Fingal's Cave. Mrs. Alfred Shaw, who remained with us till the 28th of January, created a great impression by the simplicity of her style; and in sacred music she was reckoned invaluable. Novelties in the instrumental department were supplied this season by Kalliwoda, Lachner, Möhring, Dobrycinski, and Franz Schubert. Felix was fond of producing long portions of operas almost neglected on the stage, and very seldom heard by the public. Thus, in one programme, we had the lovely septett from the Cosi fan Tutte; a terzetto, with chorus, from Cherubini's Medea; a chorus, from the same composer's Lodoiska; the finale, from Euryanthe; a quartet, from Oberon; and the second finale, from Leonora.

In 1839, Mendelssohn conducted the Düsseldorf Festival, assisted by Julius Rietz; and Handel's Messiah, with Beethoven's Mass in C, were given under his direction. Frank, Fassman, Clara Novello, and Sophie Schloss, were the principal singers. The last-mentioned lady was a great favourite with Mendelssohn, who secured her services in the Gewandhaus for the ensuing winter. The new season at Leipzig was remarkable for the introduction of some fresh compositions, and on the 31st October we heard the music set to the hymn of Luther, "Verleih uns Frieden gnädiglich, a strain of an earnest devotional character, and a motett, "Mitten wir im Leben sind." The year 1840 added greatly to the rising fame of Mendelssohn. In the early part of the winter, his music to the 114th Psalm appeared, the piece, "When Israel out of Egypt came," being adapted for a chorus and orchestra. Differing widely as this work does in style and treatment from the 42nd Psalm, the selection of this noble piece of ancient poetry was eminently a happy one, and in every way adapted to Mendelssohn's powers. We have a grand double chorus, majestically rising with the subject, "What ailedst thou, O Sea, that thou fleddest, and thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?" The answer is "The Earth shook before the Lord," introducing a fugue, "Hallelujah, sing to the Lord," with which the Psalm concludes. The third new work which came from the inexhaustible Felix, this year, was the lovely trio in D minor, for pianoforte, violin, violoncello (Op, 49). It was played in public on the 1st of February, by Mendelssohn, David, and Wittman, and gave the greatest satisfaction to the friends of the composer. The fire and passion in the first movement, the andante con moto tranquillo with its tenderness, and joy tinged with melancholy, the light and graceful scherzo, and the animating finale allegro assai appassionato, all these rank among the choicest of the varied treasures bequeathed us by the great musician, and tell of a man and artist who, in his freedom from restraint and dependence on ancient models, must always be viewed as a great man, because an original one. I could instance many interesting performances which took place at Leipzig this winter, but will only mention one as being an occasion when the whole four overtures of Beethoven's Fidelio were given under the bâton of Mendelssohn, who, ill satisfied with disjoining the work of the mighty master, resolved to follow out step by step the working of his genius, and give in one unbroken chain the entire series of preludes to that famous opera.

DRAMATIC.

Adelphi.—A new and original drama in four acts, by Messrs. Tom Taylor and Charles Reade, called Two Loves and a Life, was brought out on Monday night. Being written expressly for the Adelphi Company, it is one of those striking pieces which include all sorts of surprises, contrasts, variety of character and incident, and which belong purely to the genus "melodramatic!" The story is well developed, and the interest awakened and sustained with considerable art throughout. The language is invariably good, and occasionally rises into poetry. We could take exceptions to some of the scenes as too lengthily drawn out, and to one or two of the situations as constrained and unreal: but, in general, Two Loves and a Life is so well constructed, that we must award it our heartiest praise.

The plot being too long to give in detail, we must condense it as much as possible. The scene takes place at the period of the Rebellion of 1745, and is laid at Ulverstone in the north of England. Sir Gervase Rokewode (Mr. Leigh Murray), disguised as a fisherman named William Hyde, and Father Radcliffe (Mr. Webster), under the name of Reuben Fisher, a quaker, are both awaiting the advance of the Pretender's troops towards London. In this disguise, Rokewode is beloved by two girls—one Anne Musgrave (Miss Woolgar), daughter of the postmaster, and Ruth Ravenscar (Mdme. Celeste), an orphan, of whose history nobody knows anything. Ruth is employed by the postmaster in the conveyance of letters over the famous Ulverstone sands, and her experience teaches her how to save the Duke of Cumberland and a body of troops, who, on the look out for rebels, are on their way to Ulverstone. Rokewode loves Anne, and only entertains a brother's affection for Ruth. Anne's father is in the habit of opening the letters which pass through the office, and thus becomes acquainted with the secret of William Hyde, whom, for the offered reward of a £1000, he betrays to the Duke. Rokewode is sent to the Tower, and ordered for execution; but is saved through the instrumentality of Ruth, who becomes a heroine of romance as much by her love, her perseverance and disinterestedness, as by her turning out to be the daughter of Father Radcliffe.

The great interest of the drama centres in the two girls, who, each in her particular way, exhibit the purest devotion. Throughout the captivity of Rokewode, one or the other is always near him, or endeavouring to save him. The comic character is a schoolmaster (Mr. Keeley), who fills up the tragic pauses with great mirth and whimsicality, and counterbalances any ennui that might otherwise arise from the grave character of the story. Mr. Keeley acted with irresistible humour, and Mr. John Daw may be set down as one of his best recent achievements in comedy. The whole piece, indeed, was admirably played, and we could not decide to whom the palm of superiority was due—to Mr. Leigh Murray, Mr. Webster, Mr. Keeley, Miss Woolgar, or Mdme. Celeste.

The new drama was entirely successful; and, at the fall of the curtain, all the actors re-appeared, and then a loud call was raised for the authors, who had not obeyed the invitation when we left the theatre. We have since heard that they—were not present.

Princess's.—A Storm in a Tea Cup is the name of a new one-act piece produced on Monday night, taken from the French drama of Une Tempête dans un Verre d'Eau. Mr. Bayle Bernard, whose pen has been for some time idle, is the adapter. Though exceedingly slight, and restricted to one scene and two characters, the comedietta was very successful, and is likely to hold its place for some time in the bills. Mr. and Mrs. Felix Summerley (Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy) are about to start on a trip to the Continent, when a letter is brought, the address of which is rendered illegible by the servant having spilt some ink over it. The lady thinks the epistle comes from an old friend, and, having no time to read it, puts it in her pocket.

The husband grows suspicious, and asks the wife to deliver it up. She at last complies, when, on looking again at the direction, she fancies the letter was intended for her husband. She, in her turn, grows jealous; high words ensue, and the quarrel is at its height, when the father of the lady arrives and discovers that the letter belongs to him. The couple are pacified, and their suspicions removed. The fun is kept up by a continual bustle of preparation for the trip. The packings, removing of articles from wrong places, the hurry at the tea table, combined with the smartness and liveliness of the dialogue, prevent the piece from flagging for an instant. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lacy acted admirably, and created continuous laughter by their genuine comic humour. The talents of these deservedly popular artists would have gone far to make successful a piece of less merit than the Storm in a Tea Cup.

Lyceum.—On Thursday evening week, a new piece, called A Charming Widow, was produced with decided success. It is taken from the first Proverbe of M. Alfred de Musset, called The Caprice, which was played at the Théâtre Francais in Paris, with great éclat some years ago. A more sparkling or witty one-act drama, it would be difficult to find; and the translator has apprehended and fixed the very essence and spirit of the original. The actors are Mr. Charles Mathews, Miss M. Oliver, and Miss Talbot. The last-named lady is a débutante, and, if looks alone could make the great actress, no one would dispute her supremacy. But in her art, although a "bonne diseuse," (as the French say), she has much to learn, and to the aids of "youth, beauty and clean linen," as Cherry says, in Love's Catechism, she must be content to look for present admiration. Mr. Charles Mathews was as perpetual, as ubiquitous, as irresistible, as cool and self-possessed as ever. His reading of the Proverb, entirely differs from the French. Pretty little Miss M. Oliver, must not be forgotten; her part, though not a long one, is important to the ensemble, and she played it most winningly.

Mr. Charles Matthews is either the most discriminating and luckiest of managers, or his audience are especially good-natured and trustful. There is seldom a novelty brought out under his direction which does not meet with success. While other theatres have to chronicle failures, the Lyceum has to record triumphs. Not the least successful of the new pieces produced at this theatre, lately, is the two-character farce performed for the first time on Saturday, under the title of Number One Round the Corner. It is taken from the French comedietta, En Manches de Chemises, played at the Palais Royal in 1851, and has been adapted to the English stage, and acclimatised, if we may use the term, by Mr. William Brough. The plot is after the fashion of Box and Cox. Flipper (Mr. Charles Mathews) has answered an advertisement. He hopes to obtain a weekly salary of £5, for which he has merely to pay £20 down. He expects the money by remittance from his uncle. Instead of the money, however, a note arrives. Flipper's uncle is about to pay him a visit, and gives him warning that his top-coat will arrive before him. Flipper is in despair. He will be disappointed in his situation. Moreover, he is in want of a pair of boots. Had he the boots, he might manage to postpone matters with the advertiser. At this moment a top-coat is flung into the room. Flipper, believing it to be his real uncle's, after a little consideration, takes the coat to his uncle's, in metaphor —number one round the corner, where he pledges it, and brings home an undeniable pair of boots on the strength of the money. But the coat, unfortunately, belongs to a lodger in the house, Nobbler (Mr. Roxby). Flipper retiring to dress, Nobbler enters in search of his coat, and finds in its place the duplicate and the boots. He seizes the boots, rushes round the corner and pledges them, returns, and encounters Flipper. They tax each other with a mutual misappropriation of each other's property. The item of twopence for the ticket increases the discussion. Matters, however, are soon made up, and the lodgers become reconciled. Nothing could be better than the acting of Mr. Charles Mathews and Mr. Roxby. The farce was received with roars of laughter, and actors and author were summoned at the fall of the curtain.

On Thursday, a one act comedietta, taken from Alexandre Dumas' Romulus (recently produced at the Théâtre Français, with M. Regnier in the principal character), entitled Wanted a She Wolf, was brought out with equivocal success. A duller affair we have seldom witnessed. The plot is absurd, and unredeemed by a single comic incident. The acting, however, of Messrs. Charles Mathews, Frank Matthews, and Miss M. Oliver, and some cleverness in the dialogue, saved the piece from condemnation. On the French stage we can imagine the success of Romulus. On the English stage we cannot imagine the success of Wanted a She Wolf.

Olympic.—The Wrong Box is a good title, and yet not a good title. It is a good title, inasmuch as it is suggestive of a proverb—"to be in a wrong box." It is not a good title, since, in the present instance, it tends to lead expectation astray. From what source Mr. Tom Taylor borrowed the new piece produced on Monday night, may be easily guessed. There is a Parisian flavour about the Wrong Box, not to be mistaken. The names, however, appear to have proceeded entirely from the fertile brain of the author. A Wrong Box does not imply a thing you might put your foot in.—Mr. Tom Taylor has not put his foot in it. It means a "box," alias "slap," administered to the wrong ear; so that the piece might as well be designated the Wrong Slap, only the reader, or hearer, would not be, as it were, riddled. There is a foolish youthful duke who apes the airs and habits of Louis the Fourteenth. He patronizes a foppish Count, who has a ward who loves an officer. The officer is about to proceed to the wars, and the ward, to stay him, has recourse to a contrivance. She entices him to a nightly assignation, and boxes his ears, he not knowing whence the box comes. It is a rule in the code of honour, according to a Wrong Box, that he who receives a box, not knowing whence it comes, must not leave the place in which he stays until he finds out. The officer does find out, and is satisfied. The Count loves his ward and is jealous of the officer, and seeking in the dark to box his ears, boxes the Duke's instead. The Duke is enraged, and swears he will have the boxer torn by live horses. The Count, fearing a discovery, is terrified, and his fright, capitally assumed by Mr. A. Wigan, constitutes the principal fun of the piece. In the end, the Duke is mystified by being informed that the box was given him by the fair hand of the Count's ward; and, as an imitator of the gallantry of his great model, the grand Louis, he pardons the box.

The Wrong Box was all right. It achieved a good success. Miss P. Horton played the foolish Duke admirably, and Mr. A. Wigan was excellent in the foppish Count. The music might have been better, though no music, perhaps, would have been as well. The Wrong Box was announced for performance every night.

M. Lafont, the celebrated French comedian, is in London. On dit that the subject of his visit is to make arrangements for giving French Plays at the St. James's Theatre, soon after Easter. In the absence of Mr. Mitchell—or, rather, in the secession (temporary, we hope) of that gentleman—no one is better qualified than M. Lafont to preside over such an undertaking.

Middlesex Hospital.—A grand performance of Elijah, under the most distinguished patronage, is announced by the Harmonic Union for Monday next, on behalf of this charity.

Malibran.—Malibran sleeps at Lacken, close to Brussels, in the prettiest, most English churchyard in all Belgium: just the green, sunny, tranquil place that a churchyard should be. Her grave is covered by an anomalous sort of building, that would look like a summer-house if it had open windows. Expecting nothing from the ungracefulness of the exterior, you are startled when you look through a small aperture in the iron door and find the inner gloom lighted up by a white marble statue, the figure, as of an ascending angel, so spiritually fair, you might take it for a vision. The bare foot is just parting from the earth—the robes seem already to have begun to float, and the head and face, always in the full light under the glazed roof, were, when I saw them first, steeped in a golden glow from the last level rays of the setting sun. Seen thus, the symbol takes an intenser meaning; the body, mouldering in the dust, the spiritual part already in the light, and almost in the presence of God. No long transition—no floating upward and onward past the sun and star: the last touch of earth, the first glimpse of home, for the soul-beaming face looks serene and satisfied—a mirror of the peace that passeth understanding.—Colburn.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The great event of the week has been the revival of Spontini's La Vestale at the Grand Opera, after having been allowed to lie on the shelf for about thirty years. Little more than six months ago, Spontini's "chef-d'œuvre" (so called), was almost unremembered by the general public; another generation had sprung up since it was first brought out, and most of the habitués of the Rue Lepelletier knew little about it and cared less. For the last few months, however, La Vestale has divided public attention with the Emperor Nicholas, the Danubian Principalities, and Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord. The first question on meeting with an acquaintance was: "Well, have you heard how La Vestale is going on?"—and he was indeed fortunate who, having the entrée of the coulisses, or being acquainted with any of the persons engaged, could retail the latest news of the rehearsals.

To what was this sudden change in the good Parisians to be attributed? What mighty cause had transformed their apathy into an almost frantic state of curiosity? Nor more nor less than the fact that Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli was to play the principal part. Great expectations had been formed of her on this occasion, and not one remained unfulfilled. Never did this great enchantress exert a greater fascination over her spell-bound auditory. The applause that rewarded her exertions was immense, but not one iota more than she deserved. Roger acted and sang admirably. The other artistes were Messrs. Obin, Bonnehée, and Mdlle. Poinsot. The music written by Spontini himself for the ballet was not given, but, in its place, some new music by M. Labarre, which, though pleasing, did not seem to give so much satisfaction as that of the original maestro, to the old opera-goers who could remember it.

M. Clapisson's new opera, La Promise, at the Théâtre Lyrique has been successful. Although not a work of the first class, it will probably have a run, owing to the manner in which the principal part is sustained by Mdlle. Marie Cabel, who is seconded by Messrs. Laurent, Junca, Colson, Mesdames Vadé and Girard.—Mdlle. Marie Damoreau, daughter of the celebrated prima donna, has made her début at a concert given in the Salle Herz for the benefit of the poor of Paris. She was not announced in the programme by name, but figured simply as M. D., as she will not come out "for good" until next season, only volunteering her services on account of the object proposed by the givers of the concert. The secret, however, oozed out, as, no doubt, it was intended, and the fair débutante met with a flattering reception. The Ménéstrel is in raptures with her, as you will perceive by the following extract:—

"The most brilliant jewels in her mother's diadem shine so brilliantly in the talent of Mdlle. Marie Cinti-Damoreau, that we may consider as an inheritance what, luckily for us all, is merely a premature legacy. Not only has Mad. Cinti-Damoreau transmitted the suavity, good taste, and charm of her own style to her daughter, but created for her a perfect pépinière of vocal flowers, quite new, realising by their tender tints and delicate perfume another spring. Mad. Cinti-Damoreau enjoys a second youth in her daughter."

This is high praise and high flown, and your respected contemporary may, perhaps, have formed a somewhat extravagant notion of the young lady's capabilities. Nous verrons.—M. Duprez opened his Théâtre-Ecole on the 17th inst., in his hôtel, Rue de Turgot. He intends it, as you are no doubt aware, to be a school of declamation and singing for young artistes. The opening was inaugurated by a brilliant assemblage of the greatest artistic celebrities in Paris, among whom I may mention Messrs. Meyerbeer, Auber, Levasseur, Ponchard, Roger, and Mad. Cinti-Damoreau.

The Ministre d'Etat has appointed a committee to revise the constitution of the Conservatoire Impérial de Musique. M. Alfred Blanche is president.

The Corps Législatif, in its sitting of the 8th instant, adopted the bill proroguing the rights guaranteed to the widows and children of authors, composers, and artists, as it was presented at the close of last session, and without the additions since proposed.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—One of Flotow's earliest operas, Die Matrosen, was lately produced for the first time at the Imperial Opera House. It was originally brought out at the Hamburger-Stadt-Theater, on the 23rd December, 1845. Mdlle. La Grua, Herren Ander, Radwanner, Beck, and Hölzl, who sustained the principal parts, were well received, but it is unlikely that Die Matrosen will remain long in the bills. Misfortunes, they say, never come alone, or, in the words of the proverb, "It never rains but it pours." The truth of this was never more disagreeably proved than by a circumstance connected with this same opera, Die Matrosen, which was to have been repeated the night after its first production. The sudden indisposition of Herr Ander, however, rendered this impossible, and Robert le Diable was announced instead, with Herr Erl as Robert. The latter, however, was in the same condition as Herr Ander, and, on learning that his services were required, immediately wrote off to the theatre to announce the unseasonable fact. On this the management put up the Huguenots, with Herr Steger; but Herr Steger was in the enjoyment of no better health than his colleagues, and, therefore, in order that the theatre might not be closed, Herr Kreutzer undertook to appear, at a moment's notice in Der Freischütz. Meyerbeer's Prophète was played on the 13th inst., for the 100th time. Spontini's Vestalin was revived on the 17th, with Mesdames Marlow, Ezzillag, Herren Steger, Beck, and Draxler, in the principal parts. Fräulein Wildhauer has appeared as Arline, after a temporary absence from the theatre, in consequence of indisposition. There have been only three concerts of any consequence—that given on the 11th, by the Männergesangverein, in the grand Redoutensaal; that on the 12th inst., by Fräulein Fritz, in the rooms of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde; and Herr Stockhausen's third concert, on the 16th inst., in the rooms of the Musikverein. The third quartet concert, of the second series, given by Herren Helmesberger, Durst, Heissler, and Schlesinger, took place on the same day as the Männergesangverein's concert. The pieces in the programme were Haydn's quartet in F major, Spohr's quintet in C minor, for the pianoforte, admirably played by Herr Pirkhert,* and Beethoven's "posthumous" quartet in C sharp minor. Mdlle. La Grua intends profiting by her congé, which will shortly commence, to pay a visit to Paris and Dresden. Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is expected here on the 18th inst. (to-day). She intends to give, at any rate, six concerts, and, perhaps, more, the first to take place on the 26th inst., in the great Redoutensaal. I need scarcely inform you, I suppose, that every place is already taken.—The Italian Opera will open this season with either Otello or Cenerentola. Verdi's Il Trovatore and Stiffelio will probably be among the new operas produced. One of our prime donne, Signora Valesi, is already arrived, and Madame Medori, who was to leave St. Petersburg on the 10th inst., is hourly expected.—We are promised a great treat for to-morrow (the 19th inst.), when Mendelssohn's Oratorio of St. Paul will be given at the Gesellschaft's Concert, in the great Redoutensaal. I will send you an account in my next.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The young and talented pianist, Maddle. Wilhelmina Clauss, has created quite a sensation among the lovers of music here. She has played several times in public, and given two concerts of her own. The first, which took place in the Singakademie, on the 24th of February, and in which she was assisted by Dr. Bruns, Herren Osten, Grünwald, and Mad. Herrenburger, fully justified the expectations previously formed of her. She is decidedly one of the first artistes of the day, and her style is solid, pure, and graceful. The Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung speaks of her in the following terms:—"Wilhelmina Clauss is a Milanollo on the piano, but, in her comprehension of elevated thoughts, incomparably superior to the celebrated violinist. Her execution of Beethoven's Sonata appassionata proved this beyond a doubt. She entirely conveyed the deep earnestness which pervades every bar of that production, and which is especially perceptible in the first movement. All her mechanism, too, was so free from effort, that we could not admire it sufficiently. Mdlle. Clauss obtained, however, the greatest success in some pieces, at the conclusion of the concert, which, almost exclusively calculated for effect, were full of bravura passages, only to be accomplished by virtuosi of the first class. Mdlle. Clauss gave them in such a manner that it was hardly possible to believe they presented any difficulty. In a word, the young artist completely charmed her auditors, and there is no doubt that her concerts will be most successful." The prediction, in the last sentence, has already been fulfilled, for her second concert was even more fully attended than the first, and the applause, if possible, more enthusiastic. The pieces performed by Mdlle. Clauss, on this occasion, were Mendelssohn's violoncello sonata in B flat (Dr. Bruns at the violoncello), Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, an impromptu by Chopin, the Erlkönig, and Lucia di Lammermoor of Liszt.—M. Vieuxtemps has given a concert in the Singakademie. Among other pieces played by this celebrated virtuoso, we may especially mention his manuscript Concerto in D minor, dedicated to the King of Prussia.—Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's two Concerts have excited a vast amount of enthusiasm. The "Nightingale" was raptuously applauded in her various songs; among, which, we may mention the Romance of Raimbault from Robert le Diable, the rondo finale, from the Sonnambula, Mendelssohn's "O Winter," and Taubert's "Wer klappert am Dache." Herr Otto Goldschmidt played some of Bach's compositions, and Morceaux de Salon of his own, on the pianoforte. At the second concert, Herr Henry Wieniawski executed part of a concerto by Viotti, and some variations, and Ernst's Carnaval de Vênise. Auber's Marco Spada, has been produced at the Kroll'sches Theater, and Handel's oratorio of Israel in Egypt by Herr Stern's Gesangverein.

* Herr Pirkhert was in England ten or twelve years ago. He played Beethoven's C minor concerto at the Philharmonic.

Düsseldorf.—M. Robert Schumann, the composer, who has been for some time in a state of mental alienation, lately succeeded in escaping from his keeper and precipitating himself into the Rhine. He was, fortunately, saved from death, but no hopes are entertained of his recovery.

Cologne.—M. Ferdinand Hiller has returned from Paris, having passed through Frankfort on his way. Meyerbeer's Prophète continues to attract at the theatre. Among the revivals we may mention Il Barbiere and Hans Heiling. The finale of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera of Lorelei is in rehearsal.

Milan.—The daughter of the composer, M. Chiaramonti, is about to appear as prima donna at the Scala.

Bologna.—The once well-known singer, Teresa Bertinotti, died here lately, aged 78.

PROVINCIAL.

Manchester.—(From a Correspondent.)—Mr. J. Thorne Harris's Second Musical Evening took place at his residence on Thursday, March 16th. These performances deserve special notice. Mr. Harris is a player of unusual talent. He is very young, and is a pupil of his father, Mr. Joseph Harris, the well-known professor. Being forced to work hard as a master, and without enjoying the opportunities of studying and practising to which most artists devote many years, he has nevertheless acquired a mastery over his instrument which very few acquire even under the most favourable auspices. His execution is of the most brilliant character, equal to the tasks which the greatest modern composers demand from the performers of their works. But, besides his mechanical powers, Mr. Harris possesses a feeling and taste for the poetry of Beethoven's, Mendelssohn's, and Chopin's pianoforte works to an eminent degree. His rendering of Beethoven's sonata in F, and Chopin's nocturne, on Thursday evening, was equally vigorous and refined. "La Truite," by Stephen Heller, is one of the most dazzling morceaux of brilliant music, and requires an almost perfect execution. Mr. Harris played it with the greatest fire, and at the termination of the splendid tapage, was applauded with the greatest enthusiasm. I take this opportunity (and I hope you will not consider it misplaced) of noticing Mr. Harris's remarkable talents. The critical part of the musical public in our city have watched their progress with the greatest interest, and it is their hope that a day will come when our townsman will remove his genius to a larger sphere, where it may be rewarded with an extended reputation.

The concert was listened to throughout with much pleasure. The performers were Messrs. Baetens and Harris, and a party of amateur vocalists. The selection of music was in good taste, and consisted principally of works by Spohr, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Heller, and Chopin. An original song by Mr. Harris, "Withered Leaves," was accompanied on the viola and pianoforte. The former instrument contributed much towards the beautiful effect suggested by the murmur of winter leaves. Two more performances are announced by Mr. Harris to take place in the course of the ensuing fortnight.

Brighton.—(From a Correspondent).—Mad. Sala gave a concert on Tuesday evening. Mad. Sala sung with Mrs. Wheeler a duet by Mendelssohn, called "The Sabbath Morn;" Handel's song, "Lord, to Thee each Night and Day" (accompanied on the harmonium by Mr. Courteney) and a ballad by Linley. Mr. J. Marshall (pupil of Mr. Bond) who was greatly applauded, sang Haydn's air, "Now Heaven in fullest Glory" and a song from Wallace's Maritana. Herr Kuhe was the pianist. He played a sonata of Beethoven for pianoforte and violin, with Mr. Cooper, and one of Theodore Kullak's most difficult solos. Miss Emilie Niebour, who played on the concertina, is an excellent player, and does credit to Regondi, her instructor. Mr. Land presided at the pianoforte, and sung two Irish ballads. The concert gave great satisfaction.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

The third concert was given on Thursday, when Mr. Ella's subscribers mustered in good round numbers. The company was very brilliant. The programme was unexceptionable, as may be seen at a glance:—

Quartet, in G, No. 76 (Pleyel ed.), Haydn; Trio, B flat (Op. 27), pianoforte, &c., Molique; Quintet, in D, No. 4, Mozart; Variations Concertantes (Op. 17), piano and violoncello, Mendelssohn.

The executants were Herr Molique (first violin), Herr Goffrie (second violin), Mr. H. Hill (tenor), Herr Ries (second tenor), Signor Piatti (violoncello), and Mr. Charles Hallé (piano). Herr Molique's trio was a novelty at these concerts. It is a work of great originality and beauty, and in every respect worthy the reputation of the master. Though elaborate and profound, it is full of genuine melody, and was listened to with the greatest attention throughout. The trio was first introduced at Manchester by Hallé and Piatti, and was performed twice by these artists in conjunction with the composer. The pianoforte part is very difficult. Mr. Hallé mastered it like a consummate artist.

In his analytical programme, Mr. Ella, alluding to Mozart's quintet, quotes a passage from Oulibicheff's Life of Mozart, a translation of which is now being published in the Musical World, as corroborating his own admiration of that work. The quintet is one of Mozart's latest compositions, and is an acknowledged chef-d'œuvre. It was executed in the most faultless manner by Herren Molique, Goffrie, Ries, Mr. Hill, and Signor Piatti. The extremely difficult finale called forth the entire strength of all the executants, who seemed inspired by the music.

Hallé and Piatti, in a duet, are always welcome, since we are assured of a perfect performance. The German and Italian—though of such different temperaments — amalgamate well. Mendelssohn's Air varié has a simple and melodious theme; the variations are full of grace and beauty, and though they do not demand the highest executive power, none but true artists could do full justice to them. It is unnecessary to add that they were executed to perfection. Haydn's quartet, one of his first, is familiar to every musician. We have seldom heard it with more pleasure, nor do we believe it has often been better executed. Molique was admirable, and the adagio, the conversational morceau for the violin and violoncello, between him and Piatti, was a contest for supremacy, in which both came forth as victors. Mr. Charles Hallé concluded the concert with a brilliant performance of a romance and étude by Henselt, and one of the Polonaises by Chopin.

Herr Ernst (who was present) is engaged for the next Concert.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 25TH, 1854.

THE management of the Royal Italian Opera has issued its prospectus for 1854. This interesting document has been long and anxiously expected; but we have got it at last, and "better late than never" is an axiom that applies in all cases where delay has been inevitable. There is no doubt that the prospectus would have been out a month ago, but for the Wagner case, which naturally engrossed the whole attention of Mr. Gye and his associates in the direction. That ghost, however, is laid for the present; and the programme has appeared without the name of Mdlle. Johanna, who could not very gracefully show herself on the London boards until her difficulties with Mr. Lumley were arranged.

The theatre is to open on Tuesday, the 28th instant*—a subscription night. It is not stated what opera will be performed on the occasion; but we have reason to believe we are not very far wrong in suggesting Guillaume Tell—Signors Tamberlik, Ronconi, and Tagliafico, Madame Bosio and Mdlle. Bellini being daily expected in London. The inaugural address of the directors may be passed over—since, although the self-gratulations it contains are not altogether unwarranted, either by what has passed or by what is promised, they have nothing to do with the main object of the prospectus for which the Operatic public has been so long on the look out. The list of operas which have been produced since the establishment of the Royal Italian Opera, in 1847, is more to the purpose. The répertoire at present comprises no less than forty-two operas, of which the "scenery, costumes, and decorations"—to say nothing, as the prospectus says nothing, of the music and the singers—are all ready to hand, at one rehearsal's notice. The names of these operas are as follows:—

Semiramide, La Donna del Lago, L' Italiana in Algeri, Il Barbiere di Seviglia, La Gazza Ladra, Il Tancredi, La Cenerentola, Guglielmo Tell, Mosé in Egitto (Zora), Otello, Rossini; Ernani, I Due Foscari, Nabuco (Anato), Rigoletto, Verdi; Norma, La Sonnambula, I Puritani, I Capuletti e Montecchi, Bellini; Les Huguenots, Robert le Diable, Le Prophète, Meyerbeer; Lucia di Lammermoor, L' Elisir d' Amore, Lucrezia Borgia, Anna Bolena, Maria di Rohan, La Favorita, Linda di Chamouni, I Martiri, Donizetti; Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Il Flauto Magico, Mozart; Masaniello, Auber; Il Matrimonio Segreto, Cimarosa; La Juive, Halévy; Der Freischütz, Weber; Sappho, Gounod; Fidelio, Beethoven; Pietro il Grande, Jullien; Benvenuto Cellini, Berlioz; Faust, Jessonda, Sophr.

Rossini, 10; Donizetti, 8; Bellini, 4; Verdi, 4; Mozart, 3; Meyerbeer, 3; Spohr, 2; Beethoven, 1; Weber, 1; Auber, 1; Cimarosa, 1; Halévy, 1; Gounod, 1; Berlioz, 1; and Jullien, 1;—total, 42. How many of them are ever likely to be called for is a question upon which the prospectus does not speculate. We could place our finger upon some dozen that will not be required this season, and upon nearly half as many that, in all probability, will not be reproduced during the life-time of the youngest inhabitant of the stalls and boxes.

During the season, three of the following operas will positively be produced:—La Vestale (Spontini), Le Domino Noir (Auber), Don Sebastien (Donizetti), Matilda di Shabran (Rossini), Don Pasquale (Donizetti), and Oberon (Weber). The three "positives" are not hard to guess. We shall have La Vestale for Mdlle. Cruvelli, Don Pasquale for Signor Lablache, and Ob—— no, not Oberon (the annual announcement of which may be set aside as a stereotyped parenthesis)—not Don Sebastien, which would cost too much for the spectacle, and "draw" no more than the Martiri—not Le Domino Noir, which, under the name of Il Domino Nero, has for years figured in our Italian Opera programmes as a rara avis (more like a "whale" than a "black swan")—nor Oberon nor Don Sebastien, nor Le Domino Noir—but Matilda di Shabran. Why Matilda di Shabran, we are at a loss to explain, since that is one of the least renowned of the operas of Rossini. Perhaps, however, there is a good part in it for Lablache; and if so, qui s'en plaindra ?

About Meyerbeer's new opera, L'Etoile du Nord, after going through the whole prospectus twice—page by page, line by line, word by word—we find nothing. Perhaps the directors think it wiser to defer bringing it out until the termination of the Russian war—or at least till Admiral Napier is in Cronstadt, Admiral Dundas in Sebastopol, and Omar Pasha in Bucharest. There is no Louis Napoleon here to say that "Art and Politics are two."

"The "engagements" for the season are, on the whole, very satisfactory. First in the list of soprani, we find the time-honoured name of Giulia Grisi, who, after twenty-one years of absolute supremacy, resigns the crown and sceptre of dramatic song. Grisi is to appear in each of her most famous parts successively; and, "towards the end of July," will take her leave of the English public. The "farewell" of so unprecedented a popular favourite is an event of absorbing interest, which must throw a tinge of melancholy over the season of 1854, however brilliant it may turn out in other respects. To whom shall Giulia Grisi delegate her mantle? To———

Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli is the next important name in the catalogue of soprani. Her engagement is necessarily a short one, and begins with her congé at the Académie Impériale de Musique, where her success in the Huguenots, and more recently in La Vestale, has been filling the treasury of M. Roqueplan, and restoring the tottering fortunes of the theatre. Mdlle. Cruvelli, we need hardly say, has never yet sung at the Royal Italian Opera. Her first London season was in 1848, at Her Majesty's Theatre; her second was in 1851; and her third in the following year, at the same establishment. Her capabilities as a singer and actress are too well known to require enumeration here. It is enough to say that she is a prodigious favourite with the English public. Her brief engagement (only a month in duration, we believe) will be one of the pleasantest incidents of the season. Mdlle. Cruvelli will sing in Spontini's Vestale, and in Beethoven's Fidelio, in the latter of which the management will do wisely to bring her out. She comes in May—which, for her coming, will, to her admirers, be really what the poet calls it—

———"the jolly month of May."

Madame Angelina Bosio, who in Verdi's Rigoletto, last season, raised herself high in the public esteem, and who has so rapidly become an accomplished and admirable singer, makes up the triad of soprani of the first class. Another great name remains to be added—that of Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia, who has been re-engaged after an absence of two seasons. This distinguished artist is as much a contralto as a soprano, and as much a mezzo soprano as either. We

* According to the prospectus. Thursday, the 30th, according to the advertisements in the morning papers.

Digitized by Google

have, therefore, not classed her among the soprani proper, although she stands next to Grisi in the list. The "novelty" is Madlle. Marai, who, at St. Petersburg at least, enjoys a more than considerable repute, which we doubt not her ability to consolidate and establish in this country. Madlle. Albini, who appeared last year in Maria di Rohan and Ernani, is re-engaged—as a "double," we suppose, since we find the names of Madlles. Bellini and Cotti as seconde donne, the former (of course) for the Adalgisas, etc., the latter for the subordinate parts.

But where is Amalia Corbari— the beau idéal of seconde donne?—Echo. "Where?"

Some time ago, there was a great talk about Alboni, whose name, it was hoped, would once more enrich the prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera. Either there was no foundation for the report, however, or the manager of Covent Garden could not come to terms with the famous "contralto-soprano." At all events, we find no Alboni in the list of singers—unless, indeed, "Albini" is a misprint for Alboni, which we should by no means regret to hear, with the utmost deference to the real Mdlle. Albini. The contralto list is meagre. The only name is that of Mdlle. Nantier Didiée, a charming artist in her way, and irresistible as the assassin's daughter in Rigoletto, but, for all that, not strictly a contralto, being truly and absolutely a mezzo-soprano—at least, so say the maestri di cappella, and those within the temple.

At the head of the list of tenors stands the name of Mario; at the bottom that of Tamberlik. It is enough to cite them without comment. Signor Luchesi, who was here for the first time last season, Herr Stigelli, the Italianised German, and Signor Soldi, who is so eager for distinction on all occasions, that, when he has nothing to do but deliver a letter, he does it with a loud voice and with a look of defiance, are the second tenors. Ronconi and Sig. Fortini are the barytones; Lablache, Tagliafico, Sig. Polonini, Sig. Susini, and M. Zelger, the basses. Lablache, like Cruvelli, makes his first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera. He was the only one of the Vieille Garde that stood faithful to the old colours. Lablache had his reasons for remaining constant to the theatre in which he had gained his London reputation. These, for the time, are in abeyance, and the habitués of the Covent Garden establishment will not be sorry to have such a large addition to their enjoyment. With Ronconi—who is "inimitable" in everything—we may look forward to a revival of the Barbiere di Seviglia. We say a revival advisedly, since we consider Doctor Bartolo as important as Figaro, Almaviva, or Rosina, and because Doctor Bartolo can only be played by Lablache. Tagliafico, in his own line one of the best artists on the stage, is altogether out of it in Doctor Bartolo. The humour of that personage is not his humour; or, rather, Tagliafico's humour is the French and not the Italian humour of the character; and Lablache, by his exquisite buffoneria, has succeeded in fixing the latter in the mind of the French no less than the English public, as the only true "humour of it." Signor Susini is a transplantation from Her Majesty's Theatre, where, at one time, he played Rocco, in Fidelio. He is a young man.

Talking of Rocco reminds us of Formes. That gentleman is not engaged. We regret it exceedingly, for many reasons; but, more than all, because in certain characters Herr Formes has no rival. In Marcel, Rocco, Leporello, and last, not least, Don Basilio, he cannot, we think, be replaced. Moreover, Herr Formes is an immense favourite with the public, and will, we are sure, be greatly missed by the subscribers and the habitués in general. What a Fidelio we should have had, with Cruvelli, Bosio, Tamberlik, Lablache, and Formes!—what a Barbiere, with Bosio, Mario, Ronconi, Formes, and Lablache! But would Mdme. Bosio condescend to sing the part of Marcellina, in Fidelio (as Corbari did in Paris)? We trust yes, but we fear no. These "prime ladies" are so loth to play second to each other!

The rest briefly. The orchestra and chorus will be "as heretofore." The orchestra—good; but the chorus, let us hope, may be on a new "scale of efficiency." Mr. Costa remains at his post, as "director of the music, composer, and conductor." Are we to look for one of the operas of Mr. Costa—Don Carlos, for example, or Malek Adel, for example? If not, why composer? "Director" and "conductor" we can understand, since Mr. Costa directs the musical department and conducts the orchestra. But "composer" we cannot understand—that is, in reference to the Royal Italian Opera—unless Mr. Costa composes music for the establishment. The management should revive the delicious ballets of Alma and Kenilworth, now they have got Mdlle. Plunket for the season. These would do famously after short operas. The ladies of the ballet are announced as—Mdlles. Battalini, Astori, and Eliza Nehr, Santi, Esper, and Plunkett. M. Desplaces continues to be the maître-de-ballet, and Mr. Alfred Mellon, leader. We hear wonders of the attractions of the coryphées, who, we are told, are like so many houris. If so, the stalls will be at a premium. The engagement of the graceful and vivacious Mdlle. Plunkett will afford unqualified satisfaction. Mr. Godfrey and his military band are again secured for operas on a grand scale; Mr. A. Harris retains his post as "director of the mise-en-scène," or stage manager; and Mr. W. Beverley that of "scenic artist," or scene painter. The office of maestro al piano is again entrusted to Signor Panizza, the drilling of the chorus to Mr. Smithson, the refreshment of the singers' memories to Signor Monterasi, and the turning of exotic languages into choice Italian rhyme, to Signor Maggioni, poet. When we add that Madame Marzio is costumière, Mr. Prescott "decorator," and Mr. Allen "machinist," our readers will not be much the wiser—but it is all in the Prospectus.

The subscription is to consist of forty-six nights, and the season is expected to terminate in August. And so, no more about the Royal Italian Opera, until the opening night.

P.S. We forgot to state that the usual list of members of the orchestra does not appear in the Prospectus. Que signifie cela? (We are afraid to ask the question in English.)

---

Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss.—The admirers of this charming pianist will be pleased to hear that she will arrive in London for the season during the first week of April. Mdlle. Clauss is at present at Hamburgh, where, as well as at Bremen, she has been giving concerts. She will stop at Paris, for a short time, on her way to London.

Signor F. Schira, the well-known composer and professor of the vocal art, has arrived in London for the season.

Signor Bazzini, the violinist, is expected to arrive in London for the season the first week in April, after a very successful tour in the Netherlands. He has written several new pieces for the violin, which are to be published forthwith.

Jenny Lind.—When Shakspere, in writing of the male sex, penned his celebrated line—

"To one thing constant never,"

Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt was not living, otherwise he would have applied it equally to the softer part of the creation. Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt has again changed her mind, and will ("positively"—as the programme says) come to London this season, for the purpose of giving concerts.

ERNST.

This great violinist has arrived in London, after an absence of two years. During that interval, Herr Ernst has visited most of the towns and cities of Switzerland, France, and Rhenish Germany, where he has given concerts with invariable success. He is announced to make his first appearance in London for the present season, on the 30th inst., at Mr. Ella's Musical Winter Evenings, in Willis's Rooms. As no artist is more esteemed by the English public than Herr Ernst, it may be prognosticated that the occasion of his re-appearance, for the first time since 1851, in one of his favorite Beethoven or Mendelssohn quartets, will be what the French style une vraie solennité.

MR. STERNDALE BENNETT'S SOIRÉES.

The third and last of these interesting performances came off on Tuesday, when the Hanover Square Rooms were filled in every part. Mr. Bennett was assisted, in the instrumental department, by Herr Molique, Signor Piatti and Mr. Harold Thomas (pupil of Mr. Bennett) and, in the vocal, by Madame Ferrari and Miss Poole. The programme was as follows :—

Part First.—Chamber Trio, Op. 26, in A major, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (W. S. Bennett).; Cantata, "Non temer, pianoforte)" obligato (Mozart); Sonata, Op. 24, in F. major, pianoforte and violin (Beethoven).

Part Second.—Grand Fuga, A minor, pianoforte (J. S. Bach); Duo (from mass in B minor) (J. S. Bach); Duet, piano and violin, in E major (J. S. Bach).

Part Third.—Duo, piano and violoncello (Op. 45), B flat major (Mendelssohn); Songs, "Forget me not," and "Gentle Zephyr" (W. S. Bennett); Lieder ohne Worte (Mendelssohn). Pianoforte, Mr. W. S. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett's trio, one of his most charming and finished works, was played to perfection by himself, Herr Molique, and Signor Piatti. In Beethoven's sonata, the admirable playing of the scherzo by Mr. Bennett and Signor Piatti obtained a loud encore. The whole performance was a genuine treat for the lovers of the clavier. Bach's fugue—the longest and most difficult he has written for the pianoforte (or clavier, or harpsichord, or spinet)—was executed in a masterly manner by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, who, throughout the evening, was in his finest play. The same author's duo, though exceedingly well sung, was somewhat dull. It would prove more effective in a church than in a concert-room. The duet for pianoforte and violin, however, though somewhat antiquated, in the form of its passages and sequences, and therefore "rococo" to modern ears, was extremely interesting. Nothing could surpass the playing of Mr. Bennett and Herr Molique in this sonata, which, nevertheless, did not produce a great impression on the audience. The selection from Bach was made in honour of the anniversary of the birth of that illustrious musician. In the third part, Mendelssohn's duet, with Piatti at the violoncello, exquisitely played, was the great treat of the evening. Madame Ferrari pleased us very much in Mozart's exquisite cantata, the difficult obbligato for the pianoforte of which, was rendered with infinite ease and grace by Mr. Bennett. Miss Poole sang the two songs of Mr. Bennett with her own peculiar simplicity and earnestness, Mr. R. Harold Thomas accompanying her on the piano, and the selection from the Lieder ohne Worte closed the performance most effectively. The numbers were three :—Book 1, No. 2 ; Book 6, No. 1, and Book 5, No. 1.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The great success achieved by the Society last season on three or four occasions, when Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Mozart's Requiem were given on the same evening, fully warranted the reproduction of these chefs-d'œuvre together this year. The execution of the Requiem last night, when Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the Princess Alice were present, was highly satisfactory, and the Society will no doubt be induced to repeat it. The Royal party arrived at 25 minutes past 9, half-an-hour after the Lobgesang was over, and remained to the end. The Queen was cheered both on arriving and departing.

Mendelssohn's Lobgesang—Anglice, "Hymn of Praise"—was first produced at Leipsic in 1840, at the festival given in honour of Gutenberg, the inventor of printing. In 1841, it was performed for the first time in England at the Birmingham Festival, under the direction of the composer; and was introduced subsequently to a London audience by the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies. The Lobgesang is constructed after the manner of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the choral part, or hymn, being preceded by three instrumental movements. Some of the choruses were given with force last night—witness, "The Night is departing," "Let all Men praise the Lord," and the finale, with the fugue on the words, "Sing ye the Lord;" but the whole performance was unworthy of the sacred Harmonic Society.

Mozart's Requiem is the most celebrated and best known of all the composer's works for the church. Interdicted from public performance in this country on account of its being a Roman Catholic office for the dead, it was almost a sealed book in the concert room, until last year, when the Sacred Harmonic Society had the courage to bring it out at Exeter Hall without changing its original title, as in the case of Beethoven's Mount of Olives. The public has at last been taught to know the power and sublimity of one of Mozart's greatest masterpieces, and an occasional performance of the Requiem, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is now indispensable. As the Requiem by itself was too short for one evening's performance, the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn—a work also of moderate length—was wisely selected to prolong the entertainment. Any composition inferior to the Hymn of Praise must have suffered by being placed in juxtaposition with Mozart's work; but the Lobgesang in its way, is equal to the Requiem, while the contrast of style, treatment, development, etc., of the two masters, gives a peculiar interest to the joint performance.

The Requiem consists of thirteen pieces :—A chorus in two parts, "Requiem Æternam," and "Kyrie Eleison;" chorus, "Dies Iræ;" quartet, "Tuba mirum;" chorus, "Rex tremendæ Majestatis;" quartet, "Recordare;" chorus, "Confutatis;" chorus, "Lachrymosa;" chorus, "Domine Jesu Christe;" chorus, "Hostias et Preces;" chorus, "Sanctus;" quartet, "Benedictus;" and chorus, "Agnus Dei," leading to the final chorus in two movements, "Lux Æterna," and "Cum Sanctis Tuis."

Mr. Costa had evidently taken pains in rehearsing the Requiem, and its success was again complete. At this late hour we cannot enter into particulars. The hall was densely crowded, but the audience discreetly forbore from giving vent to expressions of satisfaction. The vocalists were Misses Birch and Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes, all of whom exerted themselves to the utmost. Mr. Sims Reeves sang magnificently in the Lobgesang. The splendid passage "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" was never so poetically and so forcibly read before. Had the rest of the performance been of the same calibre, Mendelssohn's great work would have enjoyed the same advantage as the Requiem of Mozart.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second concert, on Monday night, was a very good one although not more remarkable for novelty than the first. Either the scarcity of solo instrumental talent at present in the country, or a conviction that the selections under the old régime were too long, has induced the directors to alter the system hitherto adopted. We have still two symphonies; but the second part of the programme is curtailed of a solo and a vocal piece. Whatever inconvenience may arise from this, when there is a superabundance of "virtuosi" in London, all having a claim to be heard, and however a departure from the established routine may affect the general attraction of the concerts, there can be little doubt that such a selection as that of Monday night was long enough for any reasonable appetite, and that the audience experienced a real musical enjoyment without being satiated and fatigued. The symphonies were Beethoven's No. 1, in C, and Mendelssohn's in A minor (the "Scottish"). The early work of Beethoven—his first essay as a competitor with Haydn and Mozart in the wide field of the orchestra—was heard with the more pleasure on account of its being so rarely given. On the whole, it was extremely well performed. The worshippers of times gone-by might possibly object that the andante was taken too quickly; but such bigoted persons will persist in disregarding the signification of those qualifying words, "con moto," which are intended to have as much influence upon a cantabile as upon any other kind of melody. The scherzo—the first example of that especially characteristic movement which the genius of Beethoven invented, and which took the place of the minuetto of the old symphonists—was executed with great spirit, and the trio with wonderful lightness and delicacy. We wish we could speak as favourably of Mendelssohn's symphony; but the truth is, that the performance of this great work by the band of the Philharmonic Society gets annually less and less satisfactory. The contrasts of tempo in the first allegro have become so strongly marked, that the balance of the movement is utterly destroyed. Mendelssohn did not intend that the changes should be so abrupt, and, as he conducted the symphony himself at the concerts of the Society on more than one occasion, it is surprising that the lapse of so few years should have sufficed to eradicate the remembrance of his own reading of the work. But this was not all. The general execution of the first movement, and of the scherzo which follows, was in many places coarse and unfinished; in short, altogether unworthy of so deservedly renowned an orchestra as that of the Philharmonic. As a misconception in the reading, moreover, we must call attention to a point at the reprise of the first subject. The fine tone of the body of violoncellos in the new melody which precedes this was worthy of all admiration; but, when the continuation of the episode becomes a sort of counter theme to the first subject, we beg leave to suggest that the power of tone should be modified, so as to allow, of the principal melody (to which the new one is only subordinate) being as distinctly heard, as when it is first introduced. The adagio, one of Mendelssohn's finest inspirations, and the finale, with its majestic and exciting coda, were so well played as to make amends for the deficiencies of the first two movements. The force and purity of the violins in the opening subject of the adagio merited the warmest eulogium.

The overtures—Weber's Euryanthe and Mozart's Zauberflöte—offered little occasion for criticism. The former is always one of the most irresistible performances of the Philharmonic band. The latter, in spite of the mistaken exaggeration of the sforzandi, on the fourth beat of the first two bars of the subject, in the allegro, was taken in such unusually correct time, and the whole given with such vigour and entrain, that those who remained unmoved must have been either apathetic or hypercritical. The concerto of the evening was the second which Spohr composed for two violins, concertante—a very ingenious and elaborate work, although in some parts lengthy and in others somewhat dry. It was very admirably performed by M. Sainton and Mr. Blagrove, the two principal violins in the orchestra, and received with loud applause. The vocal music was good, but did not excite by any extraordinary degree of novelty. The singers were Misses Stabbach and Poole and Mr. Sims Reeves. Miss Stabbach's first appearance at the Philharmonic Concerts was for herself an event of importance, and for her friends a source of gratification, since she made a decidedly favourable impression. The duet "Ti veggo," from Winter's opera of Proserpina—so like Mozart, who influenced all the serious composers of his time, as Mendelssohn does those of the present day, was charmingly sung by the two ladies; and the fine trio from the last act of Jessonda (too essentially dramatic, however, for the concert-room), in which Mr. Sims Reeves assisted, was equally well done. The scena from Oberon, "Oh, 'tis a glorious Sight"—composed by Weber expressly for Mr. Braham, in place of a far better one originally alloted to the tenor—is simply to be admired as a song of display, since its musical merits are hardly on a par with those of any other important piece in the opera. The singing of Mr. Reeves was of the highest order, and was another proof of the progress this public favourite is making towards the attainment of perfection in his art.

AMERICAN PIANOFORTES.—It is stated in the Report of the Musical Jury at the New York Exhibition, that the value of the pianos manufactured in the United States amounted annually to fifty millions of dollars.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE third season of this new and important society commenced on Wednesday evening, in the large room of St. Martin's Hall. The removal from Exeter Hall was judicious. The new hall possesses sundry important recommendations. In point of appearance it is decidedly the most elegant music room in London. It is also spacious—affording accommodation for nearly 2000 persons. Moreover, it is admirably adapted for hearing, the greatest attention having been paid in the construction to the principles of acoustics. The conformation and dimensions of the platform, also, are worthy of notice, the former being fitly arranged for distributing sound over the entire hall, and the latter exactly suited to the resources of the new Society. Nevertheless, the disposition of the orchestra is going to be entirely remodelled, and a new organ will replace the present temporary one.

The programme of the first concert, with one exception, was irreproachable. The first part was too long, and the violin concerto might have been omitted with advantage. This would have given Mr. H. C. Cooper, one of our most admirable violinists, an opportunity of appearing at another concert in a composition of greater merit and distinction. The Bach selection was also de trop. But who can foresee everything? We are too well satisfied with what has been done by the New Philharmonic Society, and Dr. Wylde, its managing director and originator, to carp at small matters. The following was the order of the selection on Wednesday night:—

PART I.

|---|---|
| Overture (Medea) | Cherubini. |
| Passions-Musik (Selection) | J. S. Bach. |
| Concerto in D minor, Pianoforte, Miss Arabella Goddard | Mozart |
| Aria, "Softly sighs" (Der Freischütz) Mdme. Caradori | Weber. |
| Concerto in D, Violin, Mr. H. C. Cooper | De Beriot. |
| Overture (Ruy Blas) | Mendelssohn. |

PART II.

|---|---|
| Symphony (Eroica) | Beethoven. |
| Aria (Oberon), Herr Reichart | Weber. |
| Overture (Abon Hassan) | Weber. |

Conductor, Herr Lindpaintner.

The band is on the whole as good as ever, although some of the principal stringed instruments were unavoidably absent on Wednesday evening. Their presence was very desirable in Mendelssohn's overture and Beethoven's symphony. The completeness and efficiency of this fine body of instrumentalists, notwithstanding, was manifested from beginning to end. Nothing could surpass the fire and impetuosity with which the overture to Ruy Blas was given, while the power displayed in the symphony was immense. In another way, the band was equally praiseworthy. The concerto was accompanied to perfection, the most delicate nuances and pianissimos being rigidly observed.

Here is the place to congratulate Dr. Henry Wylde and the New Philharmonic Society on the re-engagement of Herr Lindpaintner, who, last season, did such good service, and proved himself one of the very best of living conductors. The public were not forgetful of Herr Lindpaintner, who was cheered heartily on his appearance in the orchestra, and rewarded with a genuine "ovation" at the conclusion.

The concerto of Mozart was the great feature of the performance. It is a masterpiece of a great master, and requires a kindred spirit to interpret it. Miss Arabella Goddard—who attempted a work of Mozart's for the first time in public—had already eminently distinguished herself in the most elaborate compositions of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and others. That she found Mozart equally congenial to her, may be inferred from her performance on Wednesday evening. Force, brilliancy of finger, and thorough command of the instrument, every body looked for from Miss Goddard; but the feeling, delicacy, sentiment, and freedom from affectation she displayed, were the secrets of her success. The effect she produced was unmistakeable. The Daily News thus gracefully alludes to her performance:—

Digitized by Google

"Mozart's concerto in D minor, played by Miss Arabella Goddard, was the most delicious treat of the evening. It is a perfect chef-d'œuvre of beauty and simplicity, full of animation, yet breathing the very soul of tenderness. To the hearer it seems plain and easy; but to the player it is full of difficulties, for its very simplicity and clearness of style demand the utmost finish and refinement. The young pianist never played more charmingly. Her liquid, pearly touch, her light and brilliant articulation, her vocal tone in the cantabile passages, and the grace and expression which she threw into every phrase, made her performance altogether exquisite."

If anything could add to the force of such a tribute, it would be the following from the Morning Post :—

"To Miss Arabella Goddard's rendering of Mozart's fine concerto, unqualified praise may be awarded;—that it was perfect, from first to last, is the least, though the most, that can be said of it. We cannot, therefore, select the delivery of any movement or passage for special eulogy. The audience felt as we did, and their enthusiastic applause unmistakeably stamped this as the most successful instrumental performance of the evening."

Miss Goddard introduced the fine cadenzas of Hummel, her execution of which was truly remarkable. At the end of the performance she was unanimously recalled and applauded.

As the Bach Society is about to present the whole of the music of the Passions (of St. Matthew) to the public, we shall refrain from saying anything at present of the selection given on Wednesday night; such elaborate music is not to be judged at a single hearing. The execution was highly creditable. Herr Reichart, in a most trying and difficult tenor solo, proved himself a thorough artist, and M. Barret, in an almost impossible oboe obbligato, won the admiration of the room by his finished and artistic playing.

The vocal music was good. Mdme. Caradori's singing in the famous scena from Der Freischütz was first rate, and her success complete. This lady will be remembered as the prima donna in Mr. Jarrett's company at Drury Lane, last autumn. Herr Reichart was equally successful in the original tenor air from Oberon, which, at Mr. Braham's request, Weber replaced by the well-known "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight." Mr. H. C. Cooper played De Beriot's hacknied concerto admirably—better, indeed, than such a composition deserved. The overtures of Cherubini and Weber—the one to a tragic, the other to a comic opera—were capitally performed by the band under Herr Lindpaintner's energetic direction, and were the more interesting from their being so rarely heard.

Altogether, the opening concert of the New Philharmonic Society was calculated to sustain its well earned reputation. Among the audience, which entirely filled St. Martin's Hall, were a great number of eminent amateurs and professors, all of whom seemed to be well pleased with the concert.

LIVERPOOL (Thursday)—From our own Correspondent.—A performance of Elijah, at cheap prices, took place at the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday evening, and attracted a large audience to the galleries. The vocalists were Miss Stott, Mrs. Scarisbrick, Mr. Millar, and Mr. Armstrong. The chorus monopolised the plaudits of the audience. The directors have announced a performance of the Messiah, on the 4th of April, when the public will be admitted to the stalls and galleries for a shilling. The singers will be the same; Mr. George Hirst at the organ; Mr. Sudlow, conductor; and a chorus of two hundred. The next Subscription Concert of the Philharmonic Society is on the 18th of April. Mdme. Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves will sing. The programme will include the finale to Mendelssohn's Lorely, and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.—The annual performance of the Literary and Dramatic Society will take place next month, the proceeds to be devoted to the London fund in aid of the widows and families of soldiers on foreign service.—During the week Miss Anderton has appeared in the tragedies of Evadne and Fazio, at the Royal Amphitheatre, where the Pantomime has been revived, and played nightly to crowded audiences.—The operatic performances at the Theatre Royal present no features which call for particular remark, the operas being well known to our playgoers, while the singing is of that description which requires neither praise nor censure, This remark does not apply to Miss L. Pyne, whose voice and musical skill are as ever—delighting both the amateur and critic. To-morrow (Friday) she plays Amina for her benefit.—The St. John's Choral Society gave a general concert, on Friday evening, in the school-rooms, Birkenhead, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the St. John's National Schools. The performances, which included both sacred and secular music, were under the direction of Mr. Edward Gunton.—Mr. E. L Hime gave his new entertainment, Songs and Sayings of Samuel Lover, at the Concert-hall, on Saturday evening, to a large audience.

DUBLIN.—(From a Correspondent.)—The University of Dublin Choral Society (composed of students belonging to the University here) gave their second concert for the season on Wednesday evening, 15th of March. The orchestra and chorus about 150. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.—Beethoven's "Mount of Olives;" "O Lord have mercy" (Pergolesi); Quartet, "O, remember not the sins" (Battishill); Duet, "Am I a dog?"—David—(Charles E. Horsley); Sanctus et Benedictus—1st Mass—(Mozart).

PART II.—"Lob und Ehre," motet for double choir (J. Seb. Bach), first time in this country; "It is enough"—Elijah—(Mendelssohn); "Save us," Quartet—Widow of Nain—(Lindpaintner); "Ye people," "If with all"—Elijah—(Mendelssohn); Motet (bass solo, choir and orchestra), "Methinks I hear" (Dr. Crotch); Quartet, "The deep repose of night" (Mendelssohn). CHORUSES:—"Moses and the Children of Israel;" "The Lord is a man of war;" "The depths have covered them; "Thy right hand, O Lord;" "The Lord shall reign," &c., &c.—Israel—(Handel).

PETERBOROUGH.—A few weeks since, Mr. Hullah delivered a Lecture on Music in the new Assembly Rooms, to a crowded audience. The vocal illustrations were given by the cathedral choir. Mr. J. Thompson, of the Royal Academy of Music, was introduced to us by Mr. Hullah. Mr. Thompson has since formed a number of classes for singing on the Hullah system. In the course of a few weeks, we may report progress.

PORTSMOUTH.—In this town Three Concerts took place during last week, and were well attended, particularly one given by a committee for the benefit of Mr. Dugan, an artist, who had been ill for many months. The concert was under the direction of Herr Goffrie, from London, and, although the band was small, the ensemble was very effective. The programme included a symphony by Haydn, a string quartet and a trio by Beethoven, and several songs and solos by Miss Galloway, Messrs. Cole, Hiles, Edwards, and Goffrie.

BATH (March 2).—M. Jaques' Annual Classical Chamber Concert took place at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday morning, and was attended by a numerous audience. The quartet players were M. Sainton and Mr. H. C. Cooper (violins), Mr. Hill (tenor), and Signor Piatti (violoncello). M. Jaques presided at the piano. The quartets were Mozart's in D, No. 7, and Mendelssohn's in E flat, No. 1, Op. 12. M. Jaques played one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," and Stephen Heller's "La Truite," and Signor Piatti performed a solo on the violoncello.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.—A professional man in the country (an Associate of the Royal Academy of Music) has a vacancy for an articled Pupil. He would have, in addition to his regular lessons, an opportunity of studying orchestral playing, and of acquiring a knowledge of the retail music business. Address G. B. B., care of Messrs. Boosey and Sons, 28, Holles-street, Oxford-street, London.

RUDALL, ROSE, CARTE, and CO., 100, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, have the honour of announcing that they have been appointed the Sole Agents in Great Britain for the Sale of the SAX-CORNETS, SAXOPHONES, SAX-HORNS, and all other Brass Military Instruments invented and manufactured by M. Adolphe Sax, to whom was awarded the only Council Medal of the Great Exhibition for Military Instruments in Brass, a list of which, with the prices, may be had on application, post free. It will be seen from this list, that M. Sax's Instruments can now be supplied direct from his own Manufactory, at a price not higher than the numerous imitations of them.

ROMAN VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, HARP, AND GUITAR STRINGS. J. HART, of 14, Princes-street, Soho, begs to inform the Amateurs and Professors of the above Instruments, that in consequence of the great demand he has had for his celebrated Roman Strings, he has made arrangements with his string-makers in Rome, to send a fresh consignment every two months, when he hopes for a continuance of that liberal support he has so long enjoyed J. H. has the largest collection of Cremona and other Instruments in England, ranging in price from 1 guinea to 400 guineas. Instruments repaired in the best manner, and taken in exchange. Stewart's celebrated Violin-holder, and all articles appertaining to the above instruments. JOHN HART, 14, Princes-street, Soho.

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTES, with PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, for all Climates, and NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. Pianists, and the Musical World, are respectfully invited to inspect and test these Pianofortes, which have now attained the long-sought properties of permanence, quantity, and quality of tone, standing well in tune, with the most prompt and light touch. The purchasers of Pianos have now the advantage of selecting an Instrument to their own taste, which, being of itself permanent, can be sent to any distance without injurious effects. The great improvements taking place around us in the mechanical arts and manufactures, has rendered it necessary that the Pianoforte should be included in the number. The difficult obstacles to conquer in the making of Pianos is, without doubt, that which results from the pressure occasioned by the extreme tension on the strings, and also from the dryness or humidity of the atmosphere, causing the wood placed at the back to expand, sometimes to unglue, and always to force them to rest upon the sounding-board, rendering the instrument (sooner or later) valueless, and significantly expressed by the common observation of "My Piano has lost its tone!" The defects of the ordinary, inefficient, and too weak construction in wood—or with metallic plates—is completely superseded by WOOLLEY'S PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, FOR ALL CLIMATES. The frame consists of an entire construction of iron, preventing the possibility of the least shrinking in any direction, and producing positive permanence; a frame of wood is also attached to the iron, which gives it the desired quality of fulness, and greatly increased duration. It is obvious that any thickness of stringing can be put on these frames, without fear of giving way—the tone is increased in volume—is rendered perfect in quality—and from the enormous resistance contained in the frame, the strings throw off their "Real Harmonics."—MECHANISM.—THE NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. The power of tone and resistance in the frame, suggests the desirability of a very powerful blow in the hammer. This is completely effected by the "New Royal Victoria Repeat;" the addition to these Pianos having a blow much more powerful than any hitherto produced—combining all the requisites of force, ease, variety of light and shade, superior damping, perfect check, and an untiring repetition, which is produced from an action not likely to get out of order. Mr. Woolley, in drawing attention to the applause which M. Billet elicited at St. Martin's Hall on Tuesday, March 15th, for the beautiful intonation of this instrument, begs to state that M. Billet will again perform on it at his next concerts, Tuesdays, April the 4th, and 11th. These Pianos may be seen and purchased at L. L. Lee's Warerooms, 48, Albemarle-street, London; and all the principal Provincial Towns. Woolley and Co., Patentees and Manufacturers.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends.

A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument.

CLARIONETS,

Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal.

The whole of these comprise every new improvement.

FLUTES AND PICCOLOS,

In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement.

FIFES,
(BOOSÉ'S IMPROVED)

BASSOONS.

The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys.

UNRIVALLED CORNET-À-PISTONS.

The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra.

CORNETTO SOPRANO,
VALVE TRUMPETS,
ALTHORNS (Barytone),
With Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F.
EUPHONIONS (Bass),
In B Flat or C, with Four Valves.
BOMBARDONS (Bass),
In E Flat, or F, with Four Valves.

All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action.

The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide.

FRENCH HORNS

Either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action.

These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.

TROMBONES,
ALTO, TENOR, AND BASS.

In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.

THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION.

With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.

Valve, or Field Bugle,
IN B FLAT OR C.

By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.

OPHICLEIDES,
In B Flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys.

CAVALRY TRUMPETS, TURKISH CRESCENTS,
TRIANGLES,
MILITARY TAMBOURINES,
DRUM HEADS,
REEDS, MUSIC STANDS.
MUSIC PAPER,
And every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.

DRUMS (BASS),
BOOSÉ'S IMPROVED, OF BRASS,

The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad.

Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.

BASS DRUM STICKS.

Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of recovering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER IX.

My readers will not have forgotten that, immediately after his arrival in Paris, Mozart was commissioned to remodel the choruses of a Miserere by Holzbauer, and to write a symphony concertante for flute, oboe, bassoon, and horn; nor will they fail to remember that the first met with Gossec's approval. The second was praised to the skies by the artists for whom it was intended. But, when the day arrived, on which the Miserere was to be performed, Mozart's name did not appear in the bills, and two of the four new choruses were omitted; so that the composer, who had been thus hurried, and, if we may use the expression, chained to his work, had given himself a vast amount of trouble to no purpose. The symphony concertante met with a still harder fate, not being performed at all. Mozart had confided the score to Le Gros, in order that the latter might give it to the copyist. A few days afterwards, Mozart saw it still lying upon the director's table, and subsequently, the evening before the concert, not finding it there any more, searched about and discovered it under a heap of music. Astonished at such a piece of negligence, but without at all manifesting his vexation, Mozart proceeded to the director, and asked him whether he had given out the symphony to be copied. Without offering any excuse, the director replied, "No; I forgot it."

There were still, however, two days, during which this strange instance of forgetfulness on the part of the director might have been remedied. Mozart, not knowing what to think of such a laconic answer, entered the concert-room, at an early hour, when Punto and Ramm rushed up to him in an excited manner, and inquired why the symphony had been erased from the programme.

"I do not know," replied Mozart. "This is the first I have heard of it."

In his letter to his father, he adds:—

"I think that Cambini, an Italian composer here, is at the bottom of this, for I gave him a hard rap the first time we ever met at the house of Le Gros. He has written quartets, one of which I heard in Mannheim, that are very pleasing. I praised them, on the occasion in question, and played the beginning of the one I had heard. Ritter, Ramm, and Punto, who were present, would insist on my continuing and supplying what I did not recollect. I did as they desired. Cambini was quite beside himself, and could not refrain from saying, 'Questa è una gran testa!' (that is a great head!) Now, in all probability, he did not relish my conduct."

The manner in which Le Gros behaved towards a young musician, whose talent and goodwill he could not, for an instant, doubt, certainly appears very remarkable; but is it at all likely that a well-tried artist, and Director of the Concerts Spirituels, should have set on one side the interests of that institution, which were also his own, merely to oblige Signor Cambini, whom he met for the first time in his life? Any one who reflected a single instant—which Mozart never did—would quickly have perceived how untenable was such a supposition. At any rate, Leopold Mozart did not put the slightest faith in it. The old diplomatist saw, in the director's behaviour, an underhand game, played by far more influential personages than the maestrino Cambini. The persons Mozart had to fear were musicians holding lucrative appointments and standing high in the favour of the public—individuals of great reputation, such as Piccini, Grétry and others—who necessarily used their best endeavours to place every obstacle in our hero's way. This was of itself a far more probable supposition than the former, and was rendered still more so by a remarkable circumstance. During the six months Mozart passed in Paris, we do not find that he ever, by any chance, came in contact with Grétry or Piccini. Both, however, must have known him, for they certainly must have heard of the musical prodigy, who, fifteen years previously, had attracted all Paris. Indeed, Mozart and his father, on their first journey to Italy, had even called upon Piccini. Why then, instead of making, or renewing, the acquaintance of so celebrated a brother musician, did these two composers avoid him so carefully that they never met? In addition to this, we know that Grétry did not like Mozart, a fact which is proved by the absurd distinction he afterwards made between our hero and Cimarosa. Cimarosa, he said, placed the statue upon the stage and the pedestal in the orchestra, while Mozart placed the statue in the orchestra and the pedestal upon the stage. When certain apothegms proceed from the mouth of a person of repute, they sometimes succeed in becoming generally known, meeting with public approbation, and even being looked upon as a kind of authority, until some one takes it into his head to test their real worth. We are then astonished to find that the core of these sententious phrases is nothing more than a piece of gross absurdity, an "Irish Bull" in the fullest acceptation of the expression. To this class of sayings does Grétry's antithetical metaphor belong. We could not entirely reject it, or, at best, we should be able to understand it, if applied to certain operas of the present day, in which the voices are evidently sacrificed to the orchestra; but what is the meaning of the antithesis between a statue and a pedestal in the case of Mozart, whose music is more easily sung than that of any other composer, and whose vocal melodies make the greatest impression on the ear, and are recollected longest, because, as a general rule, they are the most natural, clear, and expressive ever written.

It certainly appears probable that Mozart had a great many enemies, secret and declared, among his brother artists in Paris, and we may, also, with a great degree of certainty, presume that a jealous and invisible hand excluded him from the theatre. After mentioning, however, the suppositions to which the matter gave rise both in Paris and Salzburg, I feel bound to add one or two reflections of my own. It strikes me that, without accusing anyone personally, we are in a position to explain, on general grounds, and in a much more satisfactory manner, why Wolfgang failed, and could not do otherwise than fail, in attaining the object of his last journey to France. The newspapers and other public documents of the period prove, in the first place, very clearly, by their silence, that Mozart excited no sensation this time, while, on his first visit, everyone spoke of him most enthusiastically. Were the French of 1763 better musicians than the French of 1778? Decidedly not; on the contrary, they had, since 1763, made some little progress, at least in concert music. They were already moving onward, although so slowly that the fact was scarcely perceptible, and consequently the difference between the two epochs, in this particular, was next to nothing. But there was a great difference with respect to Mozart personally. What had people beheld —I will not say, heard—in the year 1763? A little child, who executed the most extraordinary and surprising tricks upon the piano, playing with a handkerchief over the keys, and putting the most skilful performers to the blush. Then, too, he sang airs with a tiny voice, scarcely audible, and was, in a word, the most charming and best-trained little creature it was possible to behold. All this could not fail of being attractive in Paris. Both the Court and the town were anxious to see the little child who knew so much for his age. He was overwhelmed with presents and marks of attention; his praises were sung both in verse and prose; his portrait was published, as that of the giraffe was, a few years ago, the fame of the animal being quite equal to that enjoyed by our hero; and, in order to infuse still more character into the said portrait, his keeper was added, with his violin in his hand. Under what different circumstances did this curious and amusing little creature appear fifteen years later? He presented himself in the shape of an ill-favoured, small, and weakly young man, who spoke bad French, scarcely knew how to make a bow, never said a civil thing to any one, and possessed only a kind of talent the French public were no longer capable of judging, from a consciousness of which fact, he would, as a musician, have held it beneath him to have had recourse to intrigues, even had he known what intrigues meant. All this could not prove attractive in Paris. Mozart himself felt that he was in a place altogether unsuited to him. It is impossible that any good consequence can ever result from offering the united treasures of the various schools of music to a nation sunk in a kind of musical barbarism. Had the French been only ignorant, matters might have gone on pretty smoothly; they might have been taught better, for ignorance is, in everything, our natural starting point; but their taste was completely spoilt by a system of lyrical declamation, which they defended with sophisms, and to which they were attached by national vanity—in their case, the strongest of all possible bonds. Their ear was irretrievably ruined by the horrible screeching of their singers; and all the elements of the intellectual and social existence of the period, as well as those of true music, contained within themselves the seeds of death. Impious quackery among the great writers, and systematic immorality among the men of rank; a lamentable ignorance of foreign languages and literature; a contempt for all the noble articles of belief, and all durable inclinations, even of love itself, when it did not happen to be of the kind described by Buffon—in a word, disbelief, frivolity, and a state of half-ignorance, guided public opinions and morals. It is naturally not my purpose to add another tirade to the innumerable diatribes already existing against the France of the eighteenth century; I merely mention these too well known truths, on account of the accidental, but most important, influence exercised by them on the subject of my book. The spirit of philosophy swept like a pestilential blast over the Fine Arts, especially music. When men assert that they do not believe in God; when, on viewing the great scenes of Nature, their minds only perceive so many chemical combinations, and are not instantly penetrated with the elevated and religious poetry pervading such scenes—in a word, when conviction rejects all truths that cannot be mathematically proved—when this, I say, is the case, what influence can be exerted over such men by music, which proves nothing?

There is one objection which I feel assured will be raised. I shall be told that Gluck, who was a very great dramatic composer, and Piccini, who also possessed great talent, owed their fame more especially to the approbation of the Parisians and the particular epoch of which we are speaking. This is perfectly true, but what is the conclusion to be drawn from it? Are we to suppose that similar success and similar triumphs would have fallen to the lot of Mozart, had he remained in Paris? Such would never have been the case; and, to convince ourselves of the fact, we need only refer to the history, of the celebrated contest between the "King's Corner" and the "Queen's Corner,"* to obtain an idea of the immense difference between Mozart and the two composers whose successor he would have been. As a general rule, the French like music just as young people like dancing —as a means and an opportunity—but not as an end. They are much fonder of speaking, writing and quarrelling about it, than composing and hearing it. There were then two opposite parties, one ranged under the national banner of Rameau and Lully, and the other under the foreign standard of Pergolese. Each party accused the other of ignorance, and, as this accusation was but too true in the cases of both, certain literary men went a step further, and proved that it was not necessary to understand music in order to criticise it. What is there which cannot be proved! This theory, which, since then, has always found supporters, was adopted, with a cry of joy, by a number of volunteers, neither judges nor lovers of the art, who swelled the ranks of both armies—so ready is the warlike spirit of the French to burst forth on every occasion. The fashionable, as well as the learned world, took part in the strife. Meanwhile, Gluck arrived in Paris, and was immediately followed by Piccini. The former was patronised by the Court, and more especially by Marie Antoinette, whose master he had been. The celebrated authors of the day, and all who enjoyed the reputation of being nice judges of music, ranged themselves on the side of Piccini. In this manner, Gluck and Piccini became, without perhaps wishing it, the representatives, or, rather, the instruments, of the two contending parties. Gluck's music was looked upon as the most perfect model of the French style—which it really was. Elevated to the position of party-leaders, these two musicians were justified in believing that they would meet with every success—or, to speak more correctly, their success was already assured, from the fact of their being thus selected, whatever the intrinsic or comparative value of their productions. But this was, in truth, the last thing about which people troubled themselves. The two parties had an opportunity of quarrelling, hurling epigrams, and launching sarcasms and insults at each other; they could talk—talk a great deal—talk continually—without being obliged to come to an understanding. This was their great object. In France, where so many persons possess wit, or where, at least, every one wishes to do so, the position of such as are deficient in this quality (and, unfortunately, they everywhere form the majority) is, indeed, a sad one. Plagued with an amount of vanity, long proverbial throughout Europe, the French feel extremely ill at ease when they have no subject on which to satisfy their ruling passion. For this reason, factions and parties have always increased quickly in France, men of mediocre abilities, or of none at all, joining them in great numbers, and with their whole heart and soul. When a person espouses a party he is considered, at least, as somebody; the emptiest head counts as one among his brethren and friends, as he would in a flock of sheep. Such being the state of matters, we may easily imagine with what headlong eagerness whole multitudes of idlers, crushed beneath their own nonentity, turned their attention to a controversy which offered them a chance of obtaining a certain amount of importance either as Gluckists or Piccinists. Their folly was, in this instance, at least, attended by one good result—it obtained honour and money for two artists, who, perhaps, with no assistance but that of their talent, would never have enjoyed either the one or the other.

It is very evident that such a series of events could not again occur for the benefit of Mozart. He possessed no patrons among the influential classes of that period; I mean the courtiers and men of letters. There were neither particular classes nor individuals whose self-love rendered it necessary for them to speak well of him or adopt his cause. Mozart, as my readers are by this time well aware, was certainly the man most incapable of serving a party. What could be done with a bumpkin who invariably spoke the truth, and despised quackery no less than he hated cabals? He would most unbecomingly have ridiculed those clever people who every day, from their musical professor's chair, uttered apothegms such, for instance, as: *The musical period is the daughter of ignorance and bad taste. Besides this, every party, with its leader, always represents an opinion—a doctrine already established and known. Thus, for instance, the names of Gluck and Piccini represented respectively the French and Italian operas, the only systems of theatrical composition then existing in the world, for the German opera was not yet born. The works of these two masters, placed in opposition to each other, plainly showed the difference between their two schools. Beauties and faults thus attracted greater attention, and afforded, every day, new proofs for the orators of both Corners. As a natural consequence, the strife increased in warmth and interest, and the more this was the case, the better for Gluck and Piccini. I must here remark that, in spite of the ignorance with which the majority of the French public might justly have been accused, there were persons perfectly competent to decide upon the merits of the rival musicians. Gluck's style, although far more elevated than that of the native composers, was, I repeat, altogether French, never offending the partiality shown by the whole nation for declamatory and boisterous effects.

With regard to the Italian style, an exclusive taste for this proves nothing but an inferior degree of cultivation of the ear. After national songs, marches, and dances, Italian opera can be more easily understood than any other, and is, for this very reason, the kind of composition that meets most speedily with applause. There were many Frenchmen at that period capable of understanding thus much.

What opinion, what peculiar kind of taste, what system could Mozart have represented? What had he to offer beyond himself—that is, the only true music, of which no one knew anything? What, for instance, would the French of 1778 have said, on hearing an opera like Idomeneo? Music of this description would have sounded like so much Hebrew in the ears of Frenchmen of the eighteenth century.

Many years were destined to elapse ere Mozart should succeed in gaining the approbation of the countries beyond the Rhine and the Alps. He had long slept his last sleep, ere his name and works were allowed to take their place with those of Haydn. It was necessary that the finest musical institution of the world, the Conservatory, should first bear fruit—that the national taste should gradually be purified by the works of Dalayrac, Méhul, Berton, Boieldieu, Nicolo and Spontini—that, above all, true criticism, in other words, criticism founded upon positive knowledge of composition and execution, should force its way into the public papers, before the good cause could completely triumph among this dilatory nation. It was only, to the best of my recollection, as recently as the year 1805 or 1806, that managers began to give Mozart's operas in Paris. But what acts of barbarism accompanied the first applause bestowed by France on our hero's genius! What mutilations, and what lamentable alterations were made in the Zauberflöte to adapt it to the stage of the Grand Opera! Words were added, without the least connection with the original text, and consequently with the music; one of the principal personages, the Queen of Night, together with the most brilliant part of the vocal music, was entirely omitted; duets were changed into trios, and many pieces either omitted altogether, or their places filled up from the works of other composers. In this form was the Mystères d'Isis, or, as certain wits entitled the opera, Les Misères d'Isis, produced.* But even this is nothing compared to an act of Vandalism calculated to make the hair of every lover of music stand on end. We all know Sarastro's air: In diesen heiligen Hallen, the characteristic beauty of which is completed by an imitative bass. Instead of this marvellous arrangement, the basses take the B several times. O tempora, O mores! At present, this is somewhat altered. In no place in the world would a mere botcher now dare to meddle with a score of Mozart.

Under such circumstances, France necessarily disappointed

* La Harpe, Cours de Littérature.

* The Zauberflöte used to be given in Paris, as late as the year 1827, and, for aught I know, until a still more recent period, under the title of Les Mystères d'Isis. The mise-en-scène was also the same as Herr Oulibicheff informs us it was in 1805 or 1806. The French had, therefore, not advanced a single step in twenty years. Whoever was unfortunate enough to see the opera in its mutilated form, will readily own that the change of Mystères into Misères, by the substitution of an i for a y and the omission of the t, was perfectly justifiable. Weber's Der Freischütz, under the title of Robin des Bois, was nearly, although not quite, as badly treated, by being likewise miserably patched up.—A Schraishuon.

all Mozart's hopes, as the countries of Germany had done, when their princes disdained his services. The promised land he was fated never to discover. His promised land was the men of the nineteenth century. His earthly pilgrimage would have led him thither after the lapse of four-and-forty years; when a generation composed entirely of scholars, educated by himself, would have awaited the great master upon the threshold of our own age. To use the words of Haydn, "Kings and nations would have contended with each other for the possession of such a treasure." For a long, long time, would he have beheld the never-ending ranks of his admirers flocking to the spot selected by himself as a place of residence. Every musician and every lover of music would have wished to visit the musical Mecca. Even at the present day,* it would have been possible for us to bow before his old age, crowned with the respect of the Universe. Many men born before him, and who have lived for no purpose, still exist! But I am allowing myself, like so many other writers, to be carried away by thoughtless regret and foolhardy murmurings, entirely forgetting that He alone who gave us Mozart knows on what conditions it was possible.

* Mozart would now have been 91. Herr Oulibicheff, however, wrote this passage several years ago.—A. Schraishuon.

MADEMOISELLE SIONA LÉVY.

Among the foreign artists who intend to pass the current season in London, it is probable that the lady above named will excite a more than ordinary degree of public attention. Although Mdlle. Siona Lévy has never previously visited England, she enjoys a high reputation on the continent. It is not merely the greatness but the entire originality of her talent which commands the admiration of her hearers. She recites scenes in the French language, from the tragedies of the great masters, Racine and Corneille, and from the immortal comedies of Molière, with a high sense of their poetical meaning, and an energy and variety of expression which confer a peculiar charm on her declamation, and never fail to captivate her hearers. At Paris, Mdlle. Siona Lévy created almost a new sensation; and in the soirées de musique et de déclamation organised by Herr Ernst, the eminent violinist, in the principal towns and cities of the south of France, Switzerland, and more lately in Rhenish Germany, her recitations were everywhere received with enthusiasm. In aristocratic circles she has been welcomed with the liveliest sympathy. The Grand Duchess Stephanie, of Baden, and the courts of Darmstadt and Stuttgart conferred on her the most distinguished marks of favour.

At the age of fourteen, Mdlle. Siona Lévy gained the first prize for declamation at the Conservatoire in Paris. Two years later, she made her début with success at the Théâtre Français, where Mdlle. Rachel held undisputed sway; and for two years more she sustained the post of première tragédienne at the Odéon, the second Théâtre Français, with a talent which won for her the unanimous suffrages of the public. In spite of her successes, however, Mdlle. Siona Lévy has abandoned the stage, in order to devote herself entirely to her new profession. When it is stated, in conclusion, that she is in her twenty-second year, and is endowed with a more than ordinary share of personal attractions, a brilliant career may be safely predicted for her.

Mr. Farquharson Smith, the barytone, has left England for a tour of some months in Italy.

MISS BIRCH'S CONCERT.

St. Martin's Hall promises to become fashionable. It has many advantages. The rent is low, the accommodation large, and the acoustical conditions admirable. Moreover, while the public is compelled to pay half-a-guinea, in Hanover Square, for a seat in any part of the room, the visitor to St. Martin's Hall may select a place according to his means, and pay one shilling or seven shillings, whichever he pleases. The extravagant charges at benefit concerts of the first class prevents any but the friends and patrons of the concert-giver—who are annually taxed to pay very high for an entertainment of little value—from attending. This system, St. Martin's Hall bids fair to upset. If an artist gives a concert there, his friends can still support him by taking the best places, while the general public have also the option of assisting, at a moderate entrance fee. The prices to Miss Birch's concert, on Tuesday evening were—stalls, seven shillings; galleries, half-a-crown; area, one shilling. Miss Birch had thus three distinct audiences, and the Hall was crowded in every part. Exclusiveness and monopoly are on their last legs.

Miss Birch provided a remarkable programme. The tastes of all her patrons were consulted. We set our face against a concert made up entirely of popular pieces; but on the present occasion almost every morceau was either a novelty or little known. The programme was bold and varied, though certainly too long by one-third. It was as follows:—

Part I.—Overture—Coriolanus, Beethoven; Scene—From Semele, Miss Birch, Miss Dolby, and Mr. Weiss; (Recitative, Air, Recitative, Air, Recitative, Duet), Handel; Sonata—F sharp Minor, Op. 81, Herr Pauer, Hummel; Aria—"Deh! Parlate!" Il Sacrifizio d'Abramo, Miss Birch, Cimarosa; Selection—From Joseph—(Overture, Romance, Mr. Augustus Braham; Duet—Madame and Mr. Weiss; Romance—Miss E. Birch; Trio—Miss Birch, Mr. Herberte, and Mr. Weiss; Finale—Principals and Semichorus) Méhul.

Part II.—Overture—The Isles of Fingal, Mendelssohn; Song—"Oh! would I were yon Silver Beam," Miss Dolby, Silas; Song—"The Child and the Old Man," Mr. Augustus Braham, Hullah; Duet—MS., Miss Birch and Miss Eliza Birch, S. Waley; Sestet, E minor—Pianoforte, Oboe, Horn, Flute, Violoncello, and Double Bass, Messrs. Osborne, Nicholson, Mann, Rochester, Lucas, and Howell, Osborne; Song—"Day and Night," Miss Dolby, Hatton; Méditation sur le 1er Prélude de J. S. Bach, Gounod. Violin, Mr. Blagrove; Organ, Mr. Hopkins; Pianoforte, Herr Pauer; Spring Song—Miss Birch, Mendelssohn; Finale—Don Giovanni (including the three movements usually omitted in dramatic representation), Mozart; Miss Birch, Miss E. Birch Mrs. Weiss, Mr. Herberte, Mr. Bodda, Mr. Walworth, and Mr. Weiss.

The two overtures might have been more happily contrasted; but both are true to nature. The temper of Coriolanus was akin to the wild storms of the Hebrides. The band was both numerous and efficient, and comprised some of our best executants. The musical scene from Semele was highly interesting. Sweeter music for the chamber could not be heard, but we doubt its fitness for the stage. Méhul's Joseph, which was produced at the Opéra Comique, in Paris, may be entitled sacred music disguised. It is more dramatic than Handel's, but still not thoroughly fitted for operatic representation. The airs are flowing and melodious.

Hummel's Sonata—or, more properly, Sonata-Fantasia—is very difficult, and requires great manual dexterity. Herr Pauer played it very finely. The fine recitative and air from Cimarosa's neglected and almost forgotten sacred work was admirably declaimed and sung by Miss Birch, who was loudly applauded at the conclusion. Mr. Hullah's clever song—from his opera, The Village Coquettes—was well sung by Mr. Augustus Braham, and was heard with great interest. Mr. Silas's romanza is extremely graceful, and was very charmingly sung by Miss Eliza Birch, who is one of our most agreeable concert sopranos. The duet of Mr. Waley, which has considerable merit as a composition, was given to perfection by the two sisters. In Mr. Hatton's song, Miss Dolby displayed her accustomed taste and feeling. Of M. Gounod's attempt to "gild refined gold, and add a perfume to the violet," we have spoken already, and a second hearing confirms us in our first opinion. It is a thoroughly French tune forced into company with a thoroughly German prelude. Mr. Blagrove played it very chastely, and was encored. Mr. Osborne's sestet is the work of a well-practised musician. The execution, by himself and his coadjutors, was beyond reproach. Of the four movements we prefer the scherzo in B minor, which is striking and ingenious; but every movement possesses interest, and the instruments are all provided with most effective and congenial passages. Mendelssohn's lovely song was given with genuine spirit by Miss Birch, who has seldom sung more artistically than on this occasion. The finale to Don Juan, with the three omitted movements, retained the majority of the audience to the end. It was on the whole well executed; but we should be better enabled to judge of its effects on the stage than in a concert room. Don Giovanni, like Guillaume Tell, is doomed to suffer from the hands of uncompromising curtailers. When will a manager have the courage to present them to the public in their integrity?

The audience were well pleased with the concert, and liberal in their applause of Miss Birch and her fellow-artists. Mr. Hullah conducted throughout.

HARMONIC UNION.

A PERFORMANCE of Elijah was given at Exeter Hall, on Monday evening, in aid of the funds of the Middlesex Hospital, by the members of the Harmonic Union, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. Her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and several of the Royal Family, together with a long list of nobles and fashionables, patronised the concert. Since the year 1808, when a miscellaneous concert took place on behalf of the charity at the King's Theatre, which realized £2,498 2s., we believe no musical entertainment had been given in aid of the funds. Before that time, the performances at Westminster Abbey were of essential service to the Hospital, and to these may be attributed the origin of the "Handel Ward." The Middlesex Hospital is one of the most beneficial institutions in London; it has the strongest claims upon the public, and well merits the consideration of the charitably disposed. At present, its funds are inadequate, and it requires £5,000 yearly, from voluntary contributions, to maintain it effectively.

The performance of Elijah on Monday evening, we are happy to record, was entirely successful. The attendance was very large, and upwards of £1,200 will be paid into the charity, after all expenses are defrayed. We have seldom heard Elijah go better. The principal vocalists were Misses Louisa Pyne, Dolby, Stabbach, Messent, Laura Baxter, Messrs. Sims Reeves, J. A. Novello, Smythson, and Signor Belletti. All the artists exerted themselves with two-fold zeal in the cause of charity. We have heard no finer singing, than that of Mr. Sims Reeves, on Monday evening, in the tenor part of Elijah: it was really superb. Miss Pyne was also admirable; Sig. Belletti, pains-taking, efficient and improving; and Miss Dolby nothing short of perfect. "O rest in the Lord," from the lips of that charming singer, is truly "comfort administered by an angel."

No small share of the excellence of the general performance was due to Mr. Benedict, who is indefatigable in his exertions to sustain the growing reputation of the Harmonic Union. The choruses were sung with grand effect, and the band was irreproachable. The performance, altogether, was the best ever given by the Harmonic Union.

MR. E. L. HIMS has been giving Mr. Lover's new entertainment at Leamington and Liverpool, with great success. He is engaged for a series of performances during the forthcoming season.

JULLIEN'S SLEIGH-RIDE.—"A young gentleman of a rather affectionate turn of mind was there, it seems, with his sweetheart. The hall being excessively crowded, he was obliged to put his arm on the back part of the seat; consequently almost around the lady. During the excitement of the Sleigh-ride Polka, he unconsciously squeezed his fair partner a little. The lady was of course much shocked, and demanded the reason of such unwarranted rudeness. The gentleman made a thousand apologies, saying he must certainly be insane, or else he had been carried away by the truthfulness of Jullien's music, and merely put his arm in that position to prevent her falling out of the 'sleigh.'"—Cincinnati Paper.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

HERR ERNST appeared on Thursday night, for the first time since the season of 1851. The name of this great violinist has always been a sure attraction at the concerts of Mr. Ella, and the audience was the most crowded and fashionable since the commencement of the Musical Winter Evenings. The programme included two of those quartets which are the best calculated to display with effect the prominent qualities of Herr Ernst's playing—Mendelssohn's in E minor, Op. 44, and Beethoven's in E flat, No. 10. Although entirely opposed to each other in style and in plan, they both belong to that class in which music may be said to speak in the loftiest accents and with the largest variety of expression. Both were written when the genius of their composers was in its vigour, and their talent in its maturity. Both, in short, are masterpieces, in which the art of music is carried to its furthest limits.

The admirers of Herr Ernst—and how many are they?—will be pleased to hear that he was never in finer play than on Thursday night. The first movement of Mendelssohn's quartet was given with such fire and impetuosity that the audience were enraptured. The scherzo—a thing "whose path is the lightning's," which seems to be over almost as soon as it begins—was encored unanimously. Mr. Ella's audience, though distingué, and composed for the most part of connoisseurs, are cold and not addicted to encoring. They could not resist, however, the inspired playing of Ernst, who seemed to invest his associates with the flame that burned within himself. It was not four players, but one—Ernst, Goffrie, Hill, and Piatti, like fire, water, earth, and air, the elements, combined in one harmonious whole—"the music of the spheres." This will sound rhapsodical—but only to those who did not hear this marvellous scherzo, and its marvellous performance. The divine melody of the andante was sung as Herr Ernst can always sing, and the delicate and elaborate part for the second violin was extremely well played by Herr Goffrie. About the finale—one of the fiercest and most ungovernable prestos, even of Mendelssohn, the king of quick movements—we can only say, that it was as perfectly executed as the rest of the quartet. The work of Beethoven—the first immediately succeeding the "Rasumoffsky" set, the bridge from the last of those to the wild and mysterious and entirely Beethovenish quartet in F minor (No. 11)—was nobly performed throughout. In short, the "most poetical of fiddlers" was in his best mood, and could have played on till the next morning without tiring either himself or his auditors. Herr Ernst introduced, as a solo, his own pathetic Elégie, which, as usual, he played with exquisite feeling and pathos. The evening was one long triumph for him. He never played better, and was never more thoroughly understood.

A new pianist, Herr Klindworth, a pupil of M. Liszt, made his début on this occasion. He played twice—Beethoven's sonata in C (No. 2 of the Haydn set), and a fantasia by M. Liszt, on the two themes of Mendelssohn's Wedding March in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Herr Klindworth is evidently young, and at present his talent does not look very promising. He exhibits the faults of his master with none of his beauties. He thumps the instrument with right good will, and is by no means exact in his execution. His mechanism, indeed, is very defective; and this was even more clearly shown (less clearly, if you please), in the fantasia of Liszt, which is one of the most difficult, and at the same time one of the most incoherent and unmeaning bravura pieces to which we ever listened. Liszt must have had some spite against Mendelssohn when he wrote it. There should be some heavy tax upon these fantasia-makers, to prevent them from mangling and caricaturing the works of great masters. We did not like Herr Klindworth's reading of Beethoven's sonata. It was exaggerated in expression, and incorrect. The best points were the scales in sixths and thirds, which are the prominent features in the theme of the finale; these were well and crisply executed; but all the rest was "leather and prunella." Mr. Ella has not been fortunate in his new protégé. He could have found a great many more legitimate and even skilful players at the Royal Academy of Music, in Tenterden-street. We are sorry for Mr. Ella, and still more so for Herr Klindworth; but we must speak the truth.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

The second concert of the eighth season took place on Monday evening, when the Hanover Square Rooms were crowded by a brilliant audience.

The concert began with a very spirited, and on the whole extremely clear performance of Mozart's Symphony in D, the one without a minuet, and the grandest of the three which the great composer wrote in that key. In such works as these the amateurs are quite at home, and have little to learn from the musicians. The symphony was followed by Beethoven's "Adelaida," played by Mr. A. A. Pollock on the oboe, in a style that would have done credit to the most accomplished performer of that difficult instrument. His expression was chaste, without being deficient in the warmth of sentiment that naturally suggests itself in that beautiful love-song. Mr. Pollock was encored in his performance, and most deservedly. The first part finished with the dashing overture to Auber's Cheval de Bronze, another piece in which the "gentlemen" are almost a match for the "players."

The second part began with a remarkably clever composition by Mr. St. Vincent Jervis, a pupil of Herr Molique, and one of the best informed musicians in the ranks of the Amateur Musical Society. This was an adagio and rondo for pianoforte and orchestra. In the adagio there are some graceful thoughts; but, on the whole, we prefer the rondo, which is extremely spirited, and, moreover, effectively written for the pianoforte. The instrumentation of both movements does credit to Mr. St. Vincent Jervis, and shows that he has studied the orchestra with attention and with profit. Though it is to be presumed from the style of his writing that the composer must himself be a good pianist, Mr. Jervis did not come forward as the executant, but found an admirable substitute in Mr. Lindsay Sloper, who played the Adagio and Rondo to perfection. As one good turn deserves another, Mr. Lindsay Sloper should compose a piece for Mr. St. Vincent Jervis to play. It is hardly fair that one who writes with such apparent ease for the pianoforte should not be induced to appear as his own interpreter.

The "Selection" on this occasion was that from Guillaume Tell, one of the ablest and most clearly put together we have heard. The arrangement and instrumentation of this pot-pourri are, we understand, the work of Lord Gerald Fitzgerald. They do infinite credit to that distinguished amateur's knowledge of the orchestra and calculation of effect. The selection was well played, the solos being in the competent hands of Mr. Jekyll (flute), Mr. Tatham (cornet-à-pistons), and Mr. Phasey (sax-tuba.) The famous duet, "Dove vai," was well suited to the two last-named instruments. The difficult overture of Mendelssohn—Die Hebriden, or Fingal's Cave, or Fingal's Höhle, or the Isles of Fingal, as it is variously designated—was an adventurous task for the amateur orchestra. At the beginning, there was a good deal of unsteadiness, and the passages for stringed instruments seemed to puzzle the dilettanti not a little. But, strange to say, the coda, the most difficult part of the overture, and in which the tempo is accelerated, was played, all things considered, with remarkable decision and even with brilliancy, and fairly made up for the rest.

The concert terminated with the march from Robert Bruce—a part of the finale to La Donna del Lago, in which the soldiers and the bards unite their voices in combination, each singing a different theme. Altogether the entertainment was a good one, and the audience seemed highly pleased. Mr. G. A. Osborne conducted the whole performance with his usual ability.

Mr. Charles Salaman's Pianoforte Soirées.—The last of these evenings came off on Tuesday last, when Mr. Salaman presented his visitors with an excellent and well varied programme. The special pieces were Spohr's quintet in C minor, Op. 53, for pianoforte, two violins, tenor and violoncello; Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata for pianoforte and violin; and F. Ries's quartet in E flat (Op. 17), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello. The executants with Mr. Salaman were Messrs. Cooper, Watson, R. Blagrove and Hancock. Ries's quartet was repeated by particular desire, so great was the effect produced at the last concert. Mr. Salaman sustained the pianoforte part, and played with great ability. The entire performance was exceedingly good, and was received with marked favour. Not less worthy of praise was the sonata of Beethoven, which was performed by Messrs. Salaman and H. C. Cooper. The Brothers Holmes played one of Spohr's duets for violins, with great spirit and precision. Mr. Salaman's pianoforte solos were confined to two graceful bagatelles of his own composition—"La Poveretta" and "Saltarella." The vocalists were Miss Ellen Williams, Mdlle. Hermann, and Herr de Becker. The first named lady sang Mr. Salaman's new sonnet, "Oh! I have lov'd Thee," with excellent effect, besides a ballad, "There's not an Accent," also by Mr. Salaman. Herr de Becker gave a German lied, by the same prolific composer. The rooms were filled by an elegant audience.

London Institution.—A course of six lectures on Chamber Music was commenced at the room of the above Institution, on Monday, the 13th instant, by Mr. William Henry Monk, director of the choir in King's College. The lecture, which comprises a variety of interesting topics connected with this particular branch of the art, was illustrated by the performance of a number of examples on the pianoforte. M. Alexandre Billet—engaged for three lectures—played, at the first, a movement from Scarlatti, one of the earliest writers for the clavier, (in A major); the first movement of Bach's Suite Anglaise (D minor); Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," (air varié from the Suite de Pièces in E) and a Passe Caille in G minor; a sonata in F by Paradies; andante, and finale from Bach's sonata in A, for pianoforte and violin. At the third lecture, on Monday last, at which Beethoven and Mendelssohn constituted the main subjects, M. Billet performed Beethoven's sonatas in F minor, (Op. 57) and A flat (Op. 26), and Mendelssohn's No. 4 of the first Book of the Temperaments (seven characteristic pieces—Op. 7); fugue and prelude in A flat (from the Six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 33) and two Lieder ohne Worte. The lectures of Mr. Monk display a great variety of information, conveyed in a manner both instructive and entertaining. They have been highly successful. Mr. Monk could not have chosen a more competent "interpreter" than M. Alexandre Billet.

Mdlle. Herrmann's first Soirée Musicale took place on Thursday at the Réunion des Arts. In Mozart's air, "Zeffiretti," two songs by Schubert and Praeger, Benedict's Duo from the Gipsy's Warning, Beethoven's trio "Tremate," and "Vaga Vaga," by Campana, she proved herself a clever vocalist, and deserving the applause she received. Mdlle. Amedei sang "In si Barbara," and assisted in the concerted music with Herr Kinnpel, a German tenor. Herr Reichardt was encored in Marschner's song, "A Kiss," and also sung in Benedict's duet. The instrumental performances were F. Praeger's Trio in C minor, of which we lately gave a very favourable opinion, and which was effectively performed by the composer, assisted by Herren Jansa and V. Gelder. The latter gentleman played a solo on the violoncello, to the great satisfaction of the audience. Madlle. Verdavaine performed Beethoven's Sonate Pathétique on the pianoforte, and Messrs. Mori and Grattan accompanied.

Exeter Hall.—Harmonic Union.—A selection of secular music, including Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, Weber's Preciosa, and Beethoven's Ruins of Athens is announced for performance on Thursday next, April 6th, for the benefit of the wives and families of the soldiers ordered on foreign service.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The first concert for the present season took place on Saturday morning. The Hanover Square Rooms were completely filled with the friends and patrons of the students. The concert was of average interest and the performance of average merit. There were, however, some good points, and these we proceed to enumerate.

Mendelssohn's Rondo in E flat, for pianoforte and orchestra, was played by Miss Cazaly (pupil of Mrs. Kate Loder Thompson) with a spirit and precision indicating promise. Still more decided talent was displayed by Mr. Sharp, who appeared for the first time in public, and performed Mozart's Concerto in A, without book. Mr. Sharp must be praised for playing the concerto without curtailment, for playing it from memory, and for playing it well. He was nervous; but that was excusable. His master, Mr. Cipriani Potter, was the author of the brilliant Cadenza which Mr. Sharp introduced in the first movement, and which he played with less clearness and decision than the rest. Two young ladies—Miss Kate Ranoe, a contralto, and Miss Ellen Williams a soprano (both pupils of Signor Crivelli), made a favourable impression—the first, in the recitative and arioso, "The Lord is mindful of his own" (St. Paul); the last in the recitative and air, "If guiltless Blood (Susannah). Both have good voices, and give cause for hope in their avenir. Miss Freeman (pupil of Sig. Crivelli) continues to improve, but does not get on so fast as was expected from such means as she is endowed with. Her singing of the air from Handel's Theodora, though good on the whole, left something to be desired. A young Italian, Mr. Castellani (Signor Crivelli), though nervous, could not hide the fact of his possessing a very pleasing quality of voice, in "Lord, remember David." On the other hand, Mr. St. Albin, an old pupil of the Academy, was not nervous, and sang the recitative and air, "If with all your Hearts" (Elijah) very sensibly and well. Miss Emily Trickett (Signor Crivelli), in "Oh! rest in the Lord" (Elijah) gave signs of improvement. Miss Murie (Signor Crivelli) attempted Haydn's "On mighty Pens;" but the task was a little beyond her present means. Messrs. Gilbert and Bignell (pupils of Signor Negri) sang Marcello's duet, "Quel anelante," respectably; and as much, and no more, can be said of Miss Hughes (Signor Cruvelli) in "Farewell ye limpid Streams," or of Mr. Bolton (pupil of Mr. Cox) in the bass song "It is enough" (Elijah). Mr. Bolton's vice is not a bass, but a barytone.

A motet (MS.) by Miss Charlotte Rowe, "Behold the Day of the Lord," consisting of a choral recitative, duet, chorale, recitative and solo, and final chorus, was so wretchedly executed by nearly all concerned, that it would be unfair to criticise it. It certainly did not strike us in a favourable light; but that may, in a great measure, be attributable to the chorus and the band, than which nothing could be more slovenly. The soloists, Misses Attfield and Freeman, were better, but still not what might have been desired by Miss Rowe, who should insist upon another chance for her work. Beethoven's first Mass (in C) was given in a singular and unwarrantable manner. The "Kyrie" and "Gloria" were placed at the beginning, the "Credo," at the end, of Part I.; and the "Sanctus," "Benedictus," "Agnus Dei," and "Dona Nobis," at the commencement of Part II. By this arrangement, whatever interest there might be in the music was twice interrupted. This was a very bad example to set the students, to say the least of it. Moreover, the execution of Beethoven's exquisite music was not even indifferent. The solo singers (Misses Vinning, Kate Ranoe, Spiller, and Freeman, Messrs. St. Albin and Bolton—who have both very original-toned voices) were again far better than the chorus and the orchestra, though again not what might have been desired by Beethoven. A searching reform is indispensable, if these concerts are to support the credit and name of the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. Lucas was conductor, and M. Sainton principal violin. The band was not quite so good as last year—the chorus twice as inefficient. Hélas!

New Philharmonic Society.—At the Second Concert, on Wednesday next, Herr Ernst will play Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin.

Exeter Hall.—A concert for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the workmen killed last year at the Crystal Palace is announced for Wednesday night. The performances will be on a grand scale, and some eminent artists have volunteered their services; among others, Mr. Sims Reeves and Miss Arabella Goddard. It is to be hoped that the public will come forward and support so excellent and charitable an object.

Exeter Hall.—Mr. George Case's Concert, on Wednesday night, was an overflow. Every thing went off with spirit, that is to say, as much as could be compressed into the limits allotted by the directors of the Exeter Hall; to whom we are grateful for taking into consideration the somniferous tendencies of our nature as reporters. We are inclined to suggest that the originator of the "limits," a grand idea, must have been a superannuated dramatic critic, alive, if not awake to the comfort of writing a long notice after midnight; at any rate, we are grateful, and like Sancho Panza, exclaim "Blessings on him who invented sleep—it wraps one round like a cloak." We should have had some fifty pieces to examine, but for the intervention of our unknown friends the directors of Exeter Hall, who reduced them to 38, or thereabouts; the whole of which we shall by no means notice. It required no small dexterity in Mr. Case to get through even the reduced quantity. He was here, there, and every where, conducting the orchestra, "doing the civil" to the lady artistes, accompanying at the piano, receiving his friends at the door, urging on the performers with that urbanity for which he is distinguished, smiling on all sides, and on everybody,—in short, ubiquitous. Every thing was taken in its proper order—no easy feat when the convenience of some five and thirty artistes had to be considered. We care not greatly for such musical hodge-podges, in which song follows song, and duet duets, concerted pieces treading on the heels of overtures, while ballads, arias, fantasias, barcarolles and cavatinas flit by us with such rapidity, that, at last, our ears grow so confused, and our eyes so dizzy with the silks and satins of every variety of colour, that our brain reels, and we have no positive recollection of what really goes on. We, however, have a distinct recollection that Miss Arabella Goddard did play Leopold de Meyer's fantasia on Lucrezia Borgia with that delicacy, brilliancy and expression for which she is eminent. She was greeted as an especial favourite, and warmly and loudly applauded on rising from the instrument; and nothing but the immense amount of business on hand could have persuaded the public to refrain from insisting on a repetition. Miss Poole, also a great favourite, sang a ballad by Mr. Knight, "Ellen and Patrick," and was encored. This ballad is very "taking," and the singing was unexceptionable. Mdlle. Rita Favanti sang "Una voce poco fa" and "Non più mesta" with an abundance of clever ornament and floritures. This lady is much improved, and, by restraining her voice within proper bounds, has acquired more command over it. Madame Amedei sang the great contralto air from Semiramide, "In si barbara sciagura," with the right feeling. We thought the first movement too slow; but this may have been the fault of the orchestra, which was at "sixes and sevens" throughout the evening, and had better have been dispensed with. In the allegro Mad. Amedei was warmly applauded. Mad. F. Lablache was highly successful in a pleasing song by Osborne, "The Lord of the Castle," and a grand Sestett was played on three pianos with much precision by Misses Case, Ellen Day, Rosina Bentley, Rogers, Thompson, and Hermann. We must not forget Miss Rebecca Isaac's lively rendering of Panseron's "Tyrol, my Fatherland." The other ladies were Mesdames Weiss, Lascelles, Cicely Nott, Lizzy Stuart, Stabbach, Brougham, Messent, and Ransford. Of the gentlemen, Sims Reeves was, as usual, the favourite. His phrasing in Verdi's scena, "Come rugiada al cespite," from Ernani, was admirable, and the expression he threw into a ballad by Hatton, "Good bye, Sweetheart," excited the enthusiasm of the audience, and elicited an encore which was not to be resisted. Loud cries of "Nelson" were heard, but unheeded by the great tenor, and wisely. Mr. George Case played a fantasia of his own composition on the concertina, which was well adapted to display all the resources of the instrument in such skilful hands. Mr. Augustus Braham gave the Celtic melody, "Oft in the stilly Night," with good expression, and Mr. Frederick Lablache displayed much humour in the buffa aria, "Miei rampolli," from Cenerentola. Signor Noronha played a solo on the violin; but we could scarcely form an opinion of it, so badly was he accompanied by the orchestra. Mr. Henry Distin gave a solo on the Sax Tuba; other morceaux were sung and played by Messrs. Alfred Pierre, Frank Bodda, Cotton, Lazarus, Richardson, Weiss, Frederick Chatterton, Blagrove, Burford, Bertioli, and Ward; but enough is as good as a feast. Suffice it to say that the public were pleased, and were loth to be turned out; although we heard there was a great "row" at the end, for which we did not stay.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 1st, 1854.

The Royal Academy of Music was founded in 1823. It was modelled on the plan of the British Institute for the encouragement of painting. The head patrons were King George IV and the Duke of York. The object professed by the originators was "to promote the cultivation of music among the natives of the country, and to afford the first facilities for attaining perfection in this most neglected branch of the arts to a certain number of pupils"—not to exceed forty males and as many females.

The rules and regulations attached to the Institution at its origin will be found in another column. Our immediate purpose is to allude to that part of them which relates to the concerts. One clause is as follows:—

"There is to be one yearly concert, at which the most proficient students are to perform; the profits of it to go to the funds, except when the students are old enough to leave the school, at which time they will be provided with small portions from the proceeds, to start them in the world. Rehearsals are to precede these concerts, when all the pupils are to be present; and public examinations will be held occasionally, when the most proficient will be rewarded with medals, according to their skill."

The italics are our own. Whether the provision for students leaving the Academy remains in force to the present time, or has been rescinded, we are unable to say; and we have italicised the passage in which it is urged for the sake of calling attention to it. That the four concerts annually given "for the exhibition of the students," are not according to the rule laid down above, which states that "the most proficient are to perform," will at once be admitted. Although many of the "proficient" appear during the season, many more are admitted to "exhibit," who are by no means entitled to be thus denominated. Perhaps, however, the rule is done away with; perhaps, indeed, both rules are quashed; if so, tant pis—since both were calculated to effect real good. If every pupil is allowed to sing or play, whether or not capable of doing either moderately well, the concerts are not likely to give the public and the friends of the institution a very bright idea of the system of education pursued within its walls.

But there is another clause about concerts, which is equally curious and interesting; it is this:—

"In order that the pupils may hear their masters to the best advantage, there will be two grand concerts in the year, in which the professors are to take the lead, and such of the pupils as are capable are to perform—but all the students are to attend. At these concerts, the best productions of the professors are to be performed; and, to assist in the formation of a Musical Library for the use of the students, they will be expected to present to it a copy of each of their publications."

We have not italicised any of the above, because, so far as we can learn, the principle it involves has been lost sight of altogether. This is a pity. Any one who listens to the concerts of the Royal Academy of Music now, and can remember those of from fifteen to twenty years ago, must, in making a comparison between them, be incited to exclaim with Hamlet, "Look upon this picture, and on this!" To account for so great a falling off would be difficult. It is a task, however, we shall feel bound to undertake on some future occasion. The extreme severity with which the Morning Post has criticised the first concert for the present (the thirty-second) season, although it must have given pain and displeasure to the friends and patrons of the Royal Academy of Music, cannot be arraigned as unjust; and herein lies the misfortune. Why should an institution directed to such excellent purposes, and which, no one can deny, has given so many accomplished composers and performers to the world, be exposed to castigation at the hands of the public press? Whose is the fault? And by what means can it be remedied?—for remedied it must be, or the Academy will die a natural death before it has attained its fortieth year; while the considerable influence it has really exercised on the progress of music in this country will count for nothing when weighed in the balance with what it has left undone, and which, under proper management, it might have done so well.

Of the Rules and Regulations which were printed and circulated in 1822, the year previous to the foundation of the new institution, the following is an abstract (the two paragraphs relating to concerts being omitted):—

"This school is to be supported by contributions and annual subscriptions, the subscribers and contributors being divided into four classes—the subscribers of the first class to be governors, having the privilege of being present on all occasions, such as at the concerts, rehearsals, and public examinations of the pupils, and also of introducing two friends on the same occasions: the members of the first, second, and third classes recommend and elect all the students; the subscribers of the first class having three votes each; the second, two, with liberty to introduce one friend on all public occasions; the third, one, with a free admission only for themselves; and the fourth, no vote at any time, but a free entrance at all times. The government of the school is to be by a committee and a sub-committee of directors, the directors, twenty-five in number, being governors; or a president, four vice-presidents, and twenty directors,—the president being annually elected by the directors. He is to preside at their general courts, and, in his absence, a vice is to be elected according to seniority; and no court is competent, unless one of these presiding officers and six directors be present. This court has the power to alter, amend, and add to the bye-laws of the Institution, and is also empowered to nominate a sub-committee out of the three first classes. The funds are to be vested in five trustees.

"The pupils are of three classes. Regular students pay, upon their successful election by ballot, fifteen guineas the first year, and afterwards ten per annum: these must not be younger than ten years of age, nor older than fifteen, and must be capable of reading and writing before they are admitted, and show some aptitude for music, according to the opinions of the professors, and also come decently clothed, as no expense on this head can come out of the funds of the school. The children of professors, when elected, are admitted on paying ten guineas the first year, and afterwards eight yearly. The extra students are of two classes, and require only the recommendation of a subscriber: the first class are to board in the house, and pay twenty guineas per annum, if not the children of professors, when they pay but fifteen guineas yearly; and the second class, who are not boarders, thirty-three guineas. No student to remain in the school after the age of eighteen, unless upon extraordinary occasions, or upon new and separate agreements.

"The students are to be directed in the study of any particular branch of music, by the principal professor, according to the disposition he may observe in them; and, in addition to this particular branch, they will be instructed in harmony, composition, and the pianoforte: they will also receive instruction in the English and Italian languages, and in writing and arithmetic. Instruments, if of difficult purchase, will be provided for them. There will be a monthly meeting of all the students for musical practice, under the principal and professors, when the music selected for performance is to be so easy as to embrace the talents of all the pupils. In contending for prizes, no student who has previously received one, is to contend for a second on the same instrument. Students having won the first prize, when so judged by the principal, are to be elevated into sub-professors; and their payments for instruction will then cease.

"The professors are to instruct each one according to his own system; and the students placed under him are to remain so, while they belong to the school. These masters are to attend twice a-week; or they may appoint under-professors, who are to be selected from among the most forward pupils. Each professor will receive a certain number of pupils, whom he is to instruct to the utmost of his skill, so that they may do credit to the establishment. A quarterly council of the professors will take place, when each one is to give to the principal an account of the progress of his pupils, and make any remarks on their genius and qualifications which he may deem fit to be made known. In addition to the occasional examinations, there will be an annual one, at which the professors are to produce the most proficient of their pupils, when the principal will examine them, and class them accordingly.

"Should an under-professor, instead of a pecuniary recompense for his attendance, desire to take instruction in any other branch than that which he himself teaches, he will be allowed to do so, but not to contend for prizes as a student.

"There will be a board of professors, consisting of five; and, in becoming a member of that board, the professors are expected to contribute all their power to the progress of the establishment; and are to attend on all occasions, or give due notice of their intended absence."

These Rules and Regulations were severely criticised at the time by some of the papers, as may be seen by the following extract from a musical journal which has now long ceased to exist.

"Such are the principal rules of this new institution, and it will be seen that they admit of great evasion, and of numberless abuses. We trust that they will be strictly revised and amended, for there are great contradictions in the laws, which, as they now stand, can never work together. There are likewise many flaws and crevices through which neglect and corruption will enter, and undermine the whole edifice, unless guarded against by more experience than we surmise has been consulted in the formation of the institution. But its immediate existence is threatened, if a report, bruited abroad, respecting the appointment of a most objectionable person to an office in the Academy, turns out to be true. Let us hope that it will be proved to have no foundation, for we are well-wishers to any establishment for the improvement of so fascinating an art as music."

The "objectionable person" alluded to was Mr. Bochsa, the celebrated harpist and composer, who was nevertheless appointed "Principal," and was the predecessor of Dr. Crotch and Mr. Cipriani Potter.

We have much more to say about the Royal Academy of Music, and shall return to the subject very shortly. For the present, we must desist.

SONTAG.

THE following appreciation of this distinguished songstress, written by an eminent connoisseur, in the year 1828, when Mdlle. Sontag first appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, will doubtless be read with curiosity and interest at the present time. The fact that six-and-twenty years have made so little ravages on the intellectual gifts of the artist, and the physical qualities of the woman, will give an additional zest to its perusal.

MADEMOISELLE SONTAG.

"THERE is perhaps no instance within remembrance (except it be in the case of Mrs. Billington) where so much previous promise had been held out, and so much expectation excited, as had been raised by the report of the talents of Mademoiselle Sontag before her arrival in this country. The beauty of her person, the symmetry and captivation of her features, and even the exquisite proportions of her hands and feet, had been extolled as pre-eminent—she was declared to possess all the attributes of a singer in all styles in the utmost perfection—while as an actress she was to be the very personification of grace. Nor was this the whole extent of the exaggerations of friendship or of folly. Stories of the romantic attachments of foreign princes and English lords were studiously invented and sedulously propagated—the damsel was to be exposed for a season to the severe and perilous temptations which must assail so splendid and so attractive an artiste in the voluptuous and profligate capital of France—under these trials she had been watched, and had come out immaculate—she was to be elevated to the loftiest rank—in short, no creature, except in the pages of fairy lore or of the novelist, was ever exalted into so matchless a heroine. All this exaggeration, it is true, was as improbable as it was weak—but as no one gave himself the trouble to extend to these stories even sufficient examination to discover the absurdity, they generated a certain quantity of reliance, which could end in nothing but injury to the distinguished individual and disappointment to the public. It was, however, under these disadvantages that this highly-gifted young lady first appeared in London. She sang at Prince Esterhazy's and the Duke of Devonshire's, before her début at the Opera—but, though those who heard her were better able to appreciate her real merits, the great body of the public remained at their pitch of curiosity and anticipation. The character chosen was Rosina, in Il Barbiere di Seviglia, and never was the King's Theatre more crowded than on the night of the 19th of April. Her reception was rapturous—the audience continued to applaud during several minutes. The demeanour of the débutants, under circumstances at once so trying and so flattering, could but confirm the impression already received, for nothing could be more graceful, while it was marked by the humility of the most grateful acknowledgment.

"We record these facts—not because they are intrinsically combined with the character of Mademoiselle Sontag for science it is our purpose to draw—but because they are intimately connected with those prepossessions which may or may not endure; and since it is hardly possible that subsequent estimation should keep pace with the extravagance of these the first indications of public favour, it is only due to her great abilities to show, that any declension (should it so happen) from this extreme elevation of opinion ought not to be attributed to deficiency of merit, but that it rather proceeds from the pernicious effects of the previous exaltation of that merit, almost beyond human endowment.

"In order to estimate rightly the perfection of any singer, it is perhaps first necessary to consider a little more attentively than has of late been the custom, the attributes and the excellence of style, which has ceased to preserve that distinctness of character that once appertained to each of the several species—for these were marked out by boundaries far more exact than can now be easily ascertained. The operas of Rossini, whether justly or unjustly, have obtained a celebrity so universal, that the instances are very rare indeed where a singer can be tried in the compositions of any other master. We need not say that Rossini has written for effect—that he has extended the musical language and phraseology of passion, so that it mingles and confounds all the several varieties of style, and that divisions or rather multi-plications of passages, which were once confined solely to the display of execution almost without meaning, are now converted into phrases of the strongest expression. By this process, the high affections are no longer characterised by intellectual dignity, by majesty of voice, by sustained power, by sensibility, pathos, and above all, by the simplest grandeur, which used to be considered the chiefest attribute of the great style; these exalted qualities are broken down by the admixture of a facility in execution, which is become even more indispensable than themselves. To demonstrate this truth, we need only cite the serious lyric dramas of Rossini that are most popular—Tancredi, Semiramide, and Otello; but, were further proof necessary, it may be traced in the fact that even Madame Pasta, the finest tragedian that has appeared in our age, finds herself compelled to overlay the simple compositions of Zingarelli and Mayer with modern ornament, and to cultivate execution with nearly as much ardour as the purer elements of the great style. The result is that facility, velocity, and imagination now take a much loftier place in art than was heretofore allotted them, and it also follows that the purer elements of the great style must in the majority of instances be superseded by this lighter manner. The junction of both is all but unattainable, because they imply a contrary and paradoxical direction of the faculties—they are as opposite as judgment and wit. It is, indeed, possible to use execution so cautiously that its possessor may show it is always to be esteemed secondary and applied sparingly, and thus it is that Madame Pasta employs ornament—but though she does all that she chooses to do in a manner that is perfect, yet when we hear such a singer as Sontag we can but perceive that execution may be carried to an extent of which they who have heard only the former can have entertained no sort of idea. And as this faculty is now called into requisition by the composer, it becomes not only more essential but also more universally admitted, and thus there appears, we must not say a greater extenuation, but a greater desire in the public, and a stronger impulsion for the singer to acquire and to employ the power of ornament. Right or wrong—whether art be advanced or reduced by the practice—such we reluctantly allow is the present state of the case—and though we think it is the work chiefly of an individual, namely, of Rossini, it must nevertheless be taken in a good degree to have sprung out of the superior attainments of musicians, both instrumentalists and singers. They have imitated and stimulated each other, and a composer has at length been found to embody and concentrate the improvements of the time, and to push their agency still further, till they seem to have reached a point beyond which it is scarcely possible to proceed. We make this remark, however, with due reservation, when we recollect that such has been the complaining language of critics ever since the days of Palestrina.

We may now come to the particular merits of Mademoiselle Sontag.

The character chosen for her début, Rosina, is not a part in which the higher affections are concerned; but to say that it affords no scope for expression is a false assumption. Rosina gives opportunity for the display of those lighter and gayer emotions and feelings to which a young girl, anxious to escape from the confinement imposed upon her by her guardian to the arms of a lover, is subjected, and these are varied by the surprise, the pleasure, the anxiety, the fear to which the several situations of this comedy of intrigue give rise. Upon the English stage, Rosina would be considered to be a lively and interesting character, and there is no good reason why the same play of fancy and feeling, though not exalted to the highest walk of the drama, not to the most powerful workings of passion, should not enjoy the same interpretation upon the boards of the King's Theatre. Madame Ronzi di Begnis certainly infused expression into both her acting and singing, and her Una Voce was quite as remarkable for feeling as for science and art, of which it exhibited the perfection.

The first and physical impression which Mademoiselle Sontag's voice makes upon the ear, is that of surprise that an organ which appears so limited in its power, and which possesses so little of richness or even of sweetness and brilliancy in its tone, should by any conversion be capable of producing the effects ascribed to it. Such at least was our instant feeling, by which acknowledgment we confess the prepossession which anticipation too highly raised had created. It is a true soprano, and its compass is perhaps from A or B to D in alt. Though uniform in its quality, it is a little reedy at the bottom, and we believe that it does not exceed, if it equals, in its general volume and quality, that of any esteemed singer who has lately appeared. It is more analogous to that of Madame Caradori Allan perhaps than of any other singer, but it is scarcely so pure. So soon, however, as Madlle. S. begins to use that part of the scale which lies between F and C in alt, its rich cultivation is perceptible.

It is here that the brilliancy of the tone, the precision of her intonation, the fertility of her invention, and the facility of her execution, manifest themselves. She differs from her great predecessors, Billington and Catalani, in the extreme lightness and rarity, so to speak, of her evolutions through the mazes of sound. What they effected, the one by volume and the other by force, Mademoiselle Sontag performs with a simplicity and ease that are perfectly captivating. Not only are all passages alike to her, but she has appropriated some that were hitherto believed to belong to instruments—to the pianoforte and the violin, for instance. Arpeggios and chromatic scales, passages ascending and descending, she executes in the same manner that the ablest performers on these instruments execute them. There is the firmness and the neatness that appertain to the pianoforte, while she will go through a scale, staccato, with the precision of the bow. Her great art, however, lies in rendering whatever she does, pleasing. The ear is never disturbed by a harsh sound—the notes trickle and sparkle like the diamond drops of the brightest fountain. Every thing is rendered clear and liquid by solution, and the auditor listens to the melody as he does to the singing of birds, without attempting to appreciate, or, indeed, without caring for the nature of the intervals. The velocity of her passages is sometimes uncontrollable, for we have observed that in a division, say of four groups of quadruplets, she will execute the first in exact time, the second and third will increase in rapidity so much that in the fourth she is compelled to decrease the speed perceptibly, in order to give the band the means of recovering the time she has gained. But reflection is arrested by surprise, while the ear is satiated with the physical delight, for, we repeat, both the captivation of her singing and the superiority lie in rendering all those passages which fix the attention, agreeable, and in making those pleasing, which, when we have heard them from other singers, have inspired only wonder, mixed, perhaps, with sensations never pleasurable, and, in some instances, anything but pleasing. At the same time, all this is effected with an ease that gives the semblance of nature—she appears to sing like a bird, from impulse, and to feel, while she inspires, delight. There is no distortion; not even "the heaving of the bosom" is visible, so that the auditor, though uncertain where the range of imagination and a facility of execution so extended shall next carry him, is never exposed to the least apprehension of a failure. Thus the firmest sympathy is established, and the confidence is never betrayed.

It will be gathered from these the most striking facts attending Mademoiselle Sontag's performance both on the stage, in the orchestra, and in the chamber, that none of the more powerful faculties of the intellect have been called into action. Nature, who generally prescribes a limit to attainment, seems to have denied the qualities necessary to the display of the grander characteristics of style and manner, when she bestowed those lighter fascinations with which this charming artiste is endowed. Mademoiselle S. may unquestionably excel in tenderness and pathos, but all the more majestic and energetic characters are forbidden to her by her youth, the lightness of her figure, and her voice, not less than by the train of study she has pursued. Nor can the judicious direction of her musical education be objected against. The highest praise, perhaps, that can be bestowed, is, in the admission that the track of nature has been followed, and that the powers have been displayed in the manner most likely to lead to the greatest share of success. This praise is certainly due to Mademoiselle Sontag. She has cultivated the imagination and the fancy to a degree they have never reached before—no singer has ever combined so variously, or executed in the light, brilliant, inventive, facile, and, above all, in the pleasing manner she has attained. In these particulars she stands alone.

"For these reasons, perhaps, she is to be esteemed more highly in the orchestra and the chamber than upon the stage—the theatre is the scene for the display of passion. In the chamber and the orchestra the feelings must be restrained, and even subdued. Indeed, nothing more clearly indicates how little susceptible of the finest and deepest expression the orchestra and the chamber can be made, than the comparative failure of Madame Pasta in these situations. The truth is, the sympathy of a mixed audience cannot rise to the strength of the emotion or its expression, unless aided by the illusions of the drama. In the orchestra the eagle is caged, stripped of her plumage, and is fastened to the earth. The facility, the polish, and the beauty of Mademoiselle Sontag's style, on the contrary, is heard to the greatest advantage in this situation. Lord Bacon has asked in his second book upon the advancement of learning—"Is not the delight of the quavering upon a stop in music the same with the playing of light upon the water—

'Splendet tremulo sub lumine pontus.'

The passage occurred to us when we first listened to the glistening ornaments of Mademoiselle Sontag, and the pleasure we felt was precisely like that we have experienced in beholding the ocean resplendent with the rays of a brilliant sunshine. If the mind be not deeply moved, the senses are all filled, and those nameless emotions which play so lightly and coruscate, as it were, from thought to thought, without stop or intermission, if they do not equal in strength or intensity the fixity of the passions, give birth to feelings at once novel, diversified, and exultant.

"Though the judgment ought to dwell upon intrinsic qualities, let it is impossible to frame an opinion without personal comparisons, for how is it we arrive at the power of ascertaining what can be done, but by the experience of what has been done? It is, therefore, with no view to nice or invidious distinctions that we introduce the names of her illustrious predecessors or contemporaries into the parallel with Mademoiselle Sontag, but merely to establish a scale by which we may measure, with a nearer approach to exactitude, her real attainments. Mrs. Billington, Madame Ronzi de Begnis, and Mrs. Salmon, are the singers within our recollection with whom she may most fairly be compared. The first far exceeded her in the brilliancy and volume of her voice and in the variety of her style—Madame Ronzi had a finer notion of the application of science, had far more sensibility, and consequently a more perfect expression. The first song in Rosina, "Una Voce," is an immediate test. As a matter of art and feeling combined, Madame Ronzi's far exceeded Mademoiselle Sontag's—though eclipsed in the extent, diversity, singularity, and fancy of the alterations, in the lightness, brilliancy, and in the extreme pleasure afforded by the execution of Mademoiselle S. This, indeed, as we have said, is the peculiar charm of the whole. The flights are so airy, so light, so neat, and withal so perfectly pleasing, that all deeper inquisition is for the moment stayed. The quality of Madame Ronzi's voice was sharp and infantine, especially in the upper notes—but there can be no question that she was, in all other attributes than volant execution, together with a slight reservation for tone, a far greater singer.

"Our English vocalist, Mrs. Salmon, seems to us to have possessed in the nearest degree the qualities which have elevated Mademoiselle Sontag to the height she has attained, and, but for the superior invention displayed by the latter, Mrs. Salmon was, we think, the ablest of the two. The quality and volume of her voice were by far the most beautiful—her facility not less, and the difference is, that Mrs. Salmon never imagined the necessity of such introductions, otherwise we are convinced that she would have done all Sontag performs, in as light and facile a manner, and with much more beautiful tone.* It is, however, from these trifling additions, from these small but surprising enlargements of the art, that superiority gains place and advancement. In canto spianato, or plain song (if there be now such a thing), Mrs. Salmon, how little soever she could boast of expression, was the greater of the two. Indeed, judging from the few specimens we have heard, Mademoiselle S. falls below the level even of mediocrity in her sustained singing. Her delivery of the theme of Rode's air was rather coarse than polished.

"Considering then, as we do, that Mademoiselle S. is now superior only in the invention and in the execution of ornamental passages, and that by the lightness and pleasing manner she has attained she has taken precedency of all others in this manner, we yet anticipate that time and reflection and those changes which practice and experience produce, may raise her to a higher rank in art than she has yet aspired to reach. We have said that her faculties limit her to a particular course, but we see no reason why she should not excite deep interest in tender and pathetic airs. These we think are completely within her grasp, and probably within her contemplation and desire of future excellence, even during that period of youth when the buoyancy of the spirits, acted upon by such enormous and seductive exhibitions of public applause, seems to forbid such aspirations. The grace, the quietude, and the modesty of her private manner, are all indications of sound sense and propriety of thinking, out of which must arise deeper investigation of her art than belong to the mere repetition of passages. We, therefore, consider this very young artiste (her age is betwen nineteen and twenty-three) to be in the same state of progression that appertains to human nature at large, and that her early and rich acquirements will be matured into even nobler fruits. The very perfection she has thus attained in one, and that not the highest department,* will in its very satiety generate a wish for other and greater excellence, should no unforeseen accident of fortune snatch her from the exercise of the profession she so much adorns.

"Mademoiselle Sontag's personal beauty has been even more exaggerated than her singing. She is of the middle stature, neither full nor slender, nor remarkable for form or feature. Her face is expressive of delicacy, sensibility, and modesty united. She is graceful, because she is easy, quiet, and reserved, and her acting partakes of these attributes. But, had she not been distinguished by name and reputation, we question whether she would have attracted any extraordinary personal regard—certainly not in so far as beauty is concerned. But there is "something than beauty dearer," and Mademoiselle Sontag is said by all those who know her, to possess it. From the little we have seen, and from much we have heard of her personal character, she is endowed with virtues which even the incense of public applause will but the more exalt, and with talents which we steadfastly believe time will only serve to improve. Thus qualified, she comes forth another proof of the superior dignity of ability publicly exerted, when combined with self-respect and private estimation—a dignity which none of the gifts of fortune or accidents of birth can bestow or equal."

In many respects, as our readers will own, the verdict of posterity has differed essentially from that of the critic of 1828. For instance, let us take the sentence which says, "Her delivery of the theme of Rode's air was rather coarse than polished." How wonderfully must Mdme. Sontag have improved! In short, all the praises of the writer have been fully warranted, while few of his strictures would be allowed to pass, as just, in 1854.

* We do not give this opinion as a mere conjecture, but as a matter confirmed in a good degree by experiment. When Madame Colbran Rossini first appeared in Zelmira, a professor, whose capability of judging is not exceeded by that of any person in this country, sat with Mrs. Salmon in a box, and he heard her, with a feeling partaking of astonishment, execute every extraordinary passage or ornament done by Madame C. R., sotto voce, to the greatest perfection.

* Madame Catalani is reported to have said, "Elle est la première de son genre, mais son genre n'est pas le premier;" and a professor of great reputation and experience introduced a celebrated flute-player to Mademoiselle S. in these words, "Ecco il tuo rivale."

LEICESTER.—The last of Mr. Nicholson's "People's Concerts," for the season, took place on Monday evening, when Handel's Judas Maccabæus was performed. Mrs. Parkes, Miss Deacon, Mrs. Mowlett, and Messrs. Oldershaw, Lawler, Boyce, Briggs, and Branston were the vocalists. The New Music Hall was crowded in every part.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent).—Rossini's Donna del Lago has been brought out at the Italiens with a cast which has surprised many, but, I think, will not surprise you. When the opera was announced, everybody supposed that Alboni would resume her old part, Malcolm. But Alboni did no such thing. She had an eye to the rondo finale of the Donna del Lago—as good in its way, and as brilliant, as the famous "Non più mesta"—and expected to make as great a hit in one as in the other. Alboni was not far mistaken. She sang the music of Elena charmingly, and the final cavatina was a triumph. But unhappily, Alboni's place could not be supplied in Malcolm, and the weak point of the performance was Madame de Luigi, who essayed that character, and produced no sensation at all. Of Mario's Hubert I need say nothing: but of Graziani's Roderigo, and Delle Aste's Douglas I must say, that they were not particularly brilliant.—On Tuesday week, an "extraordinary" representation was given at the Grand Opéra for Madame Bosio's benefit. The third and last acts of Moïse were given, and Madame Bosio sang an air and a duet (with Roger) from Lucia. In the ballet, Mesdames Fanny Cerito and Priora appeared. A new ballet is preparing for Cerito in which she will shortly appear. Madlle. Priora is going away, and is not re-engaged. Madlle. Rosati, however, who will supply her place, is daily expected. The success of the Vestale increases with each succeeding representation. Cruvelli gets better and better, and her new "creation," Julia is by many preferred to her Valentine. She is really magnificent in her part of the unhappy virgin, as you will acknowledge when you see her at Covent Garden.* Meyerbeer's comic opera (that word cannot be said too often), L'Etoile du Nord, still continues immensely attractive. It is certainly one of the greatest and most perfect works of the master. The rehearsals of MM. Leuven and F. Bazin's two act opera, it is rumoured, have been interdicted for state reasons. The opera, in three acts, by M. Massé, on the contrary, is being rehearsed, and will shortly be produced. On Wednesday last (this day week), the Emperor and Empress attended the performance of La Dame Blanche.—The third concert of the France Musicale was a brilliant one, and was well attended. The artists were MM. Alard, Chevillard, Théodore Ritter, Lagrave, and Brisson; Mesdames Dreyfus, and Ugalde.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent).—Since my last, we have had two representations of Spontini's Vestale. The character of Julie, which, I have heard, was to have been sustained by Mdlle. La Grua, was, for some unexplained reason, allotted to Mdme. Marlow. Mdme. Hermann was the High Priestess; Herr Steger, Licinius; Herr Beck, Cinna, and Herr Draxler the High Priest. They all did their best, but the ensemble did not come up to public expectation. Some of your readers may not be aware that Die Vestalin was composed in 1807 for Paris, and carried off the grand ten-yearly prize for the best opera. Cherubini, Lesueur, Méhul, Gossec, Grétry, Berton, Catel, Persuis, Kreuzer, Dalayrac, Paesiello, and Winter, with others, too numerous to mention, were also competitors. To the Vestalin and Ferdinand Cortez, which appeared two years later, Spontini owes his position as a dramatic composer.—Herr Julius Stockhausen gave his third concert in the rooms of the Musikverein, on the 16th. Among other pieces, we had an Andante cantabile and Presto agitato† of the ever fresh and welcome Mendelssohn, played by Herr Stanzieri, and a violin rondo of M. Allard, performed by Herr Ludwig Strauss. Mdlle. La Grua was to have sung, but did not make her appearance.—I think I informed you that we were looking forward with great interest to a performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, which we were promised at the concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. As Sam Weller says, however, "there are veels within veels," and, instead of Mendelssohn's oratorio, Mozart's symphony in D major, Mendelssohn's in A major (composed for the London Philharmonic Society), and Haydn's "Storm" chorus (Seasons), were given. They were all extremely well performed. The society deserve great praise for the intellectual treat they afforded their audience, but they would have done still better had they kept faith with the public by producing the oratorio of St. Paul. I was unable to "assist," as the French say, at the second concert of the sisters, Wilhelmine, Amalie, and Marie Neruda,* which unfortunately took place on the same day as that of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde; but a friend who was present gave me some account of it. The bénéficiaires were very much applauded, especially Fräulein Wilhelmine, in Ernst's fantasia on the march in Otello, a concerto by De Beriot, and other pieces for the violin. I was sorry to hear that the concert was not well attended. This may be accounted for by the fact that the young virtuosa has come to Vienna at an unfavorable time. M. Vieuxtemps was here before her, and the public are still full of their recollection of him. Clever as Mdlle. Wilhelmine Neruda undoubtedly is, she is not yet a Vieuxtemps, nor even a Milanollo, if I may be allowed to bring in a well-known line of Virgil. To conclude my list of concerts, Herr Stockhausen's fourth took place on the 23rd, and Herr Hölzl gave a concert on the 25th. I do not include in my list a performance given by the pupils of the esteemed pianist Mdlle. Anna Capponi, on the 21st, in Herr Seuffert's Rooms, since these musicians in embryo cannot yet be counted as regular artists, although many of them promise well. Mozart's overtures to Titus and Mädchentreue, and Beethoven's trio in C minor, were among the pieces performed by the young piano players, with whom their mistress, Mdlle. Capponi, has no reason to be dissatisfied. The room was crowded.—On Sunday, the 19th, a vocal mass, by Robert Führer, was performed in the parish church of St. Augustin. A vocal quartet with chorus, by Preindl, was introduced in the graduale, and a quartet for male voices by Herr L. Hauptmann, in the offertorium. Herr Hauptman, who is regens chori to the church, and professor of singing at the Akademie der Tonkunst, directed the performance of the solos and choruses.

"Sequiturque Vieuxtemps non passibus æquis,"

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—M. Vieuxtemps gave his second concert on the 13th, in the rooms of the Singakademie. Among other pieces, he played Tartini's sonata, Le Trille du Diable, Paganini's Pequetum mobile, and an adagio of his own. He was assisted by Herr Pape, an excellent performer on the clarionet, and Fräulein Schulz, of the Ducal Theatre at Weimar.—On the 20th, M. Vieuxtemps gave his third concert, in the same rooms, and played, with Dr. Kullack, Beethoven's sonata in A minor, dedicated to Kreitzer, and other pieces. The concerts of the Dom-Chor, and those of the Sinfonie-Soirées are, for the present, suspended. You may have some idea of the Dom-Chor concerts, when I tell you that, among other works, they have lately performed Gabrielli's motet, "Herr, du bist vormals gnädig gewesen," Lotti's "Crucifixus," Palestrina's "Christus factus est," Jomelli's "Lux perpetua," Haydn's "Du bist, dem Ruhm und Ehre," and one of the Psalms of Mendelssohn. The programme of the last Sinfonie-Soirée comprised Cherubini's overture to the Abencerges, Haydn's Sinfonie Militaire, the overture to Der Freischütz (encored), and Beethoven's symphony in C minor. The lovers of music in Berlin are indebted to Herr K. M. Taubert for the manner in which he has discharged his duties as conductor and director.

The event which has attracted the greatest share of attention lately, was Mdme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's last concert. The great artist gave the air from the Messiah, "Ich weiss, dass mein Erlöser lebt" ("I know that my Redeemer liveth"), with the deep feeling and indescribable manner that especially characterise her singing. The aria from I Puritani displayed her talent from another point of view, that of perfect artistic skill. Mdme. Goldschmidt also sang, in the most charming way, two lieder by Mendelssohn and Schumann, and the popular "Lied aus Dalecarnien." Herr Otto Goldschmidt played Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor, for pianoforte and orchestra. Where Jenny Lind sings, Otto Goldschmidt plays. If you hear one, you must also hear the other. Thus closed a series of concerts which have been so many new triumphs for the "Nightingale."

The representation of Boieldieu's Die Weisse Dame (La Dame Blanche) at the Opera House, drew a large audience, the novelty being the first appearance of Herr Theodor Formes (brother of Carl Formes, the bass), as George Brown. Although he laboured under the disadvantage of coming after M. Roger, Herr Formes acquitted himself in a manner that completely satisfied the audience, who testified their satisfaction by frequent applause.—Herr Bock, music-publisher to his Majesty has, in a liberal manner, expressed his intention to devote to the foundation of a special institution for old and decayed military musicians, the profits he has received, and those he may continue to receive from the army, for his edition of the Prize Marches. The title of the institution will be, Hof-Musikhändler Bock'sche Spezial-Stiftung zur unterstützung invalider Militair-Musiker und Spielleute, wie deren Wittwen und Waisen.—On Friday week, at the special request of his Highness the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, M. Vieuxtemps performed in the Prince's palace at Löwenberg. The pieces chosen by M. Vieuxtemps for the occasion were his last violin-concerto, dedicated to the King of Prussia, the Hexen-Variationen of Paganini, his own variations on "Yankee Doodle," and the Carnaval de Venise. The Prince's private orchestra accompanied him, besides playing Mendelssohn's overture to Ruy Blas, and Weber's to Der Freischütz.

Brussels.—A soirée, by no means resembling soirées in general, took place at the English ambassador's last week. Amateurs of distinction, under the direction of M. Jules de Glimes, executed several morceaux from the chefs-d'œuvre of the great masters. The time is passed when amateur concerts are to be considered valueless or insignificant. The amateurs of our days do not yield to artists in respect of talent, still less of taste. Such, at all events, may be affirmed of those who assisted at the soirée of Lord Howard. The precision with which they rendered the selection of classic music was greatly admired. M. Jules de Glimes had reason to be proud of the success of his pupils. The accomplished professor strengthened the accompaniment by a quartet of stringed instruments, and himself presided at the piano. At the end of the concert, all the amateurs sang "God save the Queen," the company standing during the performance of the national anthem.

Benedetto Negri.—This once distinguished Professor of singing died on the 24th inst., in his 71st year. He was born in Turin, on the 5th Jan., 1784, and was the favourite pupil of Bonifazio Asioli. At the early age of 22, Negri was appointed Professor of the Milan Conservatoire, on its foundation by Napoléon.

MISS GUSELDA ARCHER (Pupil of Mr. Aspull), has the honour to announce that her FIRST SOIRÉE MUSICALE will take place at the Hanover-square, Rooms, on Wednesday, the 10th of May, 1854. Vocalists—Miss Dolby, Miss Smith, Miss Binckes, Miss Adams, and the Misses Brougham; Mr. Frank Bodda, Mr. De Burgh, Herr de Becker. Pianoforte—Miss Guselda Archer. Harp—Mr. Frederick Chatterton. Conductor, Mr. Aspull. Reserved seats, 10s. 6d.; Single tickets, 7s., and family tickets to admit four, one guinea. To be had at the Music Warehouses, and of Miss Archer, 451, Oxford-street.

ERNST, HALLE, PIATTI, and Madame AMEDEI, are engaged for the last MUSICAL WINTER EVENING, Willis's Rooms, Thursday, April 6th. Tickets, half-a-guinea each, to be had of Cramer and Co., Chappell and Co., and Ollivier, Bond-street. Particulars to be had of the Director, J. Ella.

HOPKINSON'S PIANOFORTES.—These Pianofortes received the award of the Great Exhibition Prize Medal in 1851. They are also pronounced by the most eminent Pianists of the age, (S. Thalberg, J. Benedict, E. Szekely, Madame Dulcken, and others,) "to be unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker." May be had at the principal music-sellers in this country and at the ware-rooms, 18, Soho-square, London. Prices, from 25 to 180 guineas each. N.B.—The Manufactory, Diana-place, near Regent's-park; Branch-establishment, 6, Commercial-street, Leeds.

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTES, with PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, for all Climates, and NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. Pianists, and the Musical World, are respectfully invited to inspect and test these Pianofortes, which have now attained the long-sought properties of permanence, quantity, and quality of tone, standing well in tune, with the most prompt and light touch. The purchasers of Pianos have now the advantage of selecting an Instrument to their own taste, which, being of itself permanent, can be sent to any distance without injurious effects. The great improvements taking place around us in the mechanical arts and manufactures, has rendered it necessary that the Pianoforte should be included in the number. The difficult obstacles to conquer in the making of Pianos is, without doubt, that which results from the pressure occasioned by the extreme tension on the strings, and also from the dryness or humidity of the atmosphere, causing the wood placed at the back to expand, sometimes to unglue, and always to force them to rest upon the sounding-board, rendering the instrument (sooner or later) valueless, and significantly expressed by the common observation of "My Piano has lost its tone!" The defects of the ordinary, inefficient, and too weak construction in wood—or with metallic plates—is completely superseded by WOOLLEY'S PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, FOR ALL CLIMATES. The frame consists of an entire construction of iron, preventing the possibility of the least shrinking in any direction, and producing positive permanence; a frame of wood is also attached to the iron, which gives it the desired quality of fulness, and greatly increased duration. It is obvious that any thickness of stringing can be put on these frames, without fear of giving way—the tone is increased in volume—is rendered perfect in quality—and from the enormous resistance contained in the frame, the strings throw off their "Real Harmonics."—MECHANISM.—THE NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. The power of tone and resistance in the frame, suggests the desirability of a very powerful blow in the hammer. This is completely effected by the "New Royal Victoria Repeat;" the addition to these Pianos having a blow much more powerful than any hitherto produced—combining all the requisites of force, ease, variety of light and shade, superior damping, perfect check, and an untiring repetition, which is produced from an action not likely to get out of order. Mr. Woolley, in drawing attention to the applause which M. Billet elicited at St. Martin's Hall on Tuesday, March 15th, for the beautiful intonation of this instrument, begs to state that M. Billet will again perform on it at his next concerts, Tuesdays, April the 4th, and 11th. These Pianos may be seen and purchased at L. L. Lee's Warerooms, 48, Albemarle-street, London; and all the principal Provincial Towns. Woolley and Co., Patentees and Manufacturers.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSE'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—MESSRS. BOOSEY & SONS, in] submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSE'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B Flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E Flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. Th Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION. With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE, in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles, Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of recovering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

MENDELSSOHN.

In most towns of importance in Germany, the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of printing was kept with great public rejoicings, and at Leipzig, the book-mart of the Continent, the festival was attended with more than usual honours. It was Mendelssohn's duty to select and adapt to music a poem best suited in his judgment to express a great national feeling, and the hymn was to be sung at the uncovering of the Guttenberg statue. There was a swarm of candidates for the libretto part of the business, but the choice fell on a song by Adolph Prölss, a Divinity lecturer, of the Gymnasium of Freiberg. The opening words, "Vaterland, in deinen Gauen brach der lichte Morgen an," were accompanied by wind instruments alone; and I remember well, amid the general excitement in the Gewandhaus, at the first rehearsal, how the venerable Rochlitz shared the enthusiasm of the younger and more susceptible spirits around him. The old man's face lighted up with pleasure, and, as the joyous strains pealed out, he seemed to hail the dawn of a new era in art. So much for the first trial of the national hymn, but grave doubts were entertained of the effect of the music which was to be given on the day of the festival, al fresco, in the market-place. It was resolved to rehearse again in the gardens of the Schützenhaus, and assign the places of the orchestra and vocal performers at convenient distances from each other. This was a difficult task for our conductor, and many will remember how Felix, on the day of the performance, was seen moving about the temporary stage on the "Rathhaus," and showing the musicians their proper places. At last, two bodies of chorus were arranged at some distance from each other, Mendelssohn and David officiating respectively as their leaders. The music began with a chorale, "Begeht mit heiligem Lobgesang," to the tune of "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr'." Then came the Guttenberg song, an allegro molto for tenor voices, "Der Herr sprach, es werde Licht;" and, to conclude, a chorale to the melody, "Nun danket alle Gott." This work belongs to a class of compositions which bear no number or mark, like most of the author's productions; but, with many of his later works, it was published by Breitkopf and Härtel. The Guttenberg song has also been published in an arrangement for a single voice, and, as a national and genuine German song, deserves a large sale and wide circulation. The impression made by the performance of these pieces was not equal to what might have been fairly anticipated in behalf of such music; but much of the sound was lost in the open air, and a thousand singers, at least, would have been necessary to do justice to the work. All these compositions were, however, but the preludes to that great work which was deservedly reckoned the brilliant feature of the Leipzig Festival. We allude to the Lobgesang, grosse Symphonie Cantata, von Mendelssohn Bartholdy, eigens zu dem Feste gedichtet, which was heard for the first time in the church of St. Thomas, at Leipzig, on the 25th June, 1840. It was preceded by Weber's overture to *The Ruler of the Spirits (the finale, introducing "God save the King," accompanied by the organ) and the Dettingen Te Deum of Handel. But who shall measure out the glory of that artist, whose gifts, devoted to a grateful and sublime expression of the Almighty's praise, have left a memento of that Guttenberg Festival which no time can efface—no jealousy or depreciation can diminish. Here we are told of the victory of light over the hostile and conflicting powers of darkness which the world loved more than the light; and I do not think that I am erring too much on the side of the old maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum," when I say that, in the Hymn of Praise, we discern the marks of a pious mind and a man who felt and acted, not merely talked or wrote. Art can lie, and duplicity is cheap and common; but hypocrisy is hateful, and Mendelssohn the artist was Mendelssohn the man, genuine, thorough, and unpolluted. I do not agree with those who think that the greater part of the orchestral work had been written before the time we are treating of, and that the vocal parts were added subsequently, and for this particular occasion. The Lobgesang, in its integrity, bears the stamp of a freshness and connected system of arrangement, which, I am persuaded, could not have been found in a work composed in so disjointed a manner as some have supposed it to have been written. I am at a loss to conceive how others, calling themselves critics, can discover in the Hymn of Praise a mere imitation of the D minor symphony of Beethoven.† The two compositions are about as like each other as the "God the Father" of Michael Angelo to the "Sistine Madonna" of Raphael, or the "Transfiguration" in the Vatican. The two works have this in common. Beethoven's symphony concludes with vocal parts, which form the larger half of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang; so that the first three orchestral subjects form, in reality, but subdivisions of the one entire work, and the whole composition, in two parts, divides a great orchestral and vocal subject. While Beethoven avails himself of men's voices, as his last resource to express a painful effort to attain joy (das schmerzliche Ringen nach Freude), Felix wished to explain the exultation which followed on salvation from the powers of darkness. To effect this purpose, he used both vocal and instrumental music; and hence, significantly enough, his work bears the title of a Symphonie Cantata. The leading idea in the opening part, introduced by horns and trumpets,‡ and repeated by the tutti of the instruments, is reproduced with grander and more combined bursts of harmony. An inspiriting chorus, "All that have Life and Breath, praise Ye the Lord," opens the vocal part of the work, which abounds with magnificent created and choral pieces. The lovely duet, "I waited for the Lord," precedes, perhaps, the noblest solo and chorus that can be found in the sacred works of Mendelssohn. "The Sorrows of Death had closed all around Me, and Hell's dark Terrors had got hold upon Me," are the words which form the mournful prelude to the question, three times repeated, "Watchman, will the Night soon pass?" A pause ensues, and the treble voices answer in tones full of consolation: "The Night is departing, the Day is at Hand; let us cast off the Works of Darkness, and put on the Armour of Light." This chorus, confessedly one of the greatest that have been written by any composer in these days, may be compared in effect to the "Es werde Licht" of Haydn,* and the "Mache dich auf, werde licht,' in St. Paul. But greater weight and solidity is to be found in the Lobgesang; and the chorus, with its intricacies and elaborate writing, still appeals to all, as a genuine inspiration of the composer. A chorale, full of Christian gratitude, "Now, thank God," and a duet for tenor and soprano, precede the final chorus, "Ye People, Kings, Heaven, and Earth, bring to the Lord Honour and Might," and the whole weight of the instruments is thrown into a noble fugue with which the Lobgesang concludes. People of course judge differently in recording the works of Mendelssohn; and, availing myself of that liberty of taste and choice, which is gladly conceded to others, I venture, after much consideration, to call the Lobgesang the greatest of his works. It is entirely original, and independent of other men's conceptions, which cannot be said for the St. Paul†; and, in pointing to the Lobgesang as a genuine picture in the happiest style of the artist, we rise from our contemplation, humbled, and astonished that one of ourselves could so worthily have praised the Creator. The first performance, which was excellent as regards the chorus and orchestra, created a great enthusiasm, which manifested itself (though the audience were in a church) in whispers and audible expressions of approval. A few evenings afterwards, Felix was serenaded by some of the members of the chorus. He lived at this time in Leugenstein's Garden, and I remember his appearing there to answer the deputation in such plain words as these:—"My friends, I am a man, as you know, of few words, but I thank you heartily." We answered him with three musical "hips" (Ein dreifaches gesungenes Hoch). Shortly after this great ovation, Mendelssohn designed a scheme to revive and perpetuate, as far as he could, the name and memory of a musician towards whom he had always entertained lively feelings of gratitude. John Sebastian Bach had been for a long time director in the Thomasschule at Leipzig, and to raise subscriptions and erect a statue seemed to be an appropriate and graceful act on the part of Mendelssohn, who held the name of Bach in such veneration. Felix determined to defray the expenses of the statue from his own means, and issued prospectuses of concerts, the proceeds of which he intended entirely to devote to the object. Bach's works were to be the chief features in the programme; and on the 6th of August, in St. Thomas's church, there was a grand organ performance, consisting of the following pieces:—the fugue in E major, an extempore on the chorale, "Schmücke dich, O liebe Seele;" Prelude and fugue in A minor; the Passe-caille, in C minor, with twenty-one variations; the Pastorella and Toccata in A minor; and, to conclude, a second extempore on the subject, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden." All these compositions of Bach were executed by the energetic Mendelssohn, whose organ-playing astonished the critics, and satisfied them that he was equal, single-handed, to bear the whole onus of a public performance. On reviewing the ceaseless exertions of Mendelssohn during the short space of one year, we cannot wonder that his health became often subject to attacks brought on by anxiety and labour, and we have to record here a rather serious illness which seized him shortly after this concert. He recovered, however, soon enough to journey to England, where he had been engaged to direct the Birmingham festival, and bring out the Lobgesang. On the 11th of September, before his arrival in London, the first rehearsal of this work took place in the Hanover Square Rooms. Mr. Knyvett directed, Mr Turle presided at the organ, and M. Moscheles assisted in the general management of the performance. On the 20th of this month, Mendelssohn arrived in England, and conducted his Lobgesang at Birmingham, three days afterwards. I cannot say, for certain, whether he was invited to Court by the Queen of England that year or in 1842, the occasion of his next visit; but the story I am about to relate is not impaired by want of accuracy in the date of its actual occurrence. It would be superfluous here to state that Queen Victoria and Prince Albert are both excellent connoisseurs in music, and we cannot wonder at Felix being honoured with a special invitation to attend Her Majesty. She received the musician in a quiet unostentatious manner, the Prince and another gentleman being the only witnesses of the interview. When he entered the apartment, the Queen apologized for the disorder of her reception room, and, assisted by Mendelssohn, began to set things to rights. Some noisy parrots were cashiered and banished for a time to her boudoir, and, now that there were no hindrances, the Queen sang some of Mendelssohn's own vocal pieces, but appeared ill-pleased with herself and her performance. "He might ask Lablache" (she said) "if she could not do those songs more justice; but she was nervous before the composer," etc. The story was a favourite one with Mendelssohn, and naturally enough.

On the 2nd of October, Felix and Moscheles travelled together from London to Leipzig; and the former appeared at his post of conductor at the Second Subscription Concert of the season. On the 19th of this month, in the large concert room of the Gewandhaus, Bach's triple concerto was given by Schumann, Moscheles, and Mendelssohn, and, on the 3rd of December, the immortal Lobgesang was heard for the first time in the Gewandhaus. A party of enthusiasts had decked the conductor's desk with flowers, and when the illustrious man appeared to lead the Ruler of the Spirits overture, he was greeted with a storm of applause, the earnest of the ovation he was to reap after a hearing of the Lobgesang. This work occupied entirely the second part. The alto and tenor were Mdlle. Schloss and Herr Schmidt; and so uproarious was the applause at the conclusion of the piece, that it seemed not improbable that the audience would have carried off the composer, desk, flowers, and all, on their shoulders back to his residence. The news of this triumph reached the ears of the Court, and the King, arriving on the 15th of December at Leipsig, expressed a wish to hear the Lobgesang. It was accordingly repeated on the 16th of this month by the same orchestra and chorus as before. The King selected the pieces to form the first part of the concert. They were as follows: the overture to Weber's Oberon, cavatina from Figaro, "Giunse alfin il momento," sung by Mdlle. Schloss, and the Kreutzer sonata of Beethoven (Op. 47.), played by Mendelssohn and David. But the great and peculiar interest of this concert was centred in the Lobgesang; and the King, who after the performance left his seat and thanked Mendelssohn in person for the rich treat he had afforded him, reminded the proud spectators of this interview of the words of the poet:—

"Es darf der Sänger mit dem König gehn, Sie beide wandeln auf der Menschheit Höhn."

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

(From the original of Alexander Oulibicheff.)*

CHAPTER X.

BEFORE Mozart again quits Paris, whither he was never destined to return, we will allow him to relate, in his own manner, the only triumph—after all, but a poor one—he ever achieved there. He had composed a grand symphony for the Concert Spirituel, on the festival of Corpus Christi:—

"I was very anxious," he says, "at rehearsal. In all my life I never heard anything worse. You cannot imagine the wretched, bungling way in which they performed the symphony twice over. I was really fearful of the result, and would willingly have tried it again, but, as there were many other things to rehearse, there was no time. I was, therefore, obliged to go home to bed with an aching heart, indignant and dissatisfied. I determined not to be present at the concert next day! As, however, it was fine, I mustered up courage in the evening, and went—firmly resolved, however, that, if the symphony was played as badly as at the rehearsal, I would go into the orchestra, take the violin out of the hands of the director, and conduct the performance myself. I prayed to God in his mercy, that all might go well, and Ecce!—the symphony commenced. Raff† was standing near me. At the commencement of the allegro there was a passage which I felt certain must please. The audience were carried away by it, and applauded very warmly. As I was certain, when I wrote it, of the effect it would produce, I had again introduced it at the end. The applause began, therefore, da capo—the andante also pleased; and still more, the last allegro. Having heard that all finales commence, like the first movement, with a tutti, generally in unison, I began mine with the first and second violins alone, piano. After eight bars came the forte, which the audience applauded as soon as it was heard. The symphony over, I went for joy, to the Palais Royal, ordered an ice, said my beads, as I had promised beforehand, and returned home."

Mozart had anticipated the manner in which this symphony would be received, because, to a certain extent, he had adapted it to the French taste. In a previous letter he says—

"Whether it will please, I do not know—and, to speak the truth, I trouble myself very little about it. Whom, indeed, will it not please? I will answer for its satisfying the few sensible Frenchmen who may be present; and as for the fools, I can see no great misfortune in its not contenting them. I have hopes, however, that even the donkeys will find something in it to please them, in which case, I shall not have failed in the premier coup d'archet. That will be enough. The blockheads here make such a fuss—the deuce take it! 'We perceive no difference'—they immediately begin, as in other places. It is really laughable."

Le Gros pronounced this symphony the best in his repertory. He had it played a second time, with a new andante, written at his request by Mozart; and, from that time, exhibited the most friendly feelings towards the young composer.

A melancholy event now occurred which increased Mozart's distaste and repugnance for Paris. His mother, whom he most tenderly loved, and whose idol he was, died, in July, 1778. Under these distressing circumstances, Grimm gave touching proofs of a friendship which does as much honour to his memory as all his intercourse with the philosophers of his day. He prevailed on Mozart to leave his lodgings in the Rue du Gros Chenet and to remove to his (Grimm's) own house, besides writing to Salzburg, and undertaking all the necessary arrangements. One of the most celebrated women of the period, Madame D'Epinay, an ancient admirer of Grimm, assisted him in his task of consolation. Leopold Mozart, however, now no longer opposed his son's desire to leave France. The shrewd old man nevertheless only gave his consent when his unceasing efforts to procure a permanent appointment for Wolfgang in Salzburg had been crowned with success. He effected this object in the following manner. A short time previously, the Archbishop had lost two members of his chapel—Lolli and Adelgasser—the former a composer, the latter an organist, and both men of talent, whose places it was not easy to fill up. In this state of affairs, the spiritual shepherd was compelled, even against his will, to think of his lost sheep, the young insensate who had been rash enough to abandon his post and renounce an income for life, of no less then 12 florins 30 kreutzers per annum! This was certainly very good pay for Mozart, although, it is true, he played the pianoforte and organ tolerably well, could direct an orchestra with his violin, and, as the archbishop was obliged to confess, was not altogether deficient in talent for composition, in case of necessity could write for the church, the chamber, or the stage, and, in short, knew a little of everything. The question arose, however, on what pretext could free pardon be accorded to the truant sheep who had braved his shepherd, to the thankless subject who had fled from the best and most generous of princes? Necessity, however, at last brought matters to an issue. In the first place, indirect advances were made to Leopold Mozart, by the Intendant of the chapel. The old diplomatist was now in his element. At the first word, he divined what was wanted, played his cards cleverly, and ultimately won the game—replying to the archbishop by a petition, in which, among other things, he said that, "after so many years' service, free from reproach, he trusted he might be graciously remembered." The Court and the town were alarmed. They imagined that Leopold Mozart intended to retire, and felt assured that, if such were the case, the archiepiscopal chapel would be shaken to its foundations. Moreover, he was the only teacher of the pianoforte in Salzburg, and had afforded abundant proof that his method was a good one. Besides which, he counted among his pupils the Intendant's daughter, demanding, worthy man, no more than a ducat for twelve lessons. A master from Vienna would have asked, at least, four. The case was urgent, and it was absolutely necessary to make a formal proposition. Chuckling in his sleeve at the success of his plan, Leopold Mozart had already decided upon his ultimatum. He gave out that his son was achieving unheard-of sums in Paris, while the poor young man was actually working himself to death for Le Gros and Noverre, without receiving a kreutzer in return. In short, Leopold obtained for himself the 500 florins a-year, which Lolli had formerly enjoyed, and, for Wolfgang, the place of Adelgasser, with the same salary. This had been his aim. The agreement was concluded on the above conditions, with a proviso that one of the contracting parties—viz., Wolfgang—should be allowed to go to Italy once every two years, while the Archbishop pledged himself to give him autograph letters of recommendation on every occasion. How great was the satisfaction of Leopold Mozart, on informing his son of an event which surpassed his fondest hopes, and realised his highest aspirations. How the good old father counted, florin by florin, the sum which was to establish the prosperity of his family, not only fortunate but almost rich. A thousand florins annually, exclusive of incidental gains, with the sale of his "Method for the Violin," which brought him in about fifty florins a year, was a mine of wealth. Add to this, Mdlle. Nannerl earned ten florins a month by giving lessons, and, with that, she could afford to have the best wardrobe in Salzburg. Her brother, too, was allowed to appropriate whatever money he might gain by labour unconnected with his office. Leopold Mozart was of opinion that: "When a man has not to calculate his gains too closely, he may allow himself some small latitude." Such, as a general rule, was the lot of native musicians! A family composed of three members—the first, an accomplished master of his art, author of elementary works, which were regarded as classical throughout Germany; the second, an excellent pianist, and the third called Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart—esteemed themselves fortunate in obtaining a position which promised a yearly income of two or three thousand florins!

Mozart no sooner received this good news than he hastened to quit Paris. Before he does so, however, we will re-enumerate the works he composed during his last sojourn in France. These consist of six sonatas for the pianoforte, two quartets for the flute, a concerto for the harp, a symphony-concertante (mentioned in the preceding chapter), a grand symphony in D, known as the Symphonie Parisienne, and performed for the first time at the Concerts Spirituels, with some other compositions of less importance, besides the choruses destined to supply the place of those of Holzbauer, and half a ballet, comprising twelve separate pieces, written to oblige Noverre. All were composed in the course of six months, and, with the exception of the six sonatas, for which a music-publisher gave fifteen louis d'or, scarcely brought Mozart a sou.

Mozart was not in too great a hurry to enjoy the advantages of his new appointment. He remained three months on the road before arriving at his father's house. In Strasburg, he gave a musical soirée and a grand concert, which, when the expenses were paid, yielded six louis d'or. About this, he writes as follows:

"Had I imagined that so few people would have come, I would have given the concert gratis, if only for the pleasure of seeing the theatre full. There is nothing more melancholy than a table laid for eighty persons with only three of them present. To show the good Strasburghers, however, that I did not care in the least, I played a great deal for my own amusement—I gave them a concerto more than I had promised, and then extemporised for a long time."

But, on this occasion, Mozart was in good spirits, because his audience, although thin and scattered, consisted of the cream of connoisseurs, who made the place resound with their bravos as much as if it had been quite full. With an audience of this description, Mozart easily consoled himself for a scanty receipt.

When Mozart arrived at Mannheim, he was asked to write a duodrama—a drama in which the music accompanies the dialogue, or, in other words, a melodrama, according to the present acceptation of the term. Two works of this description—Medea and Ariadne—had produced a lively impression on him.

"You know," he writes to his father, "that, of all the Lutheran capellmeisters, Benda was always my favourite; I am so fond of these two works, that I always carry them about with me. Do you know my idea?—Most of the recitatives in operas should be treated in this fashion—and only sung now and then, when the words can be well expressed in the music."

In another part of his correspondence, he says:—

"If you hear them" (Benda's melodramas) "only once on the piano, you will be sure to be pleased with them;—but, if you hear them again, you will be completely carried away; that I vouch for. They require, however, a good actor or a good actress."

"And, above all, a good composer," Mozart should have added; for there certainly can be nothing more wretched than the ordinary melodramatic music of the present day—I mean those abrupt, confused, and heterogeneous pieces, to which, during the pauses, the action supplies the place of the commentary they so greatly stand in need of. The fault does not lie, however, in the music itself, as is satisfactorily proved by its inventors, Jean Jacques Rousseau and George Benda. The assistance of instrumental music is productive of admirable effects, even in tragedy, as we know from several instances in which it is employed.

With respect, however, to the idea of substituting a melodramatic treatment of the subject of an opera for recitatives, it does not appear likely that Mozart would ever have adopted, or attempted to carry it into execution. Spoken dialogue, with orchestral accompaniment, would certainly be preferable to the stupid rubbish created by the transition from such elevated poetry as true music, to mere naked, spoken prose. The practice of speaking in operas is insupportable; it does away with all illusion, and is a vestige of actual barbarism. I admit that instrumental harmony, coupled with words, would somewhat soften the harshness of this antithesis, which disturbs poetical truth and affects the nerves of the listeners; but there is something certainly far better than this combination, namely, such obbligato recitatives as Gluck and Mozart could write, and which unite with the whole power of music that of the truest, strongest, and most passionate declamation, which forms with the orchestra a homogeneous whole. We are here merely speaking of musical tragedy, since in comic operas neither melodramatic treatment nor instrumentalised declamation is applicable, and, therefore, for the want of something better, which, perhaps, will never be discovered, we must content ourselves with simple recitative, the monotonous striking of the piano, and the snuffling accords of the violoncello.

The melodramatic kind of treatment would, however, be very successful and popular if applied to opera at the present day. As a proof of this, I will merely adduce the Incantation in Der Freischütz and a charming scene in Weigl's Die Schweitzerfamilie.

Obstacles, which have never been explained, prevented the execution of the task proposed to Mozart by the Director of the Mannheim Theatre. The commission, however, coincided so much with Mozart's inclination, and his zeal for the now useless labour was so great, that he composed a whole act of the melodrama, "for himself," as he expresses it. The piece was entitled Semiramis. Like many others of his compositions, it must have been lost—at least, it is not included in the principal catalogue which comprises the musical sketches and fragments found amongst his papers after his death.

Mozart's protracted sojourn in all the larger cities on the road, at length caused his father to lose all patience. Three months was evidently too long a time to spend in the journey from Paris to Salzburg, even for one who travelled at his leisure. A very emphatic letter, in which the Capellmeister required the Hof- und Dom-Organist (Court and Cathedral Organist) to repair to his post without further delay, at last compelled Wolfgang to hasten his movements, and the result was, that he reached home about the middle of January, 1779.*

* In allusion to the fact of Mozart's failing to attain the object for which he went to Paris, Mr. Holmes remarks very truly that his diligence and genius, which were apparent on all occasions, and always opened a road for him, would, in time, have been acknowledged and rewarded even in France. But Fate intended Mozart for something higher than to reform and improve French music: he was destined to complete a work that should influence the taste of all Europe.—A. Schraishuon.

VII.

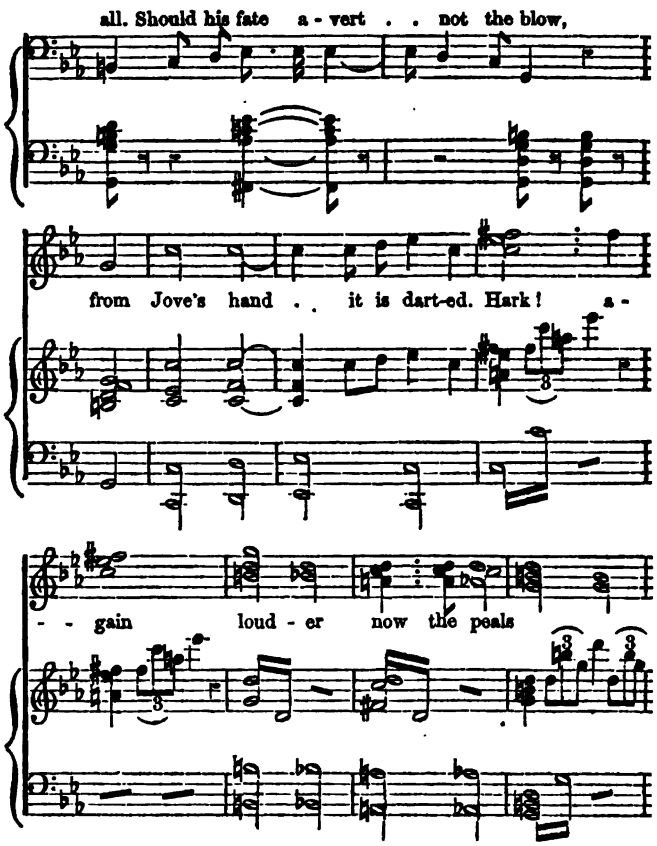
We have here a scene of wonderful grandeur, representing at first the foreboding of a great event, such as it is ever the delight of poets to picture, that moral mystery of our nature against which it is vain for the materialist to argue; then, in fulfilment of this presentiment, Jove's appalling thunders, the promised indication of the death-hour of Œdipus, break forth in terrific grandeur; the Chorus are all stricken at the elemental convulsion, but Œdipus recognising the signal of his destiny, remains calm and dignified, and demands that a messenger hasten to recal Theseus, whose presence at the fatal moment is essential to the full accomplishment of the prediction; and, lastly, the tempest, dying away, leaves still its influence upon the dismayed Chorus, who call upon Theseus, less in pursuance of the blind man's behest, than as clinging in reliance upon a power in which they trust at a time when the awe that confounds their senses renders them incapable of self-confidence.

There is an expression of deep and solemn mystery in the slow, measured, detached chords for the orchestra with which this piece commences, that is increased by the irregular phraseology of the vocal melody, and still more, by the subdued muttering tone of the lower notes of the bass voices to which only this is assigned:



As the presentiment of evil becomes by degrees less indefinite, the melody gradually rises, and the concluding phrases are given by the tenors, but still murmured in half-stifled whispers. The Chorus here, it will be noticed, are not addressing the characters, but, being filled with vague apprehensions, their fears are communicated from each to other, and they mutually acknowledge their common feeling. Is it the heavy atmosphere burthened with the ripening tempest that presses thus upon men's hearts? or is it that the approaching evil, intercepting the radiance of their brighter hopes, casts a shadow on their souls? Either the natural, or the preternatural influence, or both, are presented in this well-imagined passage, which is an admirable introduction to the exciting scene that grows out of it.

The original slow tempo is changed for an allegro molto, when apprehension is confirmed by the bursting of the thunder-cloud. The entirely unhackneyed, but especially graphic rendering of this portion of the subject, particularly bespeaks the powerful originality of Mendelssohn's genius. How many, and how many times has music been made, or sought to be made, to imitate the elemental warfare, and how for ever, and for ever, the same conventional forms have been employed to effect this purpose, is familiar to the satiated experience of every hearer of Italian operas, to every player of a certain class of pianoforte music, of which the admiration is at least equal to the merit. I am not aware that there is any natural analogy between the chord of C minor played in slow, descending arpeggio in the upper parts, against the continuous tremolo of the lower, and a clap of thunder; but it has become a matter of course with matter-of-course musicians to employ this as an acknowledged element of musical storms, and it is innocently received as such by the convenient world, just as they receive the theatrical flashes of ignited lycopodeum for lightning, or the conclusive stage illumination of blue fire as a symbol of virtue rewarded, and future peace and happiness. Little, indeed, is there of nature in such presentments, not much more of art. Genius, the intuitive enemy of convention, has gloriously, transcendently, shaken off the shackles of custom in the pastoral symphony of Beethoven where the mighty master swings not in the property car of the first scene of a pantomime, but soars indeed, upon the wings of the tempest. To avoid the sign-painting style of the elder worthies must have been natural, must have been irresistible to the refined mind of Mendelssohn, but not to adopt the perfect model of Beethoven, and yet to have succeeded, proves the power of his mind to have been equal to its refinement. It would be in the last degree bathetic, after this exordium, to describe the technical resources that are brought to bear upon the musical illustration or description in the scene under notice, and, indeed, if you had not the work before you, which would, of course, supersede all description, you could gather no idea of the general effect from any account that could be rendered of rolls on the drums, blasts on the brass instruments, tremolo passages for the violins, the order of concords and discords through which the harmony progresses. In brief, the storm is not represented in a minor key, but in the peculiarly transparent and resonant tonic of C major; the representation is remarkable for another exception from almost unexceptionable precedent, in having no passages that ascend or descend in semitonic scales. What, then, are we to suppose that here is no howling of the winds, no darkening of the sky with the black mantle of the hurricane? I suppose—and it is for those who may, to interpret the composer better—I suppose that whatever is descriptive in the music before us represents a marvellous manifestation of the power of the gods in their predicted augury of the approaching crisis of that fearful destiny of which Œdipus has been the victim, that it pictures the illumination of the wide expanse of heaven with one sheet of living fire, such as is often seen in southern climates, though little known in this—an awful splendour, which surpasses all else that human imagination can encompass of glorious brightness. On the other hand, I suppose that the more agitated portions of the music embody the terrified amazement of the Chorus, who are the spectators of the phenomenon, and who, sensible of the preternatural agency that is in operation, are fearful that their own fate is involved in its result.

In the antistrophe we have the fulfilment of that which was foreboded at the commencement of the piece, and the change of apprehension for conviction is finely rendered in the repetition of the opening phrases of the strophe with some most important modifications, it being given, namely, by all the voices an octave higher than at its first introduction by the basses only, and with the accompaniment of the full orchestra, and further, by the augmentation of the length of the notes, it is made to form a part of the continuous allegro, and yet to retain its original stateliness of character:

The recurrence to the major key for the same phrase upon which it was before introduced receives a new and very imposing effect from the exciting passage that leads up to it. An idea, of great force, which has not been anticipated in the strophe, but which is again introduced later in the piece, may be quoted as one of the prominent features of the movement:

This passage forms the commencement of the sequence, and one must immediately feel how greatly its exciting effect is enhanced by its being repeated a note higher than at first. I must explain, what is not apparent from the above extract, that the several parts of the Chorus enter successively, at the interval of half a bar, after each other, with the words, "What dire event now impendeth?" while the orchestra proceeds with the complete harmony; and in this distribution, perhaps even more than in the notes themselves, lies the great vigour and animation that characterise the passage.

A new musical idea marks the commencement of the second strophe:—

in which the responsive exclamations of the two choirs give surprising vitality to the scene, and the passage in which these two cross each other, proceeding by thirds in contrary motion, is a further illustration by a peculiar distribution of the materials at his command, by turning to account the casualties of the stage arrangements as a means to musical effect, of the tumultuous emotions of the situation. The idea, first introduced in the antistrophe, which I have quoted above, here recurs with admirable effect, being again continued in sequence, which this time induces a most daring modulation, namely, into the key of F sharp major, and the series of transitions that leads from this back to the original tonic of C minor is grand in the extreme. I have omitted to notice a phrase, may I call it, of two lengthened notes, upon the words "Help, Jove," which occurs where the first shock of the tempest is felt. This phrase (I know not a more minute definition for so concise an idea of so much importance), this phrase continually re-appears, and indeed its development constitutes one of the chief points of interest throughout the piece. Given now, as in some other places, by the orchestra without the voices, it still associates itself in our ideas with the deprecations of the Chorus, which constitute indeed the living principle of the scene stimulated by the physical phenomena of the storm. Employed as an accompaniment to, or an interlude between, the speeches of Œdipus, it may thus be felt to imply the destined man's concern for the terror he witnesses in those about him, rather than his self-solicitude in his urgent demand for the presence of Theseus.

The Chorus, yielding to this demand, appeal now to their King as the appointed agent of heaven, for that support which the gods, whom they have thus long besought in vain, will grant but at his hands; and thus commences the second antistrophe with the same passage as the preceding strophe. A new idea of exceeding breadth, massiveness, solemnity of character, for the orchestra only precedes the announcement of the Chorus to Theseus,

"The man would give thy State and thee his parting blessing,"

terises the grave, the religious sense of a great, and glorious fortune to their native land, which waits to be accomplished. The convulsion of the elements is lulled, and now paramount above the voice of the tempest is the cry of "Theseus!" set to the same phrase of two notes that has stood out as a most conspicuous feature through the movement; and thus, in beautiful unity with all that precedes it, the piece concludes.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The revival of Otello at the Italiens, had given great satisfaction to the habitués. Mario was in excellent voice, and was frequently and loudly applauded in the part of the Moor, whose jealousy of so charming and fascinating a Desdemona as Mdme. Frezzolini, could astonish no one. Mario's acting in the last scene was superb. That of Mdme. Frezzolini was simple, touching, and natural throughout, and her singing finished and artistic. A M. Neri Baraldi made his début as Rodrigo. He has a pleasing tenor voice. The Vestale of Spontini and Cruvelli, and L'Étoile du Nord of Meyerbeer, still pursue their triumphant careers at the Grand Opera and the Opéra Comique. I have been unable to attend either of the two lyric theatres lately. My time has been entirely engrossed with soirées and concerts. First there was the soirée of M. and Mdme. Offenbach, at which were heard MM. Roger, Offenbach, and the Mdlles. Dulcken. Then there was the soirée of Mdlle. Augustine Brohan, on the same evening as Mdme. Roger de Beauvoir's second Quadrille Printanier des Légumes et de la Polka des Fleurs, at which every one was compelled to appear in fancy costume. Add to these, the soirée of M. Roger, where Mesdames Frezzolini, Masson, Potier, Iweins d'Hennin, M. M. Roger, Lefébure, Hermann, Goria, and Felix Godefroid delighted the company by their talents. The concerts have been plentiful since my last. M. and Madame Lefébure-Wély have given one in the Salle Herz; as, also, have M. Albert Sowinski, the Polish composer for the pianoforte, Mr. John Thomas, the young English harpist, and M. Deloffre, conductor at the Théâtre Lyrique (formerly second violin at Mr. Ella's); while M.M. de Ciebra have treated us to the overture to Guillaume Tell, arranged for guitars! But the concert of the week was that under the patronage of the society of the Amis de l'Enfance, where M. Roger sang airs from Joseph and La Dame Blanche; Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli Schubert's admired "Adieu," as she knows how to sing it, and M.M. Hermann, Lefébure and Goria played John Sebastian's "Prelude Accompaniment" to M. Gounod's French tune, arranged for pianoforte, organ and violin. Poor Bach! To conclude, M. Henri Herz, the celebrated pianist and composer, gave a concert in his own rooms, Rue de la Victoire, and played his last new concerto to the great satisfaction of a crowded and fashionable audience. The programme of M.M. Seghers and Wekerlin at the last concert of the Société Sainte-Cécile comprised Beethoven's Sinfonie Eroica, Cherubini's Marche du Sacre, various pieces from Weber's Preciosa, with the chorus "Aux Bois," which received the honour of an encore. Mdlle. Marie Damoreau,* the young and charming débutante, sang an air from the Nozze di Figaro, an arietta with chorus by M. Wekerlin, and the ballad from Preciosa. After a long absence, Mdme. Ugalde is once more restored to us. She re-appeared for the first time at the concert of La France Musicale, and, for the second, at that of the young pianist, M. Paul Dollingen. According to report, the director of the Opéra Comique has offered the lady 30,000 francs to return to his theatre. She, however, demands 40,000; and thus the matter, for the present, rests in statu quo.—Before closing my letter, I must inform you that Lablache arrived here last week, and is, doubtless, either in London or on his road.

PARIS.—(From an occasional Correspondent.)—Speaking of La Donna del Lago at the Italian Opera, Le Ménéstrel has the following:—"'Un louis pour une chanterelle,' disait Grétry à la représentation des Bardes de Lesueur." With deference, the bon mot of Grétry was not at the expense of Lesueur's Bardes but of Méhul's Uthal, in which, for a freak, the composer dispensed with violins and made the violas his principal stringed instruments. Apropos de bottes, the attractions of Mad. Bosio's late benefit at the Opera were greatly enhanced by the vaudeville of Jobin et Nanette, which was admirably acted by M. Hoffmann and the charming Mdlle. Page. It remains to be seen what the London public will think of Meyerbeer's last opera, L'Étoile du Nord. The excellent Parisians are so enchanted with it, that places are actually being taken at the bureau de location for the year 1855, and the Opéra Comique is crowded to suffocation every night it is performed. What about Dr. Spohr's spirit of prophecy? The last week at the Théâtre Français was remarkable for two important events; the revival of M. Ponsard's Ulysse, with M. Gounod's choruses, and the re-appearance of Mdlle. Augustine Brohan, in Le Caprice and Les Femmes Savantes. The piquante soubrette was rapturously applauded, and her sparkling eyes showed no traces of the attack which threatened to deprive them for ever of their functions. The Théâtre Lyrique alternates between La Promise and La Fille Invisible, in other words, between Mdlle. Marie Cabel and Mdlle. Meillet, the two great favourites of the habitués of this theatre. La Revanche de Georges Dandin is in rehearsal at the Gymnase. M. Lesueur and Mad. Rose Chéri will play the principal parts. At the Variétés, Un Bal du grand Monde (Englished as The Dancing Barber) has been revived. A comedy, entitled L'Argent du Diable, by M. Victor Séjour, will shortly be produced. A hit has been made at the Palais Royal, by a vaudeville called Le Meunier, son Fils et —Jeanne, from the pen of M. Biéville. The piece is excellently played by M.M. Luguets, Grassot, Hyacinthe, and Mad. Dupuis. Mad. Emilie Guyon made her début (by the way the MUSICAL WORLD is the only paper that spells this ill-used word properly—palmam qui meruit ferat) last week, at the Porte St. Martin, in a five act drama by Messrs Anicet Bourgeois and T. Barrière, entitled La Vie d'une Comédienne, which was entirely successful. The Ambigu-Comique is still playing L'Enfant du Régiment. The next new piece will be Le Pendu. At the Gaîté, the military drama continues its triumphal career; ere this reaches you, it will have been played 130 times. The programme of the Délassements Comiques is composed of Les Petites Misères du Carnaval and La Boutique et le Théâtre.

VIENNA (From our own Correspondent).—We have been rather unfortunate lately at the Imperial Opera House, where sickness seems to have taken up its head-quarters. This has deranged the whole programme of the week. Der Freischütz had to be substituted for Ernani, the Prophète for the Huguenots, and the Lustigen Weiber von Windsor for Der Maurer. If any more members of the company are attacked, the theatre must per force be shut up. The concert-givers have been more fortunate than the managers. On the 26th, the Sisters Neruda gave their third concert, which was better attended than the first two. Mdlle. Wilhelmine, the cleverest of the sisters, was called forward thrice after playing Paganini's Hexen-Variationen. On the same day, Herren Helmesberger, Durst, Heissler and Schlesinger gave their fourth quartet concert. Spohr's Nonet in F major, Mendelssohn's sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello, and Mozart's quartet in B flat, were all extremely well performed. The Musical Academy had a concert on the 25th, in the Kärnthnerthor Theater, in aid of the funds of the Bürgerspital. Whether the people were attracted by a feeling of charity, or by their love of good music, I will not undertake to say, but the house was crammed to the ceiling. Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Meyerbeer's to Struensée were admirably played by the orchestra. Mdlle. La Grua sung Mendelssohn's grand concert air: Mad. Hermann Ezillag and Herr Draxler, the duet of Valentine and Marcel from the Huguenots; Herr Ander, Beethoven's "Adelaida;" and Mdlle. Tietjens, Mendelssohn's song "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges." Herr Ludwig Strauss played Moser's Souvenir d'Afrique, and Mdlle. Staudach attempted Liszt's fantasia on motives from the Prophète, which is only possible for Mad. Pleyel, or the composer. Herr Strauss and Mddle. Staudach also played at the concert of Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli, on the 27th. The fair bénéficiaire, although somewhat nervous at first, acquitted herself remarkably well, especially in Schubert's "Ungeduld," which was received with genuine and loud applause. Mdlle. Marie Cruvelli also sang, with Herr Stockhausen, a duet from Il Barbiere di Seviglia—"Dunque io son." Mad. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's first concert is announced for to-day (Saturday, April 1st). You shall have a full account of it in my next. The Italian Opera opens with Norma.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent).—Herr Dorn's new opera, Die Niebelungen, was produced at the Opera House, on Monday, the 27th, and was quite successful. I will send you a more detailed account when I have heard it again, and am better qualified to judge dispassionately of its merits. The Brothers Wieniawski have concluded their series of concerts, which have added to their reputation. The Soirées für klassische Orchestermusik, under the direction of Herr Liebig, are also terminated. The programme of the last soirée was composed entirely of Beethoven's music, as the concert took place on the anniversary of that great master's death. The solemnity was ushered in by the slow movement from the Sinfonia Eroica, followed by the grand concerto in E flat, performed by Mdlle. Marie Kupfernagel, who is only ten years of age. The second part consisted of the Sinfonie Pastorale, and the grand overture to Leonore.—Concertmeister Ries lately gave a private entertainment at his own house. We had quartets by Haydn and Beethoven, the principal performer being M. Vieuxtemps, who also played the adagio from Beethoven's small quintet in B flat in a masterly manner. Apropos to foreign musicians now in this capital, I may mention M. Louis Lacombe, who, twenty years ago, travelled through Germany with M. Vieuxtemps, when both were boys, for the purpose of giving concerts. M. Lacombe has been at Hamburgh and Leipsic. In the last-named city, he produced a cantata of his own composition, at the Gewandhaus concerts, besides giving concerts of his own. The critics of Leipsic think well of him, both as a pianist and composer.

FLORENCE.—(From a Correspondent.)—A new opera by Carlo Romani was produced at the Pergola on the 29th of March, entitled, I Baccanali di Roma, with considerable success, in spite of the hoarseness of the principal tenor, Sig. Baldanza, which necessitated a great deal of cutting in the last act. Madame Barbieri Nini was in excellent voice, and both sang and acted admirably. Both prima donna and composer were recalled several times during the progress of the opera. The appointments and scenery are magnificent, and so delighted were the audience with the last scene, that they called the scene-painter before the curtain. Verdi's Macbeth opened the season.—Our connoisseurs are enthusiastic in praise of a new contralto, Adelaide Borghi-Mammo, who made her début at a concert in the Sala dell' Arte. Her voice is powerful, of great compass, and flexible, and her method perfect. She sang, among other things, the rondo finale to Rossini's Cenerentola, and was enthusiastically applauded. You will no doubt, some day not far off, have this new Phœnix of song in London; until then, be on your guard against Italian furore.—A new oratorio called Giudita, by Sig. Emilio Cianchi, has been performed. It is very light, but was successful.

AMSTERDAM 18th Feb.—The farewell concert given by Mdlle. Sedlatzek, from Vienna, in the Salle du Parc, was highly successful. Mdlle. Sedlatzek sang arias by Donizetti, Meyerbeer, and Balfe, with great facility and taste, and was recalled at the end of each morceau to receive the applause of the audience. This young vocalist, although she has scarcely reached her twentieth year, has attained great excellence; in fact, she has sung within three months at twenty concerts in various parts of Holland, at all of which she has been received with marked favour.—(Algemeenhandelsblad.)

VERONA.—Pacini's opera, Allan Cameron, was given on the 15th of March with doubtful success. The principal artistes were Madame Salvini-Donatelli, Bettini, and Della Santa.

VENICE.—Pacini's opera La Punizione has been highly successful. The applause was unanimous, and the maestro was called on several times. Madame Albertini, the prima donna, contributed materially to the success of the opera.

TURIN.—Verdi's Trovatore has been played with considerable success, the principal singers being Mdlles. Alaimo and Emilia Goggi, and Signors Beaucarde and Fiori.

COLOGNE.—The Männer-Gesangverein have concluded a new agreement with Mr. Mitchell, to pay a second visit to London.

BRESLAU.—Mdlle. Johanna Wagner has given one performance here. The announcement of her arrival threw the Eastern question, for the moment, into the shade. The entertainment consisted of a double edition of Romeo and Juliet, the opera being preceded by the "Garden Scene" from the tragedy, by Mdlle. Wagner and Herr Baumeister. The applause was incessant. Mdlle. Wagner will return to fulfil a longer engagement in June, when she will play a series of characters new to our public, among which are Elizabeth in Wagner's Tannhäuser, Sextus, in Mozart's Titus, etc. It will be remembered that Mdlle. Wagner was an actress before she became a singer. She is a niece of Richard Wagner, the composer, who is trying to metamorphose the art of music.

SCHWERIN.—The management of the Opera displays a laudable activity. Richard Wagner's Lohengrin has been performed several times and favourably received. Euryanthe (Weber), Die Belagerung von Corinth (Rosini) and Fidelio are in preparation. The last will be produced in the course of the month. Mdlle. Teresa Milanollo has played twice at the theatre and once at court.

HAMBURGH.—Mozart's Titus has been revived for the benefit of Mdlle. Bagnig, who sustained the part of Vitellia. Report says that this lady will shortly be married, in Pesth, whence she will proceed to Broussa, in Asia Minor.—Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss has been giving concerts in the Apollo-Saal, with brilliant success.

STUTTGART.—The Abonnements-Concerte of the Royal Chapel, of which there are twelve annually, have given very great satisfaction. Hofkapellmeister Herr Kücken, is the conductor, in the absence of Herr Lindpaintner.

LEIPSIC.—Fräulein Burg has appeared as Amina with success.

REVEL.—Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser has been produced here.

ZURICH.—Beethoven's Fidelio has been revived for the benefit of Mdlle. Elbe.

WEIMAR.—Several new works by R. Schumann and Liszt were played for the first time at the concert given for the Orchester Pensionsfonds (Orchestral Pension Fund). Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor pleased much more than his Concertstück for four horns. Liszt's contributions were a chorus, "An die Künstler," for orchestra and male voices, and a symphonico-lyrical piece, Les Préludes, on a poem by Lamartine. Both were successful. A new composition by Liszt, on the music of the Hungarians and Gipsies, printed in the French, German, and Hungarian languages, will shortly be published. —Gluck's Orpheus has ben produced. Liszt's new work, Préludes nach Lamartine, has excited some curiosity; and his Künstlerchor has has been more successful here than at the Grand Music Festival at Karlsruhe.

TRIESTE.—Mr. Balfe, whose opera, La Zingarella (Bohemian Girl), pleases the audience more at each successive representation, has been engaged by the impresario, Ronzani, to compose two new operas for the autumn.

MILAN.—Dominicetti's new opera, La Maschera, has been tolerably successful at the Scala. At the Carcano, the Corsaro has been produced. Mr. Balfe has arrived here with Mad. Balfe, and Mdlle. Victoria Balfe, who is said to possess a beautiful soprano voice, which she is cultivating for the stage, under the tuition of her father.—At the Conservatory, Mendelssohn's oratorio of St. Paul is in rehearsal. The intention of the directors is to bring it out on Palm Sunday, or at Easter, but great doubts have been since entertained of its being performed at all. It seems to be too difficult for our executants, vocal and instrumental, whose beau idéal is the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, and that of Rossini as a contrast.

GENOA.—Sig. Camillo Sivori has given a concert in the Carlo Felice Theatre. The Court was present. Sig. Sivori afforded such satisfaction to his distinguished audience, that the order of "St. Mauritius" has been conferred on him.

STOCKHOLM.—A manuscript mass of Haydn has lately been discovered in the Royal Library.

DRESDEN.—Auber's Marco Spada will shortly be produced, with Mdlle. Ney and Mdme. Krebs-Michalesi in the principal female parts. Mdlle. Ney takes her congé in April, and will sing in Bremen, Cologne, Brunswick, Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Hanover (whither she is especially invited to assist at the Court concert on the King's birthday), Hamburgh, Berlin and Stettin. She has also been invited to appear at the great musical festivals in Aachen and Rotterdam, which Herr Lindpaintner is to direct. Mdlle. Sophie Cruvelli and Mdme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt were both offered engagements, which they were compelled to decline, in consequence of their intended visit to London.

GOTHA.—Mdlles. Bocholz-Falconi and von Westerstrand are the prime donne here. On the 2nd, the manager of the opera received a telegraphic despatch from a high official at the French Court, requesting that the score of the Duke's Casilda, might be instantly forwarded to Paris, as the Emperor wishes to surprise his Royal Highness by the production of his opera at the Grand Opera in Paris.—The Duke's new opera, Santa Chiara, is announced for the beginning of April.

BRUNSWICK.—Verdi's Il Trovatore is in rehearsal, at the express desire of the reigning Duke. There have been a great number of concerts lately. Among others, one of Herr Isensee, at which Mr. Litolf's overture to Robespierre, was performed under the direction of the composer himself; and the concert of the Ducal Kapelle, under the direction of the Hof kapellmeister, George Müller, the principal features of which were Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, and Berlioz's overture to the Vehmrichter. The government has placed a large room in the old Rathhaus at the disposal of the Kapelle, for their performances. At a recent meeting of the Liedertafel, the members sang three pieces of a new series of songs, entitled Die Kirmes, by Herr Abt.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—The Duke of Coburg-Gotha's opera of Tony has been performed to a crowded house. The royal composer, who was present at the first representation, expressed to the manager, Herr Hoffmann, his entire satisfaction with the ensemble, and caused all the artists to be presented to him.

PARMA.—A new opera by Sig. Emanuel Biletta, the libretto by Sig. Maggioni has been produced. It is entitled L'Abasio di Kelso.

COLOGNE.—There is a report current here, that, on account of the clouded state of the political horizon, Mr. Mitchell will not engage the members of the Männergesang-Verein this year, nor the operatic company he had intended, as was said, to bring out in London. Mendelssohn's finale to the first part of his unfinished opera, Lorely, is announced for Tuesday, the 4th.

BRESLAU.—Flotow's Indra has been given with success.

POSEN.—The Prophète is very popular. For some time past it has been given twice or thrice a week, and always to full houses.

HANOVER.—Mozart's symphony in E flat and Beethoven's overture to Leonore were performed at the seventh Abonnements-Concert. Mdme. Nottes, Herr Bernard, Mdlle. Volk, and Herr Haas, sang a quartet from the Befreites Jerusalem of Righini—a real curiosity. The concert was more than usually well attended, on account, no doubt, of Mdlle. Therese Milanollo, the violinist, who played three pieces, two of her own composition. Capellmeister Fisher conducted the vocal, and Concertmeister Joachim the instrumental, part of the performance. Mdlle. Milanollo gave a concert on her own account, on the 23rd, in the theatre, which was crowded.

ROME.—A new opera by a young composer, Signor Marchetti, pupil of the Musical College at Naples, is announced. Its title is not yet generally known.

SIENA.—A new opera: Il Maestro di Scuola, by Signor Franc. Cortesi, will be shortly produced.

CORFU.—Robert le Diable has created a perfect furore here.—Sig. Paolo Correr's new opera, Isabella d'Aspero, has been so successful, that the third representation was given for the benefit of the composer.

STETTIN.—Herr Tichatschek has appeared in Masaniello with the greatest success.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Mr. Benedict's opera Die Kreuzfahrer oder der Alte vom Berge has been produced. It has met with a very flattering reception.

GHENT.—A three act opera, La Lanterne Magique, the music by M. Méry and the libretto by M. Van Peen, both young Belgians, has been produced here with success. It is also to be brought out at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, in Brussels.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Madame La Grange selected I Puritani for her benefit, on which occasion, the theatre, which, after the San Carlo in Naples, and the Scala in Milan, is the largest in Europe, was crammed in every part. The fair bénéficiare was presented with a magnificent brooch of the value of 15,000 francs (£600) by the Empress, and a bracelet worth 10,000 francs (£400) by the subscribers. Madame La Grange is re-engaged for next year. She receives 100,000 francs (£4,000), and a guaranteed benefit. Madlle. Marai, Madlle. Cotti, Signors Lablache, Ronconi, Tamberlik, Calzolari, Debassini, Tagliafico, and Polonini have likewise signed for the ensuing season. Madlle. Yella, the Viennese danseuse,* had her benefit, and also received a handsome present from the Emperor.

NEW ORLEANS.—(From a Correspondent, Feb. 25.)—Jullien and his band are here giving concerts, and attracting crowded audiences to the Odd Fellows' Hall every evening. The band is the finest ever heard in New Orleans, and includes some of the most renowned solo players in the world. I need only mention Kœnig on the cornet-à-piston, Bottesini on the double-bass, Wuille on the clarinet, Lavigne on the oboe, Hughes on the ophicleide, and the brothers Mollenhauer, who are famous as duet players on the violin. The programmes comprise music suited to all classes. The tastes of the connoisseur, amateur, and the public in general are all consulted in the selection. A fantasia on the Huguenots, written by Jullien for the opening night, was received with immense favour. The chorus from the Conjuration scene created a furore. Jullien also gave several of his own compositions. Of these I may name the "American Quadrille," the "Sleigh Polka," the "Prima Donna Waltz," and the "Target Galop," as the most successful. The "Sleigh Polka"—composed at Boston—is one of the most exhilarating, characteristic, and, indeed, original dances I have heard. The audience on the first night were in ecstacies, and encored it unanimously. It has been repeated every evening. Two new movements from Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony were admirably performed by the band at the second performance. The New Orleans people seemed to appreciate it thoroughly, and encored the last movement. No success could be more decided than Jullien's. He came to New Orleans preceded by such a reputation, that nothing short of the highest degree of excellence could have satisfied expectation. There has been no disappointment—but rather the contrary; we got more than we expected. A grand Bal Masqué has been announced by Jullien for Tuesday next, the 28th instant, at the Orleans theatre. The tickets at five dollars each have all been bought up.

IBID.—(From a Letter, March 10.)—"Odd Fellows' Hall presented a gay and brilliant appearance, last night, on the occasion of Jullien's admirably arranged bal masqué. The hall was one blaze of light, and the multiform costumes of the maskers, whirling amidst the mazes of the dance, to the inspiring notes of the "Sleigh Polka," presented a curious and animating spectacle. All the choicest dance music of Jullien was played by the band, which was conducted till midnight by the maestro himself, and after, till half-past three, by Kœnig. The National Anthem terminated one of the gayest nights ever known in this city. There was the usual variety of fancy dresses, picturing almost every conceit that could enter into the brain of man or woman. A large number of those present wore dominoes and masks, while others were in the usual ball costume. This lent variety to the scene, and contributed to the amusement; the colloquies between the known and unknown groups being at times quite spicy.

"Jullien's last concert takes place to-night, for the benefit of Mr. Kœnig. These concerts have been a source of great satisfaction and pleasure to our music-loving citizens and visitors. They will be severally missed; for there had been nothing before in New Orleans at all to be compared to them in cheapness and attraction. One of the best things produced here by Jullien, is his new Farewell Waltz to America. It has four movements: first, we hear the signal of departure; then, secondly, a plaintive and touching melody describes the adieu to the friends whom the composer leaves behind him; then follow pleasant recollections of the time passed with them, which are interrupted by the rising of a storm at sea; America fades from sight, and the homeward-bound sail cheerily away over the broad blue waves, with favouring gales, and under a clear and sunny sky. Its performance produced a decided sensation, and formed a fitting finale to the series of musical festivals provided by the composer."

LABLACHE AND RUSSIAN GOLD.—The consequences of the prohibition of gold from Russia are very serious indeed to foreigners residing there. The case of a French actress is mentioned, who lately remitted 60,000f. to Paris, and, being compelled to send it in Russian paper, received only 45,000f. Lablache had the good luck to leave the day before the ukase was issued, and brought away with him a handsome sum in gold.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

PART I.

|---|---|
| Sinfonia, "Die Weihe der Töne" | Spohr. |
| Aria, "In diesen heil'gen Hallen," Herr Formes | Mozart. |
| Concerto in G, Pianoforte, Mr. Hallé | Beethoven. |
| Recit.—Aria ("The Praise of Jehovah"), Miss Birch | Weber. |
| Overture, "Anacreon" | Cherubini. |

PART II.

|---|---|
| Sinfonia in F, No. 8 | Beethoven. |
| Duetto ("Agnese"), Miss Birch and Herr Formes | Paer. |
| Overture, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt" | Mendelssohn. |

Conductor—Mr. Costa.

The Power of Sound is, in many respects, one of the noblest creations of the musical art. The intention is deep and metaphysical, and the execution of that intention masterly and splendid. The following is a synopsis of what the symphony is intended to illustrate :—

FIRST MOVEMENT.—(Largo) The deep Silence of Nature before the Creation of Sound—(Allegro) The Awakening of Life after it.—The Sounds of Nature—The Uproar of the Elements.

SECOND MOVEMENT.—Cradle Song—The Dance—The Serenade.

THIRD MOVEMENT.—Martial Music—March to Battle—Emotions of those left behind—Return of the Conquerors—Thanksgiving.

FOURTH MOVEMENT.—Funeral Dirge—Consolation in Grief.

We admit of no vacuum in the world of sound, and can see nothing absurd in describing silence by means of music ; for, after all, silence is sound, so infinitely divided as to be almost inaudible—we say almost, for we defy any one to assert that he has ever been enveloped in silence without hearing, as it were, a buzz, as though sound were muttering its orisons ere going to rest :—

"And solemn midnight's tingling silentness," as Shelley says beautifully. We therefore state boldly our opinion that the description of silence in Spohr's symphony, is highly felicitous and characteristic. Of the allegro in F major, which grows out of the silent movement, we know not well how to speak ; there are moments when we could think it as fine as anything in music, and, at all times, as a matter of instrumentation, we must pronounce it unsurpassed. Then its subject—so melodious, so appropriate to the infancy of sound—how charmingly it colours the entire movement, what a freshness it throws over it—and then the restless buzzing of the violins, and the many-voiced song of the birds, and the soft murmur of the breezes, and the terrific tempest, when nature is in an uproar and the departure of grumbling as they fly, as who should say, "Think not we're gone for ever!" And the return of the first charming subject, and the renewed song of the birds, and the gradual subsiding of the movement into a reposeful climax! All this is as perfect as anything we know—nothing more fresh or lovely ever came from pen of mortal—nothing! The cradle song (and here the metaphysical part of the symphony gives way to the hopes and fears of humanity) is a simple quiet tune that might lull any infant to a delicious sleep. It is interrupted by a merry dance, the very type of all playfulness ; it is again interrupted by the serenade, a wailing monotonous melody for the violoncello, which has a feeling of darkness and starlight about it that we cannot define. The continued complaint of this melancholy tune, which quietly pursues its way, through the various interruptions of the dance and the lullaby, affects us so strongly as to become a feeling of pain rather than pleasure ; and yet this is only from association, for it is as beautiful as beauty's self—this ever-weeping serenade. It must be some poor devil, the constancy of whose love is only equalled by its hopelessness, that sings it—for amid all its loveliness there is the taint of woe, and its smile is of moonlight rather than the sun. But this is of a piece with the genius of Spohr, which delights in wringing the human heart. The unexpected return to the cradle song is ingenious and happy. The march is a triumph of instrumentation—one of the most exhilarating things in the range of music. The trio pleases us less—it is laboured, and excessively spun out, and rather morbid than impassioned. The return of the march, however, and the thanksgiving coda redeem the tiresomeness of this, and restore us to the seventh heaven of music. The prayer for the dead, and the consoling beauty of the finale are beyond all praise. The only reproach to this last movement is its brevity.

The execution of Spohr's symphony was not so satisfactory as might have been desired, though in some respects it was very fine. The first allegro would have been unexceptionable, had there been a little more delicacy and precision in the more prominent passages for the wood instruments, especially where the birds are represented. The march was splendidly played. The andantino, with its three subjects in combination, was taken too slow, and suffered materially in consequence. The same fault was attributable to the finale, which is marked allegretto, and was taken almost andante. The whole sentiment of the movement was thus destroyed. But how often must we insist that, for such large and elaborate compositions as the Power of Sound, more than one rehearsal is imperative ; but the Philharmonic Society disdains to afford more than one rehearsal to any work, however intricate and difficult. M. Jullien has frequently given the first part of this symphony at his concerts, but it has very rarely been played entire in this country ; twice only, we believe, at the Philharmonic—once under Dr. Spohr's immediate direction.

Beethoven's symphony went infinitely better than Spohr's. The band were up to the mark ; and, having played it frequently they required no extra rehearsals. The whole was well executed, and the famous allegretto scherzando encored. The overtures were played in a manner worthy the reputation of the Philharmonic band. It was to be lamented, however, that Anacreon did not occupy the position held by Mendelssohn's overture in the programme. Such a work as the Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage should have been placed at the end of the first part. One advantage, however, was gained by its being given at the conclusion—nearly the whole of the audience remained to hear it.

Beethoven's concerto is the most difficult ever written for the pianoforte, and one of the most exquisite, fanciful, and melodious. No one less than a consummate master of the instrument could play it as it should be played ; and M. Hallé, it is almost needless to say, executed it to perfection. He played it entirely from memory, and added another to his London triumphs. He was applauded with enthusiasm.

Miss Birch sang the air from Weber's cantata with great spirit and effect ; and the duet from Agnese, with Herr Formes, was an excellent performance. Herr Formes was in his best voice, and sang the air from the Zauberflöte with great power and genuine expression.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE second concert, which took place on Wednesday evening, was different in many respects from the first. There was greater variety in the programme ; the tastes of more than one class were consulted ; and the selection altogether was better adapted to a mixed audience. The following was the scheme :—

|---|---|
| Overture (Naïades) | W. Sterndale Bennett. |
| Scena (Euryanthe), Herr Formes | Weber. |
| Concerto, Violin and Orchestra—Violin, Herr Ernst | Mendelssohn. |
| Aria, "Ah perfido," Madame Caradori | Beethoven. |
| Symphony in F, No. 8 | Beethoven. |

PART II.

|---|---|
| Overture (Der Standhafte Prinz) | Lindpaintner. |
| Aria, "Parto, ma tu, ben," Mdlle. Sedlatzek | Mozart. |
| Serenade, Pianoforte and Orchestra—Pianoforte, Mdlle. Graever | Mendelssohn. |
| Duetto, "O terror!" (Les Huguenots) Madame Caradori and Herr Formes | Meyerbeer. |
| Fantasia on Hungarian Airs, Violin, Herr Ernst. | |
| Overture (Masaniello) | Auber. |

Conductor, Herr Lindpaintner.

The introduction of the work of an English composer was a good sign. The New Philharmonic Society had already brought forward one or two compositions of native musicians, and will do well to persevere in that course of policy. Mr. Sterndale Bennett's overture, a work of exquisite fancy and refinement, is too seldom heard. On the whole it was finely played, though a little more delicacy would occasionally have been desirable.

Mendelssohn's violin concerto shares with that of Beethoven the admiration of musicians. It is a noble work, and full of inspiration. Herr Ernst's performance was worthy of himself and the music. His execution was brilliant, his tone sympathetic, his feeling intense, his style unaffected, his expression warm and natural. The times in each movement were in strict accordance with the intentions of Mendelssohn, and not a single "point" was forgotten. Herr Ernst achieved a triumphant success, and was unanimously recalled at the end.

The "event" of the concert was Beethoven's eighth symphony. In this most original and fanciful work, the band of the New Philharmonic appeared to greater advantage than on any previous occasion; and, indeed, it may be doubted whether a so generally faultless performance of the "ballet symphony" (as some quidnuncs have styled it) was ever heard before in this country. Much of this success must be attributed to Herr Lindpaintner, whose qualifications as a conductor were never more prominently displayed. The pianos and fortes, the most delicate nuances, the gradations of tone, the changes of expression, and the varieties of colouring, which the composer has marked in his score, were as rigidly adhered to as the composer himself could have wished. Such a performance could not fail to awaken enthusiasm. Each movement was received with a torrent of applause, and the allegretto scherzando—one of the most quaint and delicate inspirations of Beethoven—was unanimously encored. In short, the performance of the eighth symphony was a triumph for the orchestra, and for Herr Lindpaintner, the conductor.

Herr Lindpaintner's overture—a musical prelude to one of Calderon's dramas—is brilliant and vigorous, written with great clearness, and scored for the orchestra with the skill of an accomplished musician. It was played to absolute perfection, and received with enthusiasm by the audience. Mdlle. Graever was not very happy in her selection. She played the serenade well, and with the right feeling; but the rondo is one of those Mendelssohnian scherzi, which, besides being extremely difficult, should be played, as Joseph Joachim says, "as quick as possible;" and, it must be admitted, that rapid execution is hardly the forte of Mdlle. Graever. At the same time, we have heard Mdlle. Graever play much better than on Wednesday night.

The fantasia of Herr Ernst was not wanted after the grand effect he produced in the concerto. It was, nevertheless, warmly applauded by the audience, who were enchanted with the manner in which the slow melody was sung, and astonished at the tours de force. The Airs Hongrois, moreover, are universally known and admired. Auber's dramatic and splendid overture was too good to serve as a voluntary to play the audience out. Nevertheless, it was a good voluntary, and was played in as brief a space of time as possible, and ended the concert with immense éclat.

The vocal music was good. The duet from the Huguenots is better on the stage. It was finely sung, however, by Madame Caradori and Herr Formes. The air from Il Flauto Magico was magnificently delivered by the German bass, and produced an undeniable impression. Mdme. Caradori was very successful in Beethoven's magnificently dramatic air, but the cantabile in the last movement should only be sung slowly when it comes at the end. Mdlle. Sedlatzek has a pleasing voice, and sings well. In Mozart's difficult air she displayed good taste, facility, and a correct method. Her début was very successful. Mr. Lazarus played the clarionet obbligato to perfection.

Dr. Wylde's Paradise Lost, produced last season with so much success by the New Philharmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, will be repeated at the next concert; and Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss will make her first appearance, in a concerto by one of the great masters.

Mdlle. Wilhelmina Clauss will arrive in town, from Paris, on Wednesday next.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

The third series was brought to a close on Thursday evening. The concert was one of the best of the set—as may be seen by the following programme:—

|---|---|
| Quartet, D minor | Mozart. |
| Sonata, in G, piano and violin | Beethoven. |
| Quartet in F (No. 1) | Beethoven. |
| Aria, | Stradella. |
| Canzone | Gordigiani. |
| Solo, violoncello | Piatti. |
| "Ricordanza," voice and violin | Piatti. |
| Solos, pianoforte | C. Hallé. |

Executants:—First violin: Herr Ernst.—Second violin: Herr Pollitzer. Viola: Herr Ries.—Violoncello: Sig. Piatti.—Pianoforte: Mr. Hallé. Vocalist: Mdme. Amedei.

The performance of Mozart's quartet was unexceptionably good. Ernst was in his best mood, and played like a true poet. His sensitiveness of tone, his large and expressive style, are peculiarly adapted to the first movement, which is very grand and passionate. The andante was exquisitely sung, and the minuet and trio narrowly escaped an encore. The last movement, which affords the violinist a wider field for the display of his executive powers, was, perhaps, the greatest treat of all. The audience could not restrain their manifestations of satisfaction, and continually interrupted the performance by their applause. Herren Pollitzer and Ries appeared as substitutes for Messrs. Goffrie and Hill, who were required at the Royal Italian Opera, and proved themselves in all respects competent. We need say nothing of Sig. Piatti, who is perfect in all styles of music, and is never better matched than when playing with Herr Ernst. The great violoncellist and the great violinist are worthy of each other.

With Herr Ernst and Mr. Hallé at the violin and piano, nothing short of a perfect performance of Beethoven's sonata was expected. Both did their utmost to give effect to the manifold beauties by their execution of this exquisite work, and their playing was masterly throughout. Each movement was loudly applauded, and the two performers were recalled at the end.

The quartet of Beethoven would, doubtless, have been the great feature of the concert, had not Ernst been seized with sudden indisposition at the end of the second movement, which prevented him from terminating the performance. This, though provoking, was hardly to be wondered at, when it is considered that Herr Ernst had been playing for nearly two hours incessantly, and that the heat of the room was intense. Moreover, the work he has lately gone through at different concerts—playing, on the night previous, twice at Exeter Hall and twice at the New Philharmonic Society—was too much for one of his peculiar temperament. The performance of such overpowering music as the Adagio in Beethoven's quartet, into which he threw his whole soul, was another cause of over-excitement; and the ultimate result was natural enough. The interruption to the performance was the more to be regretted, since the audience were enraptured with the first two movements. Beethoven's first published quartet is perhaps the finest of the set of six to which it belongs. The second movement, Adagio affettuoso ed appassionato, is wonderfully pathetic and touching, and, when played by such artists as Herr Ernst and Sig. Piatti, with an efficient second violin and tenor, almost harrows the feelings. We never saw an audience more absorbed in listening to music. The fall of a pin might have been heard in the room.

The solo of Signor Piatti, introduced for the first time, was a marvellous performance. The composition is both interesting and effective. Madame Amedei sang extremely well. Signor Gordigiani's canzone is graceful and flowing, and was much admired. Signor Piatti's M.S. romanza, "La Ricordanza" is a charming example of the sentimental school of romance. The violoncello obbligato was played by the composer, and the pianoforte accompaniments by Sig Li Calsi. Mr. F. Praeger accompanied Madame Amedei in Stradella's aria. Mr. Hallé, as usual, introduced a selection of short pieces from Mendelssohn and others at the end. A better termination to Mr. Ella's third winter campaign could not have been desired.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 8TH, 1854.

MOZART'S Requiem has been composed more than sixty years. Many consider it the masterpiece of the author of Don Juan; and all who are capable of judging regard it as one of his greatest works, and one of his most sublime inspirations. Perhaps in no country is the genius of Mozart more widely appreciated than in England. His symphonies, quartets, and compositions for the pianoforte are generally known, and esteemed at their proper value. His Masses are admired, even by the members of our most hyperprotestant communions who are wise enough to know that questions of art are not questions of religion, and that a man may be enthusiastic about one of Raphael's Madonnas without being necessarily a Roman Catholic. His operas—that is: the best of them—are universally popular; and it would not, in England, be looked upon as heterodox to pronounce Don Juan as great a chef-d'œuvre as the Messiah of Handel. In short, no composer—nor Handel, nor Beethoven, nor Haydn, nor Mendelssohn—is more generally known, or more devotedly worshipped, by the amateurs and musicians of this country, than Wolfgang Amadeus Theophilus Mozart. It may be said, indeed, that whatever controversies are raised about the respective merits of this and that musician, no matter who, when the question of absolute supremacy arises, there is but one voice in England, and that voice is raised for MOZART, the immortal and incomparable composer, who wrote Don Juan, the Jupiter symphony, the quintet in G minor, and———the Requiem.

Don Juan is as well known as Don Juan. Mozart has made quite as strong an impression with his libertine as Byron with his, and one which is likely, we imagine, to last much longer. Certainly, in the great endeavour to fix the archetype of profligacy and heartlessness as an eternal image in the world's mind, Mozart, the poor musician, has driven Byron, the rich poet, out of the field. But, if Mozart had done nothing more, he would not have won the allegiance of Beethoven, who only believed in the pure manifestations of genius, and had little sympathy with mere worldliness, even in its most dazzling aspect. The author of the Pastoral Symphony sympathised with everything in nature, animate and inanimate, except downright vice and wickedness, unredeemed by any quality to throw into the opposite scale. He, Beethoven, noble and single-minded, looked upon Mozart as the first of composers—not on account of his Don Juan, but because he had written the Zauberflöte and the Requiem.

Beethoven's opinion of the Requiem has been universally endorsed; and though, in truth, Don Juan is the chef-d'œuvre of Mozart, the first is conventionally allowed to take the highest place in the catalogue of his works, and is really so near to the mark that few will venture on the task of dislodging it from its throne. Notwithstanding this, however, and in the face of Mozart's immense popularity in England, it is only now—more than sixty years since it was composed—that the Requiem has been fairly introduced to the general public. For this, we have to thank the Sacred Harmonic Society, whose performances, during the last and present seasons, have done more to explain the mysterious and hitherto unaccountable reputation enjoyed by the grandest, most elaborate, and most gloomy of Mozart's contributions to Church music, than was ever effected by other means.

Now that the Requiem has become suddenly popular, and is bidding fair, in conjunction with the Lobgesang of Mendelssohn, to rival in attraction even the Messiah and Elijah, and to constitute a mine of wealth for the Sacred Harmonic Society, it will neither be out of place nor uninteresting to put the work in its proper light before the public. Everybody knows, who cares to know, that the score—the Requiem itself, in short, without reference to instrumentation—was left unfinished, and that, at the request of Mozart's widow, Sussmayer, a pupil of the illustrious composer, undertook to complete it. How much was Mozart's, however, and how much Sussmayer's, is not very generally known. We shall endeavour to make this out, as clearly as possible, and from the best authority. Meanwhile we must put our readers on their guard, not only against the testimony of M. André, of Offenbach, but against that of Mozart's own wife, who, in a letter addressed to M. André, gives to Mozart's pupil a much more important share of the Requiem than subsequent testimony and subsequent research have been willing to accord him. The following is a literal translation of the letter:—

"Vienna, 26th Nov., 1800.

"To procure the original score of the Requiem entire is impossible, both to me and you. Dr. Sortschen, who lives here, has returned it to the Anonymous, and only in the houses of S. was I permitted to have it compared by Stadler with my copy, or Breitkopf's edition. The consequence of which is, not only that my copy of Breitkopf's edition is more correct than this edition itself, but the improvements inserted by a masterhand cause my copy to be even more correct than the original itself. I leave this, my copy, at ——, and you then may with security announce that your pianoforte arrangement has been made from a copy most carefully corrected and compared with the original score. I have said that my copy is better than the original. You know (entre nous) that the whole of the Requiem is not by Mozart,—for example, many middle parts, and will, therefore, not blame him for the errors there are in the original. But I will do for your sake still more. I will procure you Dies Iræ, Tuba mirum, Rex tremendæ, Recordare, Confutatis, and Sanctus, and entrust to you the following secret:—Of all that precedes the Dies Iræ, Anonymous possesses the original. Mozart only wrote in the Dies Iræ, Tuba mirum, Rex tremendæ, Recordare, and Confutatis, the principal parts, and of the middle parts, little or nothing—those were added by another person, and that two different handwritings might not appear, he copied like Mozart's writing. You now know positively all Mozart wrote of the Requiem—that I have said above; thereto, may be added, towards the end, the mere repetitions: the Sanctus which I procure for you is in the original handwriting of him who composed this piece, as well as all the rest. To this may be added, that the middle parts of what I procure for you are different from those in Breitkopf's edition—as they are in this, so they are (with the exception of small improvements) in the original of the Anonymous; the completer must, therefore, have written them twice, and you may, therefore, choose between the two, if you think it right. The Sanctus is likewise entirely by the completer, but in the rest only such as has been parenthesed with pencil. You might, therefore, with truth, assert that your arrangement is an immediate extract from the original of six pieces (there are but twelve in the whole).

"(Signed) C. MOZART."

The quantity of errors in the above can only be explained in one of two ways. Either Mdme. Constance Mozart was entirely ignorant of music, or cared very little for the memory and the fame of her immortal first husband. The facts of her second marriage with M. Nissen, and her being unable to point out the place where Mozart was buried, are significant. But let us not be uncharitable. Mdme. Mozart was a woman; and when her husband died, she took another. So did the widow of Percy Bysshe Shelley, the poet.* Mrs. Shelley, however, did much more justice to her deceased husband. She brought out a carefully edited and very complete edition of his works, in prose and poetry; while Mdme. Mozart seemed to know so little about those of her's, that she allowed a pretender, called Sussmayer, to assume almost a partnership in what the world regarded as his greatest work—the Requiem. But this is only the preamble to what we have to say.

* So did not the widow of Mendelssohn.

THE ST. MARGARET'S ESTATE, RICHMOND.—At a meeting of the Executive Committee on the 28th ult., it was unanimously resolved, that the allotment of the picturesque estate of 75 acres on the banks of the Thames, purchased of Lord Kilmorey, should be fixed for Wednesday, June 7th, the purchase money having been paid up on Lady-day, and the title-deeds handed over to the Conservative Land Society. On the 30th, Colonel Brownlow KNOX, M.P., the vice-chairman, accompanied by the solicitors, Messrs. Harrison and Lewis; the surveyor, G. Morgan, Esq.; and the secretary, C. L. Gruneisen, Esq., had an interview with a deputation of the Board of Directors of the South Western Railroad respecting the erection of a new station at St. Margaret's, between Richmond and Twickenham Stations, and also the granting of free passes to the allottees who may build on the estate. It is anticipated that the result of this conference will prove highly gratifying to the shareholders. It is intended to preserve, if possible, the magnificent mansion on the estate, built by Cubitt from the designs of Vullamy.

QUARTET CONCERTS, CROSBY HALL.—The last of Mr. Dando's concerts came off on Monday week. The quartets were Beethoven's in A (No. 5) and Haydn's in B flat, (No. 78). Mendelssohn's pianoforte trio in C minor (Op. 66) was finely played by Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, Dando, and Lucas, and Miss Lascelles sang three songs, and gave special satisfaction in Waley's song, "Voglein." Kuhlau's quartet for flute and stringed instruments, although presenting few points of interest, was beautifully executed, Mr. Pratten taking the flute. Haydn's sonata in E flat, played by Mr. Sterndale Bennett, was a novelty and a masterly performance. The room was quite full. We omitted to notice Miss Binfield Williams's performance last week. It was, nevertheless, highly creditable to her talent as a pianist, and much applauded.

MR. F. BERTIOLI'S concert on Tuesday, at the Hanover Square Rooms, was attended by a fashionable audience. Mr. F. Bertioli is a very young man, and this was his first public attempt. He seems to have studied to good purpose, his execution on the concertina being pleasing and correct. We have seldom witnessed a more promising début by a performer on this popular instrument. Mr. Bertioli was assisted by Miss Poole; Miss Ransford, who was encored in the ballad, "Sweet Mary of the Vale;" Miss Messent; and the Misses Brougham, who sang Glover's two duets, "Love in thine Eyes" and "The Cousins;" Messrs. George Tedder, Wallworth, and Perrin. Mr. F. Chatterton played a new fantasia on the harp; and the Messrs. G. and J. Case joined Mr. Bertioli in several concerted pieces on the concertina. Mr. Bertioli was encored in a solo by Mr. G. Case. Messrs. Guglielmo and Case presided at the piano.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE eighth season commenced on Saturday night with Rossini's opera of Guillaume Tell. The Royal Italian Opera is now an established institution. It has supplied a public want. Fixed upon this solid basis, its permanency, under wise direction, can no longer be matter for conjecture. Through many obstacles and reverses, it has attained a first place among the operatic theatres of Europe, and its present hold on public opinion is so firm that nothing can shake it but gross mismanagement. Mr. Gye, whose fourth year of responsible dictatorship was inaugurated on Saturday, has hitherto done so well that there can be little apprehension of illiberality or mistaken policy on his part. The prospectus for the current season, of which the particulars have been published, shows, on the whole, an increase rather than a diminution of enterprise.

Although everybody regards Guillaume Tell as the masterpiece of Rossini, and Rossini himself is of that opinion, ever since its first production at the Grand Opera of Paris, more than twenty years ago, circumstances have combined against its complete success. Its high claims to consideration as a work of genius have been unanimously admitted by the critics, and perhaps no single effort of a great composer has been so much talked about and extolled. In Guillaume Tell, while extorting the admiration of those judges who profess to look upon the Italian school as an inferior demonstration of the lyrical art, Rossini has contrived to retain the suffrages of his former adherents, and even to raise their enthusiasm to a still higher pitch. Guillaume Tell was cited triumphantly by the Italians, as a proof that their idol could follow in the footsteps of the Transmontane composers, and outstrip them on their own ground. The argument, nevertheless, tells in favour of the German side, since, if the German school of opera be inferior to the Italian, and if the opinion that Guillaume Tell belongs to the German or rather Franco-German school be sound, why do the Italians count Guillaume Tell as the chef-d'œuvre of Rossini? It is plain that the Italians tacitly acknowledge the superiority of the Transmontane composers, although their national vanity is too great to permit them to own it. Their adoration of Guillaume Tell, however, and the preference they accord it over all the other operas of its composer—argumenti gratiâ, it may be—place them in a dilemma from which no modern Protagoras can extricate them.

From the first opening of the Royal Italian Opera the production of Guillaume Tell was looked forward to with universal interest. No opera, it was justly concluded, would give a larger field for the display of the splendid vocal and instrumental resources under the direction of Mr. Costa; while, as a spectacle, it offered ample opportunities for the exhibition of that completeness and liberality for which the new establishment had won a name at the outset. It was at length produced, on Saturday, August 12, 1848, and, to the surprise of every one, with a very moderate degree of success. As usual, circumstances combined against it. Roger, the tenor, who played Arnold, was ill, and made a complete fiasco in the "Suives moi," which proved quite beyond his physical means. The other principal artists in the cast were Madame Castellan (Matilda), Mdlle. Corbari (Jemmy), Signor Tamburini (Tell), Signor Polonini (Melcthal), and Signor Marini (Walter). The opera was well got up, the orchestra and chorus were admirable, and no pains had been spared. In spite of all this, however, it was only played once, and, until Thursday night, April 1, 1852, was not again attempted.

The great drawback to the opera of Guillaume Tell is the book, one of the most insipid and one of the least dramatic ever written. The subject is a good one, but the author has made nothing out of it. What is good in a play is not necessarily good in an opera; and, in following Schiller's well-known drama, the compiler of the libretto has forgotten to supply Rossini with a number of situations sufficiently striking and sufficiently well contrasted to sustain the musical interest of a grand opera in four acts. In Paris, although the music created a furore, it was, after some time, found expedient to curtail it; and the fourth act was lopped off, with the single exception of the air with chorus (for Arnold) "Suivez moi," which was retained, in consequence of the effect of a C in alt, introduced, at the termination, by M. Duprez, then in the height of his popularity. This was a sorry compliment to Rossini, to whom the "Ut de poitrine" was then, and has been ever since, a cauchemar. The result was a sad one for the art. Rossini, stung by the misappreciation of his greatest work, and jealous of the growing fame of Meyerbeer—too wise to throw away fine music upon a dull and ill-contrived libretto—retired into Italy, and threw aside his pen, which no consideration has since induced him to resume. Thus the greatest composer of dramatic music since Mozart, the man who, in opposition to Weber, won the palm for modern Italy against modern Germany, was lost to the art at the early age of 38—when his means were ripe, his acquirements matured, and his genius in its zenith.

The cast, this season, differs from that of last year. M. Zelger supplies the place of Herr Formes in Walter, Mdlle. Marai, a débutante, that of Mdme. Castellan in Matilda; Mdlle. Nantier Didiée represents Jemmy, vice Mdlle. Bellini (retired), and Sig. Fortini, Leutoldo, instead of Sig. Rommi. The whole of these changes can hardly be said to be improvements. Herr Formes must be allowed to bear the palm from M. Zelger, both as actor and singer, and Mdme. Castellan's Matilda was considered her most successful performance. It is a matter of regret that this charming artist should have ceased to belong to the Royal Italian troupe. We are assured, however, that her services were in request, but that she could not be obtained, in consequence of a prior engagement at the grand opera of Lisbon. Mdlle. Marai, the substitute of Mdme. Castellan, is an accomplished singer, of the French school. Her voice, though neither rich nor powerful, is very pleasing and flexible. Her method is good, her articulation clear and distinct, and she has evidently been carefully trained. Though very young, she is by no means devoid of confidence. She is a native of Vienna, of very fair complexion—a thorough blonde, in short—with a pleasing expression of face, and a figure remarkably petite. In such parts as Adalgisa, Lisa, and—if Madame Bosio should decline the part—Marcellina in Fidelio, Mdlle. Marai will be found eminently useful and attractive. We should have liked her better in Matilda, had she not introduced so many changes and unnecessary ornaments in the music. She sang the air, "Selva opaca," very gracefully, and produced a decidedly favourable effect. The same thing may be said of the duet in the second act, with Arnoldo. Mdlle. Marai would do well in future to take her partner, Signor Tamberlik, as a model. The singing of that admirable artist in this duet, was as true to the text as in every other part of the opera in which he was concerned. Mdlle. Nantier Didiée is an excellent artist, and, for the first time, we were almost satisfied with the quartet and barcarolle (Act I.), which, with the good voice and steady singing of Mdlle. Cotti, went much better than usual. On the whole, Mdlle. Didiée is the best Jemmy, except Corbari, we have seen at Covent Garden. Signor Fortini, apparently, has a good barytone voice, but he was too nervous to do himself justice. He sang out of tune, and unsteadily. The part of Leutoldo, however, gives little chance to the singer, who does not seem to have improved since he was at Her Majesty's Theatre. We shall be better able to judge of him, however, on a future occasion. So much for the novelties in the cast.

Signors Tamberlik, Ronconi, and Tagliafico have returned in as full force as ever. Indeed, the Arnoldo of Sig. Tamberlik on Saturday was even more forcible, passionate, and thoroughly dramatic than on any previous occasion. He was in magnificent voice, and electrified the audience in the trio of the second act, and again, in "Suivez-moi," with the astounding C C C in alt from the chest. That Signor Tamberlik is the best Arnold who has ever appeared on any stage, without excepting Duprez, can hardly be doubted. Tagliafico's Gesler is perfect.

What a pity Signor Ronconi cannot sing the music of Guillaume Tell as it is written! What a pity that, to suit his voice, so much of it is obliged to be altered or transposed! What a pity that the duet, "Dove vai," must be "arranged," so as to enable Signor Ronconi to sing it with effect! What a pity, in short, that Signor Ronconi has not a bass voice at his disposal, when he has to appear as the hero of Rossini's masterpiece. But for this, no acting and no singing could possibly be finer than that of Signor Ronconi in Guillaume Tell. He was admirable in the meeting of the cantons, and transcendant in the scene where Tell is forced by the tyrant, Gesler, to shoot the apple from the head of his son, Jemmy.

The general performance of the opera was not entirely satisfactory. The first act left much to desire. The horns behind the scenes were indifferent, and the chorus, on many occasions, was tame and out of sorts, wanting in precision, and defective in intonation. There had not been sufficient rehearsals, we suppose—or there was only one, which is not enough for Guillaume Tell. The second act, on the contrary, was magnificent. The chorus of the inhabitants of Uri was sung a little too pianissimo, and could scarcely be heard; but all the rest was beyond reproach. The band has been diminished in numbers. Mr. Willy and Mr. Blagrove (two of the first violins), and Mr. Jarrett (the third horn), are no longer members. Three such men could not well be spared now, especially that Mr. Thomas, Mr. Lovell Phillips, Sig. Piatti, and Sig. Bottesini have seceded from the ranks. The chorus has, we think, been strengthened, in the female voices; and the corps de ballet is vastly improved. The dances, both in the first and third acts, were far superior to last year. This is a step in the right direction. Without an efficient corps de ballet the performance of the grand operas of the French school is necessarily incomplete. The ballet is an indispensable element in the general effect, and we are glad to find that it has engaged the serious attention of the management. The Tyrolienne was danced on Saturday by Mdlles. Battalini and Esper, and M. Desplaces. The first lady is new, and an acquisition. The second was well known at Her Majesty's Theatre as one of the most attractive of Mr. Lumley's troupe of coryphées. As usual, the ballet music was curtailed in both acts; but what was preserved was well done, and the audience were gratified and pleased. Mr. Costa obtained a flattering reception on taking his seat in the orchestra.

There were two encores—the overture, which was brilliantly executed, and the slow movement of the trio in the second act, which was superbly sung by Signors Tamberlik, Ronconi, and M. Zelger. After the opera, the National Anthem was performed. Mdlles. Marai and Nantier Didiée taking the solo verses. The manifestations of loyalty on the part of the audience, when Mdlle. Nantier Didiée sang the significant words—

"Confound their politics, Frustrate their knavish tricks," was no more than was to be expected under the circumstances. The house was crammed to suffocation. It was the best "first night" since the Royal Italian Opera was inaugurated in 1847.

DRAMATIC.

DRURY LANE.—On Monday evening week, Mr. Brooke having completed his engagement, a troupe of Chinese Jugglers made their appearance and exhibited their feats and tricks before a densely crowded audience. Opinion seems divided with regard to their merits—some contending that they are no better than their fellow-exhibitors in the streets, while others insist that their performances are wonderful and unprecedented. We think, with Sir Roger de Coverley, that much may be said on both sides, while we decidedly lean to a belief in the astonishing powers of these celestial conjurors. Certainly, many of the tricks and tumblings of the Chinese professors may be witnessed occasionally in our squares and back streets—but are such al fresco bungling attempts at exhibition to be compared with the finished and unerring performances of the Drury Lane troupe? As well compare Mr. G. V. Brooke's Macbeth to Macready's. However, we advise our readers to go and judge for themselves. We are convinced they will not come away disappointed.

ADELPHI.—"Give me a point on which to place a lever, and I will move the world," said Archimedes. "Give me a title and I will write a farce," says the modern dramatist. The Moustache Movement is a title, and, at the present moment, a good one, and Mr. R. Brough has written a good farce on it. When we tell our readers that the principal parts were sustained by Mr. Keeley and his clever wife, supported by Messrs. Parselle, Sanders, Garden, and Miss Mary Keeley (on this occasion, mirabile dictu, without a song); that Mr. Keeley was overpoweringly funny, and made up in the most magnificent style; that Mrs. Keeley, that great artist, never played better, being, in fact, "immense;" that the audience shouted and laughed and laughed and shouted, ending by calling for the author, who was led on by Mr. Leigh Murray, some idea may be formed of the success of the piece. The plot we shall not describe; we might as well invite a friend to take a glass of gin and water and set a bottle before him, from which the contents had already been drained. All we have to say, is: "Go and see the Moustache Movement."

The laughable comedietta, of His First Champagne, was revived on the same night, Mr. Leigh Murray sustaining the principal character, Horatio Craven, M.A. The bashfulness assumed by Mr. Murray in the first act, contrasted well with his hilarity and drunken impudence, in the second, when, after repeated libations of "his first champagne," he becomes overpowered, throws off all reserve—

"Et farvet multo linguaque mensque mero."

In spite of the temptation to exaggerate which this character holds out, Mr. Leigh Murray "o'ersteps not the modesty of nature," and disdains recourse to claptrap for the purpose of "bringing down" the audience, as the phrase goes, absurdly enough. Whatever he does is polished, gentlemanly, life-like and true. Mr. Selby was amusing, though, perhaps, a little too stagey, as Dicky Watts. Messrs. Garden and Rogers are entitled to some praise. The latter gentleman, indeed, who is not quite at home in too important parts, displays a certain quaintness and individuality in smaller characters. Miss Fanny Maskell has improved, and Miss Emma Harding, who played an insignificant part, looked well, and listened well to those who had anything to say to her. The revival was quite successful.

HAYMARKET.—Miss Cushman concluded her engagement at this theatre last night. Her farewell performances were Meg Merrilies in Guy Mannering, and Juliana in the Honeymoon. Actors are naturally fond of displaying the versatility of their talents, and, for that reason, no doubt, Miss Cushman selected two such widely different authors as Tobin and Shakspere, and two such opposite characters as Queen Katherine and Juliana. We promised our readers last week a few words about Miss Cushman's Katherine.

King Henry the Eighth is the unluckiest of plays. For its own sake it is seldom or never acted. If produced, it is either to exhibit some eminent tragedian as Cardinal Wolsey—when the curtain drops on the third act, and the play closes with Wolsey's disgrace—or some celebrated actress as Katherine—when the death of the Queen is made the termination of the drama—or else it is got up merely as a vehicle for spectacle and pageantry. Half a century before Doctor Johnson's time, we learn that Henry the Eighth drew the people together in multitudes during the greater part of the winter, by the splendour and display of the coronation procession. (Perhaps Scribe knew this when he wrote the Prophète, and his coronation scene.) Even the Kembles, when the whole family were included in the cast—Mrs. Siddons, Katherine; John Kemble, Wolsey; Charles Kemble, Cromwell; and Stephen Kemble, Henry—could not do without the aid of crowds of subordinates, lots of spangles, and no end of torches. Nevertheless, Henry the Eighth, notwithstanding Doctor Johnson's unjust strictures, is entirely worthy of Shakspere, though, according to the opinion of managers, it is not well adapted to the stage, and, in consequence, only occasionally revived. Henry the Eighth has been produced with great completion at Sadler's Wells by Mr. Phelps, who has proved himself a zealous upholder of Shakspere.

The performance of Henry the Eighth at the Haymarket must not be criticised severely, as it was revived for no other purpose than to afford Miss Cushman the opportunity of appearing in one of her greatest characters. As, however, the play was cut down to four acts, and as two-thirds of these were omitted, it seems unaccountable that Miss Cushman should have left out the scene between Katherine and the two Cardinals, Wolsey and Campeius, at the beginning of the third act. Some of this scene is wonderfully beautiful and affecting. It were easy to imagine how Miss Cushman would have spoken the following lines of the Queen:—

"Would I had never trod this English earth,
Or felt the flatteries that grow upon it!
Ye have angels' faces, but heav'n knows your hearts.
[To the Cardinals.

What will become of me now, wretched lady?
I am the most unhappy woman living.—
Alas! poor wenches, where are now your fortunes?
[To her women.

Shipwreck'd upon a kingdom, where no pity,
No friends, no hope; no kindred weep for me,
Almost, no grave allow'd me:—Like the lily,
That once was mistress of the field, and flourish'd,
I'll hang my head, and perish——."

It is not easy to understand how Miss Cushman could have overlooked a scene so profoundly poetical and dramatic. Of her delineation of Queen Katherine, it is impossible to speak too highly. Powerful, truthful, and intellectual, it may be compared with the finest and most finished representations of the modern stage. Miss Cushman's voice is low and plaintive, and its effect in the sorrowing exclamations of the unfortunate queen, with which the play abounds, was as music breathing sadness. Her calm and unostentatious bearing in the first scene cannot be sufficiently admired; but even this was surpassed in the trial scene, where every variety of emotion seems, in turn, to sway the heart of Katherine. The gradual working up of passion until it reaches its climax, and with the dignity preserved to the last moment, till, all sense of her position being merged in her afflictions, the queen rushes off the stage, as in utter despair, was singularly fine. A grand point was made in this scene, when, after appealing to the king to postpone the trial, Wolsey and Campeius both urging the necessity of its proceeding, Katherine, after a pause, calls out, "Lord Cardinal"—and Campeius approaching, she motions him away with a wave of her hand, and turning with looks of indignation to Wolsey, exclaims in a voice of thunder, "To you I speak." Miss Cushman electrified the house in this striking incident. It was Siddons come to life again. Indeed the whole of this scene was a masterpiece of tragic skill and power, and left an impression not easy to be effaced. The dying scene was elaborated by Miss Cushman with her usual art and discrimination; but we are inclined to think the exhibition in detail of physical rather than mental suffering, was something beyond the legitimate province of art, however true to the spirit of the text. Acting, too minutely natural, becomes melodramatic. Something must be left to the imagination of the spectator, or poetry is sacrificed. A camera obscura will give a perfectly truthful representation of a landscape; but, would that reality be comparable to a picture of the same scene by Reubens. Nature may be too closely copied, and the line of demarcation must be drawn somewhere.

It is gratifying to be enabled to state that Miss Cushman, after a tour of two months in the provinces, will return to the Haymarket. She will then, in all probability, appear as Romeo, in Romeo and Juliet, a character, which, like Meg Merrilies, she may be said to have made entirely her own. Miss Cushman's Romeo—like Rachel's Camille, and Macready's King Lear—has become thoroughly identified with the artist, and should never be omitted from a series of her performances. Mr. Buckstone, we understand, was only prevented from bringing out Shakspere's Romeo and Juliet, during the late engagement of Miss Cushman, by the difficulty of procuring a lady to whom the part of Juliet might be entrusted. Let us hope that when Miss Cushman comes back this difficulty may be solved.

In the recent representations of Guy Mannering, Mr. St. Albyn succeeded Mr. Elliot Galer, as Henry Bertram, and sings the airs with a great deal of taste. Miss Cushman's Meg Merrilies, so far from ceasing to attract, seems to have excited the audiences more and more every time it was repeated. It was as grand, as striking, and as inspired as ever.

STRAND.—The latest novelties have been a pièce de circonstance called Russian Tyranny, and a farce called Shooting the Moon. In the latter Mr. Hodson plays an Irish sans-culotte, turned footman. The favourite piece, Blue Jackets, introduces Miss Georgina Hodson, as a young lady disguised as a sailor, who rescues her lover from being a prisoner on ship-board. Here, her appearance, with a tail of companions in similar disguises, is productive of a great deal of fun, which draws a crowded half-price every evening.

The return of Miss Rebecca Isaacs to her post, has made this theatre again unusually gay. As Miss Isaacs has appeared in two of her well-known characters only, we need merely add that in the Pet of the Public, and Why don't you Marry? the fair directress has entered on a new lease of popular favour. —Mr. Hodson took his benefit on Thursday, and had a bumper. —The travestie of Macbeth has been revived, Mr. Hodson assuming the part of the Irish Thane.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.—On Monday night week Mr. Ryder was taken ill, and could not play Richmond, in Richard the Third. Mr. Walter Lacy undertook the character at a very short notice, and acquitted himself in a highly creditable manner.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—Mr. Allcroft has announced an attractive series of promenade concerts next week, for which he has engaged the London Orchestra, which includes, among other first-rate artists, MM. Barret, Bauman, Richardson, Lazarus, Prospère, Hardy, Thirlwall, Rowland, and Frank Mori, conductor. Herr Ernst is to play two solos on the violin every night. Mr. Augustus Braham, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Miss Milla, and Miss Tudor will vary the entertainment with popular songs and duets. There is little doubt that these concerts will attract, as the price of admission is moderate, and the theatres are closed during Passion Week.

MR. EDWARD MURRAY, formerly well known at the Olympic Theatre, as treasurer under Mr. Farren's management, previous to joining Mr. J. W. Wallack at the Marylebone, has secured the services of Mr. and Miss Buckland for a new entertainment at St. Martin's Hall, during Passion Week, under the title of "What Songs shall I sing to-night." Those who have had an opportunity of appreciating Mr. Edward Murray's invariable urbanity in the discharge of his duties, will hasten to pay him a visit.

A LETTER FROM ROSSINI.

(From La France Musicale.)

THE Count de Fay, a Hungarian nobleman, who takes great interest in the progress of music in his native country, some time since addressed a letter to Rossini, begging the illustrious composer to write an opera, a ballet, or, at any rate, a piece of sacred music, for Hungary. Rossini, in reply, sent him a letter in Latin, of which the following is a translation:—

"MOST NOBLE COUNT,—I am charmed to learn from your letter that you are a passionate lover of music, and play the piano with a skill peculiar to yourself. Nor am I less pleased to know that you entertain a special predilection for classical music. With regard to myself, the last of the "classic writers," I can do no more than follow nature, and shall persevere solemnly and irrevocably in that course. I have, therefore, abandoned the buffo style, and devoted myself to serious and religious music. I commenced writing, a young man, with powers scarcely mature, and, sooner than was expected, laid down my pen.

"Thus it is in the world. He who begins early should, by the laws of Nature, leave off early. In addition to this, I have deeply studied the present age, in which prodigies, not to say horrors, weigh down and obscure the ends of real and unadulturated art.

"For these reasons, any one possessing common sense will understand my silence, which is self-imposed—first, in order not to be under the necessity of going with the current of modern art, and, secondly, in order to set a good example. Art, restrained within its proper limits, will benefit mankind, without libelling nature or attempting impossibilities, which are contrary to the true æsthetic spirit, and only encourage frivolity.

"You will, on reflection, perceive that what you tell me respecting the Emperor of the French belongs to the realm of the fabulous, and that it is impossible for me to do what you ask on your own account. Musical technology has wandered from its sphere; nor do I feel much disposed to flatter those who throw confusion into the domain of art and the principles which regulate it.

"Adieu, then, amateur of music and musicians; be convinced that I am free from all ambition, and not the less competent to understand the phases which music is traversing, and to foresee the period at which a great change will take place. I am, most noble count, your very obliged and obedient servant,

"GIOACCHINO ROSSINI.

"Florence, 14th February, 1854.

"P.S.—There is a time for composing and a time for studying: there are periods when sentiment is more acute than reason, and in such moments we should write. At present, we live in an age for seeing rather than feeling, and for this reason study is the more necessary. I am, nevertheless, at the service of anybody in word and deed, and one of my greatest pleasures is to give advice to those who require it. I have always loved Hungary, for Tokay is one of my favorite wines; but now I love it twice as much, since you, my dear friend, resied there."

MISS EMMA BUSBY'S CONCERT.—The concert of this young pianist was attended by a numerous and select audience. The programme was addressed to well-educated connoisseurs. If space permitted, we should cite it. Hummel's trio in E (Op. 83) was admirably played by Miss E. Busby, and M.M. Molique and Van Gelder. Hummel's music is heard too seldom. There is beautiful melody in the opening movement of this trio, and great tenderness in the andante; while the rondo is playful and brilliant. The whole was played con amore, and elicited unaffected marks of approval. Miss Busby performs with great spirit and vivacity. Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, one of Mozart's duets for piano and violin, a violoncello solo by Herr Van Gelder (admirably played by the author), with selections from Mendelssohn and Weber, completed the instrumental performances. The gem of the evening was the duet. Herr Molique seemed to inspire his youthful assistant by his performance. The concert was varied by songs from Madame Zimmerman, and Miss Bertha Street. The songs were of a piece with the rest, being selected from Mozart, Weber, and Sterndale Bennett. Mr. Charles Salaman accompanied the vocal music.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

LAST night, Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise (Lobgesang), and Mozart's Requiem were repeated. Mdme. Clara Novello made her first appearance this season, and experienced a highly flattering reception. Exeter Hall was even more crowded than at the first performance, which was honoured by the presence of Her Majesty the Queen.

The features in the Hymn of Praise were the solo and semi-chorus, "Praise Thou the Lord; the recitative, "Sing ye Praise," and the air, "He counteth all your Sorrows," splendidly sung by Mr. Sims Reeves, and enthusiastically applauded; the solo, "The Sorrows of Death," and the recitative, "We called through the Darkness," with the solo and chorus, "The Night is departing,"—in which Mr. Sims Reeves again distinguished himself; and the duet, "My Song shall be alway thy Mercy," sung to perfection by Mr. Sims Reeves and Mdme. Clara Novello. On the whole, the performance of the Lobgesang, last night, was a great improvement on that which we felt it our duty to criticise a fortnight since. The chorus was much more steady; but still the times of many of the movements were decidedly too slow.

The Requiem lost nothing by a repetition. The praise given to the first performance may be as fairly awarded to the second. The audience were delighted. Mozart's sacred masterpiece is gradually taking the place it should have occupied long ago in the répertoire of the Sacred Harmonic Society. It will no doubt again, more than once, be performed in conjunction with the Lobgesang.

HARMONIC UNION.

A CONCERT was given by the above society at Exeter Hall on Thursday evening, for the benefit of the wives and families of the soldiers ordered on foreign service, under the patronage of the Queen, Prince Albert, several members of the Royal Family, and a long list of nobles and fashionables, headed, as usual, by the Lady Mayoress. Although the Hall was not more than three parts full, the receipts were large, the high price of admission more than counterbalancing the comparative inferiority in numbers.

The first part of the concert began with selections from Weber's Preciosa, and terminated with Mr. Sterndale Bennett's concerto in F minor. The selections included the overture, three choruses, a gipsy glee, "Now let's away," an air, "Lo! the Star of Eve," and the gipsy and national Spanish dances. The performance was good, and Miss Stabbach distinguished herself by her correct and effective singing. The concerto of Mr. Bennett—No. 4, and last but one of the composer—was an interesting feature in the programme. One of the finest of modern pianoforte concertos, it is exceedingly difficult, and requires an executant of the highest mechanical powers, and more than ordinary intelligence. Miss Arabella Goddard, however, was as much at home in this as in anything she has hitherto attempted in public. The concerto was wonderfully performed, and received with the utmost favour. Every movement was just what it should have been; but, if we had a preference, it was for the barcarolle, in which Miss Goddard exhibited an instinctive feeling and a delicacy of touch that were a charm of themselves, without even taking the extreme loveliness of the music into consideration. Others might give the palm to the impetuous finale, in which Miss Goddard displayed her admirable mechanism and the energy of her style with more than usual advantage. We are glad to find that Mr. Bennett's music is coming more and more into fashion. It is high time. To allow the works of so accomplished a musician to be neglected, would be a national disgrace.

The second part consisted of Beethoven's Ruins of Athens and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night. The pieces which went most satisfactorily in the former were the Chorus of Dervishes, the Turkish March, the chorus "Susceptible Hearts," and the air and chorus "Deign, great Apollo." Signor Belletti sang the air very finely, and the choir in general was excellent. In the Walpurgis Night, there were many points entitled to special notice. Miss Huddart sang the solo of the aged woman of the people, "Know ye not a Deed so daring?" exceedingly well. This lady has a good contralto voice, and sings with feeling. The characteristic chorus of druids and guards, "Disperse, disperse," and the mysterious and overpowering "Come with Torches," were admirably given. Herr Formes sang the solos with a power and vigour not to be surpassed. The airs, "Should a Christian," and "Restrained by Might," were both given by the German basso in his finest manner, and the latter was enthusiastically encored.

Mr. Benedict conducted the performance in a masterly manner; and Mr. W. Rae presided at the organ with his accustomed ability.

THE BACH SOCIETY.

A PERFORMANCE of Sebastian Bach's Grosse Passions-Musik was given, by the members of the Bach Society, for the first time in this country, on Thursday evening, at the Hanover Square Rooms, under the direction of Mr. Sterndale Bennett, who took the utmost pains in getting it up. The principal vocalists were Mesdames Ferrari, Bertha Street, Dolby, Dianelli, Freeman, Messrs. Allen, Walworth, Walter Bolton, and Ferrari. Mr. E. J. Hopkins presided at the organ, a new instrument, built expressly for the Hanover Rooms by Messrs. Gray and Davison, and used for the first time. It is one of great power, and great beauty and variety of tone, and was universally admired. In a foot note to the programme we are informed, that "The Grosse Passions-Musik is produced according to the version adopted by Mendelssohn, at Berlin and Leipzic, and the omissions made accordingly. Beyond this, a small portion of the narrative is omitted, rendering it more acceptable to the religious scruples of a majority of the English public, without, in the slightest degree, affecting the musical importance of the work."

The performance being merely preparatory to one on a grander and more efficient scale, to be shortly given by the Bach Society, it is not necessary to enter into details. En attendant, we transcribe from the printed programme of the first concert of the New Philharmonic Society, àpropos to the selections given from the Grosse Passions-Musik, the following interesting account of Bach's Passions generally:—

"Bach wrote five oratorios, called Passions. Of the five, three are probably all that exist; and of the three, only two are printed and accessible. These two are 'the Passion according to St. John,' and that 'according to St. Matthew.' The latter is the more important of the two, and probably the later: on the whole, it is the greatest work of the author; and it is with a series of pieces from this great composition that the vocal music of Sebastian Bach is to-night, for the first time, fairly brought before an English audience. By a Passion is meant an oratorio which has for its subject the transactions of the last hours of the life of our Saviour. It has been the custom in the Protestant churches of Germany, ever since they existed, to perform a piece of music on the high festivals and solemn ecclesiastical days, as part of the religious service proper to the day—a custom probably originating in the 'Mysteries,' or Sacred Plays, common in mediæval times, and which still survive in the Marionette dramas annually played in the churches of the south of France and of Lombardy. On Good Fridays, the History of the Passion and Death of the Saviour would naturally be chosen as a subject of such a solemn music. In these compositions, the narrative of one of the Evangelists was taken, and delivered continuously in recitative by a solo voice, and the story was interrupted by verses, sung by the congregation, out of the Hymns appropriate to the occasion, drawn from that vast Hymnology in which Germany is so rich, set to those Chorales which form at once so individual and so interesting a part of her musical literature. This is exactly the method followed in the earliest Passion known, the date of which is 1573. By degrees, however, the strict and simply didactic form of the composition was much departed from; meditative and devotional poetry bearing on the subject was interpolated, and the Chorals were treated in a more scientific manner, or were varied in harmony, so as to lose the congregational character which they originally had. These changes were gradually introduced by the great masters of the German school, Keiser, Mattheson, Telemann, Graun; names strange to English ears, but in their own land highly honoured; all of whom tried their highest flights in Passion-music. But the Matthew Passion of Bach far excels any of these works in dramatic power, and it would be perhaps impossible for anything to be acted with more effect, if the solemn nature of the subject admitted of such a mode of performance.

"The ignorance which exists in this country with regard to all but a small proportion of the compositions of Bach, is truly remarkable. Besides more than 200 works for the organ; as many for the clavier solo; 30 for the orchestra; between 20 and 30 for clavier and orchestra, including concertos for 3 or 4 pianos—besides all these, he left behind him no less than 250 great vocal works; Masses, Passions, Magnificats, Motets, and Cantatas or Anthems, containing music of the loftiest, alternating with the sweetest and most plaintive character. Many of these works are printed and to be had. They are of all kinds, severe and pleasing, easy and difficult. There is, therefore, no excuse for continued neglect of these great treasures. Let it cease to be the rule, that whenever a work of Bach is to be produced, the most difficult, harsh, and crude thing obtainable is chosen—let that false notion die, that he wrote nothing but difficulties, and that as long as his fugues were correct, he cared for nothing else—let it cease, for it is a lie."

The pieces which made the greatest effect at the Hanover Square Rooms were the recitatives, which are all lofty, measured, and grandiose; the chorale, "O Lord, who dares to smite Thee," which was encored; the double chorus, "Have Lightnings and Thunders," which was similarly complimented; the tenor airs, artistically given by Mr. Allen; the bass song, "Have Mercy upon Me, O Lord," delivered with great feeling by Signor Ferrari; and the contralto aria, "See the Saviour's outstretched Arm," which was finely sung by Miss Dolby, and unanimously redemanded. Mr. Sterndale Bennett was recalled at the conclusion, and enthusiastically applauded. The principal violin in the orchestra was held by Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Grattan Cooke played the first oboe part, one of extreme and continual difficulty. The performance, on the whole, was vastly creditable; but, as it was merely an avant-coureur of a better, we shall say no more about it. A correspondent has written, requesting us to give our opinion of the music of Bach's Grosse Passions. With every desire to satisfy his curiosity, however, we would rather wait a while.

EXETER HALL.—The concert, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the workmen killed at the Crystal Palace, came off on Wednesday evening. It was what is called a "monster" concert. There were three parts, and each part contained fifteen or sixteen morceaux. The band was on a smaller scale than the programme,—there being far fewer players than pieces. The arrangements were under the direction of Herr Sommer, who exhibited officious and commendable zeal in the cause of charity. Nevertheless, Herr Sommer did not seem to forget the maxim, that charity begins at home. The programme was a showy advertisement for Herr Sommer himself. It included a solo on the sommerophone, so called by Herr Sommer (bombardon, by M. Sax), composed and performed by Herr Sommer; a polka and a quadrille, by Herr Sommer, with detailed accounts of their origin and history; and a "grand fantasia" by Herr Sommer. Herr Sommer, in fact, was every where. He was at the head of the programme, in the body of the programme, and at the foot of the programme. He was ubiquitous—and all for charity. But we shall show ourselves charitable, and not dive into the causes which induced Herr Sommer to intrude himself so zealously and so perseveringly on the attention of the public. Of the performance it is needless to speak at length. Some features, however, are entitled to special notice. Herr Ernst played twice; the first time, his famous Otello Fantasia, the second time his equally famous Carnaval de Venise. In both, he created a furore. Mr. Sims Reeves was encored in the Scena from Sonnambula, "All is lost now," which he sang magnificently, and also with Madame Clara Novello, in the duet "Ah! Morir" from Ernani. Madame Clara Novello, in addition, gave the aria from Semiramide, "Bel Raggio," with decided success. The vocalists, besides the above, were Mesdames Amedei, Ransford, Fanny Ternan, Rita Favanti, Stabbach, Brougham, Messent, Thirlwall, Zimmerman, Newton Frodsham, Rebecca Isaacs, Cicely Nott, Grace Alleyne, Julia Harland, and Messrs. Augustus Braham, Jonghmans, Bettini, Belletti, Frank Bodda, George Tedder, Charles Cotton, Lawler, Leffler, and George Perrin. The instrumental artists were, Messrs. Ernst, Viotti Collins, George Collins, Frisch (flute), George Case, Oberthür, the Brothers Shapcott (sax-horns), and Sommer. The conductors were Herr Anschuez, Mr. Haskins, and Herr Sommer. How many singers and how many players were there who were "down" in the programme, we cannot undertake to say. There was, however, a row towards the end, for which we did not stay. The hall was full.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S SOIRÉES.—M. Billet's second performance of Classical Pianoforte Music took place on Tuesday evening, in the small room of St. Martin's Hall. The programme, as usual, was full of interest. It comprised Clementi's Sonata, in B minor, Op. 40 (dedicated to Cherubini); Handel's "Suite de Pièces," No. 4, in E minor; Caprice Brillant, in G, Op. 55 (on La Fontaine de Schubert), by Stephen Heller; Beethoven's Grand Sonata, in F minor, Op. 57; and a Selection of Studies by Moscheles, C. Mayer, Chopin, and Mendelssohn.

Here was music in all styles, and more than enough to put to a severe test any talent inferior to that of M. Billet. The Sonata of Clementi—fiery and impetuous throughout—demands great facility of execution and great sensibility in the performance. M. Billet played it in a masterly manner.

In Handel's "Suite de Pièces," M. Billet particularly distinguished himself—especially in the Fuga and Gigue. Few performers on the pianoforte are superior to M. Billet in the music of Bach and Handel. He has a bold and vigorous style of execution well adapted to the conceptions of the elder masters. That he can equally identify himself with the modern composers was satisfactorily shewn in his able performance of Stephen Heller's elegant "caprice." Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata, however, was M. Billet's most successful effort. His execution of this immense work was as judicious as it was brilliant and precise. The studies were well-selected; that which produced the most effect was the one in F minor of Mendelssohn, the only "Study," so called, ever composed by that illustrious musician. M. Billet was applauded in all his performances, and kept alive the interest of the audience until the end of the concert.

The vocal music was entrusted to Miss Grace Alleyne and Miss Palmer. Miss Alleyne gave Beethoven's grand scena, "Ah! Perfido, Spergiuro," with energy and power—more, indeed, than is usual with her—and Weber's cavatina, "Though Clouds." Miss Palmer sang Haydn's "My Mother bids me bind my Hair," and Mendelssohn's "Slumber and dream of all bright happy Things"—both well and with feeling. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied the vocal music.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The first concert of this admirable and already well-established Society, takes place to-day, at the Hanover Square Rooms. The programme comprises Spohr's second symphony (written for the Philharmonic) and his best; Mr. Sterndale Bennett's fourth concerto for the pianoforte, played by Miss Arabella Goddard; Mendelssohn's violin concerto, by Mr. H. C. Cooper; an overture by Herr Lindpaintner, etc. etc.

MR. BUNN'S AMERICA.—The new entertainments commenced on Monday night week at the Rooms, 69, Quadrant, have been interrupted by the illness of Mr. Bunn. We are sorry to hear of Mr. Bunn's indisposition, and trust he may regain his health, and continue his lecture, which is one of the most amusing and varied, we ever heard. The greatest care has been taken to render the entertainments complete, and no expense spared in the illustrations.

MR. TRAVERS' NATIONAL ENTERTAINMENT.—Mr. Travers, the well-known dramatic tenor, has hit upon the best possible time to give a lecture on naval matters with musical illustrations. The names of Nelson and Dibdin in juxtaposition are loadstars of attraction; and we cannot wonder that the Music Hall, Store-street, was crowded on Monday evening, to listen to the new sketch of "Britannia's God of War," eked out with songs selected from Jack Tar's idol, Tom Dibdin. The entertainment is called Nelson, the Life of a Sailor, and narrates in a succinct and interesting manner the outlines of Nelson's life, and introduces the most celebrated anecdotes bearing upon his career as a naval officer. Mr. Travers has a capital delivery, and speaks with point and emphasis. He was in excellent voice, too, and sang several songs to the unanimous approval of his hearers. His best efforts were, "Meg of Wapping," "The Lass that loves a Sailor," "Nothing like Grog," "Poor Jack," "Tom Bowling," and Braham's "The Death of Nelson," the only song in the entertainment not written by Dibdin. Mr. Travers was encored in all these songs, which he sang with vigour and meaning. The entertainment is well worth a visit to the rooms in Store-street.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Thursday, a subscription night, Verdi's popular opera, Ernani, was produced, for the rentrée of Mad. Bosio, and for the purpose of introducing to the subscribers of the Royal Italian Opera a new candidate, in the person of Sig. Susini, a basso-barytono. The cast was very strong. In addition to Mad. Bosio as Elvira, and Sig. Susini as Don Silva, it comprised Sig. Tamberlik as Ernani, and Sig. Ronconi as Don Carlos, while the subordinate parts were sustained by Mdlle. Cotti and Signors Polonini and Soldi. One great mistake, we think, was made. Don Silva is the real tragic personage of the drama, and should have been assigned to Sig. Ronconi. That inimitable artist would have had a much better opportunity of exhibiting his dramatic powers than in Don Carlos, which, so far as the acting is concerned, is of secondary importance. This has been demonstrated on several occasions, when the part was given to Sig. Superchi and Sig. Gardoni, at Her Majesty's Theatre—to say nothing of Mdlle. Alboni, who was the Don Carlos when Ernani was first produced at the Royal Italian Opera. True, Signor Coletti, an artist of acknowledged power, assumed the character latterly at Her Majesty's Theatre; but that was an exception to the rule. It may be urged that the music of Don Silva is too low for Sig. Ronconi. But why not transpose it as readily as the music of Guillaume Tell? Mr. Costa cannot surely have more respect for Verdi than Rossini? While the score of Guillaume Tell suffers materially by alterations, that of Ernani cannot easily be damaged by changes. Sig. Ronconi, we are convinced, would render the character of Don Silva eminently effective. Nevertheless, so powerful and artistic is his singing in Don Carlos, that a serious loss would be felt in transferring the part to any other. On Thursday, no small share of the success achieved by the performance of Ernani was attributable to Sig. Ronconi. His singing of the first aria was admirable, and the sestet, in the finale of the third act, created a furore.

Sig. Susini is a singer of some pretension, but not exactly fitted to be the successor of Sig. Tamburini, whose parts, we are informed, he is about to undertake. His voice is agreeable in the middle and upper registers, but his low notes are deficient in power and quality. In secondary parts he may prove useful.

Mad. Bosio is a great favourite with the habitués of the opera and the public generally, and deservedly so. She is an accomplished artist, and possesses a voice of delightful quality. Her Elvira, on Thursday night, was highly prepossessing, and her acting displayed a far greater amount of energy than usual. A little more abandon in the last scene was all that was required. The well-known aria d'intrata, "Ernani, involami," was sung with great brilliancy and power; the ornaments were well placed, and in good taste, and the high notes attacked with unerring precision. Mad. Bosio achieved a decided success, and made a further step in public estimation.

Sig. Tamberlik's Ernani is, in some respects, one of his most striking impersonations. He looked and acted the part to admiration, and sang in his best manner. Had Verdi such artists as Sig. Tamberlik to write for, we should not quarrel with his exactions on the higher register of the voice. The aria in the first scene was a powerful display of energetic vocalisation, and drew down applause from all parts of the house. It was in the last scene, however, that Sig. Tamberlik exhibited his full powers as singer and actor. The sudden change from extreme happiness to despair, when he hears the tones of Don Silva's fatal horn, was assumed with intense reality; and the death-scene was perfect. The audience were deeply impressed, and the curtain fell amidst loud and general applause for Madame Bosio and Signor Tamberlik.

The general performance was irreproachable, and the reception given to Ernani proved that the subscribers prefer Verdi to Rossini. The greatest effect of the evening was produced by the sestet, in the finale of the third act, and the execution by the principals, Mad. Bosio, Tamberlik, and Ronconi especially, was so powerful that an enthusiastic encore was the result, and all the performers were recalled after the fall of the curtain. The band and chorus were superb.

Ernani is to be repeated to-night, the last before Easter. We should have stated that Guillaume Tell was given for the second time on Tuesday.

The Favourite Pieces from J. F. Duggan's New Opera of "Léonie" —Libretto by Mr. Henri Drayton—as performed at Drury Lane Theatre. Campbell, Ransford, and Co.

A closer acquaintance with some of the music in Léonie, of which we recently gave an account, is certainly favourable to the composer. The romanza, "Dear Venice" (which Miss Susanna Lowe sang so prettily), is melodious, and there is nothing vulgar in its extreme simplicity. We can also compliment Mr. Henri Drayton on the words. The theme is ancient enough, but he has cleverly avoided all conventional commonplaces. The ballad, "Oh! let me gaze" (sung by Mr. Drayton), is sentimental; but it is graceful, and Mr. Duggan has succeeded in steering clear of the hyper-morbid style—a dangerous quicksand in the ocean of ballad-music. The popularity of this ballad has not to be foretold, but to be recorded. It is in the hands of all our amateur barytones, who might exercise their voices and their tastes on much less healthy music. Another ballad, "The Old Spinette" (also sung by Mr. Drayton), is, perhaps, even better in its way. Though simple to a fault, both in melody and accompaniment, it by no means lacks expression. "The Old Spinette," moreover, is essentially an acting ballad; and, if sung without a certain amount of dramatic feeling, loses half its charm. "I dreamt an old Man o'er my Pillow wept" (sung by Miss Lowe), is of a more ambitious character, and Mr. Duggan has laboured, not without considerable success, to impart a special interest to the accompaniment. The two first bars of the symphony, however, must be revised, since there are octaves between the top part and the bass. The melody of this song is very pleasing, and the words of Mr. Drayton show a good deal of poetical sentiment. The ballad, "How oft in Childhood" (sung by Miss Featherstone), demands a word of praise, on account of its elegance. In page 2, however, the accompaniment of bars 2 and 3, must also be reconsidered—since there are octaves—B C, B C. At the bottom of page 3, too, Mr. Duggan will find that the corrector of proofs has not been very diligent, or, at least, very sharp-sighted. One of the mistakes re-occurs in page 5. The romance, "Yes, 'tis a Spell," and the air, "Yes! Hope, thou art a Beacon-light" (sung by Mr. Elliot Galer), have both a certain degree of merit. We prefer the romance, however, which attempts less than the air, and effects comparatively more. The one is a good ballad melody, the other a rather laboured than elaborate song. The serenade, "At Night upon the Moonlit Tide" (sung by Mr. Drayton), is a happy imitation of the Balfe-Wallace school of popular theatrical ballad, and cannot fail, for that reason, if for no other, to please the public.

In conclusion, let Mr. Duggan persevere. He is a beginner, and cannot expect to leap at once into the vacant chair of Rossini. Criticism, if honest, should encourage rather than depress him, and be accepted more in the light of friendly counsel than of hostile animadversion. Verbum sap. sat.

Miss Fanny Stirling took her first benefit at the Music Hall, Store Street, on Thursday se'nnight. Among the vocalists were Miss Poole, Mrs. John Roe, and Herr Jonghmans. Mdme. Pyne Gatton, a sister of Louisa Pyne, played a fantasia on the pianoforte. The Misses Jacobs, Hincks, and Nason, vocalists, also contributed their services. The room was well attended.

MANCHESTER.—The third of Mr. J. Thorne Harris's Soirées Musicales was given at his residence, on Thursday evening last. The following was the programme:—

Sonata—Piano and Violin—in D, Op. 12 (Vieuxtemps). Vocal Quartet, (Abt). Solo—Violin—(C. Baetens). Pastoral Sonata, Op. 28 (Beethoven). Sonata in E flat, No. 3, Op. 12 (Beethoven). Vocal Quartet, "Memory's Tears," (J. T. Harris). Pianoforte—Solo Selection—Nocturne, in A flat, Op. 40; Improvisation in E flat, Op. 57 (J. T. Harris). Pianoforte—Solo Selection—Polonaise in A, (Chopin).

The sonata of Vieuxtemps abounds in difficulties for both instruments. Mons. Vieuxtemps being a violin player, his pianoforte phrases are of a character which, though not entirely unsuited to the pianoforte, require for their proper execution a well trained hand. Mr. Harris, however, was quite equal to the task, while Mr. Baetens was not less at home in the violin part. We need say nothing of Beethoven's Pastoral Sonata; nor of the Sonata in E flat for piano and violin. Indeed, what could we say?—what words can describe that rich, inventive, and poetic genius, which scatters beauties around with the luxuriance of nature herself? The exquisite andante of the first made a deep impression. Both compositions were admirably performed. Mr. Baeten's solo, an air with variations of his own, has considerable merit. One variation, in which the composer, dispensing with the pianoforte accompaniment, sustains a legato melody with pizzicato accompaniment, excited much interest. Mr. Harris's pianoforte selections, consisting of two morceaux of his own, and Chopin's Polonaise in A, were played with great spirit and brilliancy. The two first-mentioned compositions, may rank with some of the best of their kind. We may also compliment Mr. Harris on the vocal quartet, which is full of grace, feeling, and skilful part-writing.

IBID.—The last of Mr. Seymour's Quartet Concerts for the season took place on Thursday evening week, in the Large Room of the Town-hall, Chorlton-upon-Medlock. The first quartet was Mozart's, in D, played by Messrs. C. A. Seymour, E. W. Thomas, C. Baetens, and Herr Lidel; it was followed by a selection for the violin; a "Berceuse," by Réber, played by Mr. Seymour; and "Méditation sur le premier prélude de piano de S. Bach, composée pour piano et violon solo, par Ch. Gounod." Mr. Barlow took the pianoforte. Mr. Hallé gave Thalberg's fantasia on Don Giovanni, and afterwards joined Mr. Seymour in the sonata in F (Op. 24), by Beethoven, for pianoforte and violin. Spohr's quintet for two violins, two tenors, and violoncello (Op. 33), in G, followed. Mr. C. Hallé wound up the proceedings with a selection for the pianoforte, making choice of a nocturne and polonaise, in A, by Chopin.

LIVERPOOL.—St. George's Hall will, it seems, be opened without a musical festival, the committee having found that in September next they will be unable to engage sufficient talent.

DUBLIN.—The crowded state of the Ancient Concert Rooms on the evening of Friday week showed the public appreciation of the labours of the Madrigal Society. The musical attraction formed a fair reason for the numbers assembled; and these, combined with the efforts, botanical and decorative, to set off their musical temple pro tem. to advantage, fully accounted for the large number of disciples collected to share in their "service." The madrigal, "Come let Us all a-Maying go," formed an admirable opening to the evening's performance. Balfe's ballad, "We are parted," followed. Miss F. Cruise fully entered into the spirit of this song. Mr. Haigh's voice did justice to an aria from Belisarius; we preferred, however, his, "I gave Thee a Rose." In both he was encored. Others also received similar marks of approval from the audience, who appeared well pleased at the close of the entertainment.—Dublin Commercial World.

AN IRISH DEBUTANTE.—A young lady of Dublin, Miss Teresa Gaussen, daughter of the once extensive coach proprietor of Bolton-street, whose business was ruined by the railways, has adopted the stage as a profession, and, under the name of Miss Teresa Esmonde, has gained the highest reputation in New York, Albany, &c., in the most elevated walks of the drama. Her Clara Douglas, in Money, is pronounced a master-piece; and the newspapers write enthusiastically of her Julia in Richelieu, of her Margaret in Writings on the Wall, &c.

MADAME VESTVALI, who has had such success as a contralto, in Italy, is engaged by the directors of the Royal Opera, Drury Lane.

THE "Männer-Gesang-Verein" of Cologne commence their concerts in London early in May. They will be given at the Hanover Square Rooms, and will be limited (as last year) to 12 or 15 days.

SIG. GORDIGIANI.—We understand that Signor Gordigiani, the composer of so many graceful and popular Italian airs, duets, etc., has lately finished an opera. The dilettanti of Florence speak very highly of the work, which has already been rehearsed in private. Signor Gordigiani is expected to visit England in the course of the season.

ANCIENT ITALIAN AND FRENCH SINGERS.—During the reign of Charlemagne, a difference of opinion existed in France as to the merits of French and Italian music, and the following account of this quarrel is given in a work published at Frankfort in 1514. "The pious Emperor Charles," says the writer, "having returned to celebrate the festival of Easter with our Apostolic Lord at Rome, there arose during the feast, a quarrel between the French and Italian choristers. The French pretended to sing better and more agreeably than the Italians; while the latter insisted on their own superiority in ecclesiastical music, which they had learned from Pope St. Gregory,* and accused the French vocalists of corrupting and disfiguring the true melody. This dispute being submitted to the Emperor, the French, relying on his partiality, presumed to insult the Italians. But the latter, sensible of their superior knowledge, and comparing the learning of St. Gregory with the ignorance of their competitors, treated them with scorn and contempt. This altercation continuing, the sovereign said to his choristers, 'Tell us which is the purest water—that drawn from the fountain-head, or that of the streams which flow at a distance?' This question admitted but of one answer. All declared in favour of the water at the fountain-head. 'Have recourse, then,' said Charles, 'to the fountain of St. Gregory, whose music you have altered and corrupted.'"

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION IN AID OF THE WIVES AND FAMILIES OF SOLDIERS ORDERED TO THE EAST.—At a Meeting of the Board of Directors of the Conservative Land Society, the following Resolution was passed:—"The Executive Committee being most anxious to aid the public efforts which are being made to raise a fund for the wives and children of the soldiers whose noble efforts are required in the cause of their country, have unanimously requested their chairman, Viscount Ranelagh, to place the mansion and grounds of St. Margaret's at the disposal of the committee in aid of the soldiers' wives and families, to be used in any public way they may think most advantageous to promote the interest of the charity." A reply has been received from Lord Ingestre, the chairman of the sub-committee of the association, thanking the society for their offer, with the intimation that the organization of a public entertainment in St. Margaret's Park would be taken into consideration.

* St. Gregory the Great was the first person who, in the sixth century, improved the style of sacred music; hence it assumed the appellation of the Gregorian chant.

BY HER MAJESTY'S ROYAL LETTERS PATENT.

UPRIGHT GRAND PIANOFORTES, with PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, for all Climates, and NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. Pianists, and the Musical World, are respectfully invited to inspect and test these Pianofortes, which have now attained the long-sought properties of permanence, quantity, and quality of tone, standing well in tune, with the most prompt and light touch. The purchasers of Pianos have now the advantage of selecting an Instrument to their own taste, which, being of itself permanent, can be sent to any distance without injurious effects. The great improvements taking place around us in the mechanical arts and manufactures, has rendered it necessary that the Pianoforte should be included in the number. The difficult obstacles to conquer in the making of Pianos is, without doubt, that which results from the pressure occasioned by the extreme tension on the strings, and also from the dryness or humidity of the atmosphere, causing the wood placed at the back to expand, sometimes to unglue, and always to force them to rest upon the sounding-board, rendering the instrument (sooner or later) valueless, and significantly expressed by the common observation of "My Piano has lost its tone!" The defects of the ordinary, inefficient, and too weak construction in wood—or with metallic plates—is completely superseded by WOOLLEY'S PATENT METALLIC ENTIRE FRAME, FOR ALL CLIMATES. The frame consists of an entire construction of iron, preventing the possibility of the least shrinking in any direction, and producing positive permanence; a frame of wood is also attached to the iron, which gives it the desired quality of fulness, and greatly increased duration. It is obvious that any thickness of stringing can be put on these frames, without fear of giving way—the tone is increased in volume—is rendered perfect in quality—and from the enormous resistance contained in the frame, the strings throw off their "Real Harmonics."—MECHANISM.—THE NEW ROYAL VICTORIA REPEAT. The power of tone and resistance in the frame, suggests the desirability of a very powerful blow in the hammer. This is completely effected by the "New Royal Victoria Repeat;" the addition to these Pianos having a blow much more powerful than any hitherto produced—combining all the requisites of force, ease, variety of light and shade, superior damping, perfect check, and an untiring repetition, which is produced from an action not likely to get out of order. Mr. Woolley, in drawing attention to the applause which M. Billet elicited at St. Martin's Hall on Tuesday, March 15th, for the beautiful intonation of this instrument, begs to state that M. Billet will again perform on it at his next concerts, Tuesdays, April the 4th, and 11th. These Pianos may be seen and purchased at L. L. Lee's Warerooms, 48, Albemarle-street, London; and all the principal Provincial Towns. Woolley and Co., Patentees and Manufacturers.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—Mrs. Endersohn, Mrs. Lockey (late Miss M. Williams), Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. H. Phillips. All communications relative to engagements in town or country, to be made to the Secretary, R. Carte, 100, New Bond Street.

I and I. ERAT, PATENT HARP MANUFACTURERS, 23, Berners-street, Oxford-street, beg to inform the nobility, gentry, and the public, that they are now manufacturing a light and elegant, small-sized double-movement HARP, strongly recommended by the faculty for the use of young ladies and those of delicate health, the large Harp being found much too heavy for general practice. A large assortment of instruments, harps, and pianofortes for sale or hire on moderate terms. Harps and pianos taken in exchange. Repairs of all kinds executed. The suspension sounding board, as invented by I. and I. Erat for N. C. Bochsa; see his First Six Weeks' Instruction for the Harp. Tunings attended to. Strings and every requisite always on hand.

THE ST. MARGARET'S ESTATE, RICHMOND.—The Magnificent Mansion and Picturesque Park, at St. Margaret's, opposite Richmond Gardens, may be viewed daily, between the hours of 12 and 5 o'clock (Sundays excepted), by cards only, to be had of the Executive Committee of the Conservative Land Society. The purchase money having been paid up on Lady Day, the allotment of this valuable estate on the banks of the Thames has been fixed for Wednesday, the 7th of June. Cards will be duly forwarded to the members and their friends, on application to the Secretary. St. Margaret's may be reached either by the River Steamers, by Omnibus to Richmond, or by the South Western Railroad, at the Twickenham, Isleworth, or Richmond Stations. Charles Lewis Gruneisen, Secretary. Offices, 33, Norfolk-street, Strand, April 5th, 1854.

MILITARY BANDS—REED AND BRASS.

C. BOOSE'S MILITARY MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Messrs. BOOSEY & SONS, in submitting to the Army and the Musical Public a few of the latest improvements in the above CELEBRATED MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, beg to return their sincere thanks for the patronage so liberally bestowed on their establishment; and to assure those who have not hitherto honoured them with their commands, that their undeviating principle of business is to manufacture instruments of the very best description only. By this means, Boosey and Sons trust to ensure the permanent patronage of their friends. A fair and moderate price is fixed on every Instrument. CLARIONETS.—Either of Cocoa-wood or Grenadille, with 13 German Silver Keys; of Box-wood, with 13 Brass ditto; or of German Silver, with 13 Keys of the same metal. The whole of these comprise every new improvement. FLUTES AND PICCOLOS.—In the usual keys, for Amateurs or Military purposes, either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with German Silver or Brass Keys, and every new improvement. FIFES (Boosé's Improved).—Either of Cocoa or Box-wood, with 4 German Silver or Brass Keys. BASSOONS.—The new French Model, of Maple-wood, with 16 Brass, or German Silver Keys. BOOSÉ'S UNRIVALLED CORNET-A-PISTONS.—The great success that has attended the introduction of Boosé's new patent Cornet, and the many flattering testimonials the beauty of the model and the exceeding richness of its tone have called forth, have induced the manufacturers to extend the improvements still further, and they have now the pleasure of announcing, that they have succeeded in adjusting to the same model, the Rotary Cylinder Action. By means of this beautiful and light action, the most rapid passages can be executed with marvellous quickness and dexterity. Price, with Valves, 7 Guineas, with the new Rotary Cylinder Action, 9 Guineas. Either instrument strongly Electro-plated (equal to Silver), 2 Guineas extra. CORNETTO SOPRANO, in D or E flat (for Brass Band); VALVE TRUMPETS, Althorns (Barytone), with Three Valves in B Flat, E Flat, or F. EUPHONIONS (Bass), in B Flat or C, with Four Valves. BOMBARDONS (Bass) in E Flat, or F, with Four Valves. All these Instruments can be had either with Valves or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Althorns are made on two models—either with Bell up or forward. The Euphonion is a new Valve Instrument, infinitely superior to, and rapidly superseding the Ophicleide. FRENCH HORNS either with Three Valves, or on an entirely new model, with the Rotary Cylinder Action. These Horns, Boosey & Sons can with confidence recommend as superior to any yet supplied to the Profession. Better cannot be made.—TROMBONES, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. In the usual Keys, either with Slides, Valves, or the new Rotary Cylinder Action. The Valve Trombone may be had either with the Bell up or forward.—THE NEW ROTARY CYLINDER ACTION. With this action, which is exceedingly light, the most rapid passage may be executed with marvellous dexterity and quickness. It is, further, more simple and much stronger than any patent actions that have hitherto been made.—VALVE, OR FIELD BUGLE, in B flat or C. By a simple contrivance, the valves of this instrument may be detached at pleasure, and placed in a small leather case, and the instrument remains an ordinary Field Bugle.—OPHICLEIDES, in B flat or C, with 10 or 11 Keys. Cavalry Trumpets, Turkish Crescents, Triangles, Military Tambourines, Drum Heads, Reeds, Music Stands, Music Paper, and every requisite for a Reed, Brass, or String Band.—DRUMS (BASS), Boosé's Improved, of Brass. The advantages in these over Wooden Drums, are, an infinitely superior tone and great durability, without any increase in weight. Boosey & Sons have received the most flattering testimonials from the many Regiments they have supplied with these Drums, both at home and abroad. Tenor and Side Drums, also of Brass.—BASS DRUM STICKS. Boosey & Sons have succeeded in manufacturing a Drum Stick of an entirely New Material, which requires no covering, and will last for TEN OR TWENTY YEARS, and thus a remedy is provided for the constant expense of recovering Drum Sticks. The Regimental Facings, and other colours, being tastefully introduced, render this Drum Stick an exceedingly handsome appendage to the Drum.

THE LIFE OF MOZART.

CHAPTER XI.

(1779—1780.)

We must here supply an important omission in Mozart's correspondence. The reader will remember that, on his journey from Salzburg to Paris, our hero stopped several months in Mannheim, in which town, we have seen, by extracts from his letters, the reasons which detained him so long. He, however, said nothing of the principal, if not the best, motive for his lengthened sojourn, viz., the acquaintance he had contracted with Herr Weber. This gentleman had a daughter, fifteen years of age, who made a deep impression upon Mozart. And what sort of person was this Fräulein Weber, who caused our hero, for the first time in his life, to be faithless to his Muse? "Faithless," however, is not exactly the word—since it was for the sake of the one that he loved the other; and it was in music that Mozart poured forth his admiration for his mistress. Aloysia Weber, well known, at a later period, as Madame Lange, was destined to become one of the greatest singers of her day. She had just made her first appearance on the stage, at Mannheim; and Mozart describes her in the following terms:—

"She only wants action; if she possessed that, she might be prima donna at any theatre. She sings the aria, with the impossible passage I wrote for Signora de Amicis, admirably."

Mozart does not tell his father another word, either about her appearance or her qualities, nor does he hint at the intention he had seriously conceived of making her his wife. The young lady herself, did not look upon Mozart with indifference, while her father was in no way hostile to the growing affection of the young couple for one another, since he calculated upon the happy results which might attend it. What brilliant prospects, if Mozart should dedicate his golden pen to Aloysia, whose voice was a guarantee that the music of the young and gifted composer would always meet with a worthy interpreter! To what triumphs might each look forward, if only assisted by the other! But, where the heart is concerned, affairs are not always arranged as speedily as could be wished. Mademoiselle Weber did not then earn ducats as plentifully as ten years later, while Mozart's pockets were almost empty, and remained so, much against his wish, as long as he lived. He was, moreover, obliged to go to Paris, in the hope of remedying this melancholy state of things. The commands from Salzburg were, on this point, irrevocable, and the lovers parted with the vows and emotions which are usual on such occasions. If we may believe the saga, some tears were even shed. The adieus, however, were not of a despairing character, for Mozart and Aloysia were satisfied of each other's truth. What a pity that a romance, commencing in strict accordance with established rules, should end in mystification! None but Fate, however, was to blame—Fate, the most bungling novelist that ever attempted to put such matters in a shape to interest the reader. Mozart's time dragged heavily along in Paris, and this was another reason for thinking of Aloysia. The young lady, on the contrary, finding that she grew daily in the favour of the Mannheim audience, and stood a fair chance to become the chief ornament of the theatre, revelled in the dream of a brilliant reputation, and, consquently, had less occasion to think of Mozart than she might have desired. Soon afterwards, political events took her to Munich, whither she followed Carl Theodore, who came to the inheritance of the electoral ermine of Bavaria about the period of Mozart's return from Paris. Not meeting his beloved in Mannheim, our hero proceeded in search of her to Munich. Eight months' absence, however, is sometimes enough to bring about remarkable changes in the feelings of a prima donna towards a suitor, and, at his first visit, the fate of the unhappy lover was decided. The young lady scarcely remembered him, and their acquaintance had to be renewed in a formal manner. Our hero's small stature, spare body, long nose, and, perhaps, his red coat and black buttons, which, in conformity with the prevailing custom in Paris, he wore in mourning for his mother, produced an unfavourable impression on Aloysia, who, besides being forgetful, had become a keener observer of the world. Her looks and her general demeanour told Mozart he was rejected. Quickly recovering himself, however, without a reproach, without a word about oaths as freely taken as forgotten, he silently went to the piano, and in a clear and distinct voice thus sang in the faithless beauty's ear:—"Ich lass das Mädel gern, das mich nicht will" (I cheerfully resign the maiden who will not have me).*

It may be asked, from what source I obtained this story. My authority is an eye-witness—and one who was more intimately connected than any other with the dénoûment of the plot. Aloysia had a sister, whose very name was a kind of pledge that she possessed very little moral resemblance to the singer. Constanze did not sing, or, at least, very little; but she played the pianoforte. Mozart had given her a few lessons. The pupil felt compassion for her master, and who does not know that "pity is akin to love?" It was Mozart's wish to ally

* This translation, which has been made expressly for the Musical World, is copyright.

* Aloysia subsequently married an actor of the name of Lange, and the match was a very unhappy one. The most brilliant part of her career dates from the death of Mozart, to whose compositions she owed her greatest triumphs. She confessed that she had had no idea of his genius, and merely looked upon him as a little insignificant fellow.—A. Schraishuon.

himself with the Weber family; and, as there were five daughters, he had ample scope for choice. Aloysia was lost; but her place might be supplied by Constanze; and such was ultimately the case, for, some years afterwards, Constanze Weber became the wife of Mozart. Herr von Nissen affects to believe, "that she felt more for her first husband's talent than for himself." I am not in a position to prove or disprove the accuracy of his opinion; but I can easily understand how consoling and flattering it must have been for a commonplace person, who had married the widow of a great man. When a woman has been induced to resign a celebrated name, it is a sweet reflection that admiration alone had originally caused her to adopt it, and that she will experience the same delight from the new and more humble patronyme bestowed by love. Love, which, from its very nature, compensates for everything, of course may compensate for the loss of notoriety.

After Mozart had entered upon his office of Hof- und Dom-Organist (Court and Cathedral organist)—such was his title—he spent two whole years at Salzburg. Nothing occurred, during this time, worthy of being narrated, except the completion in our composer's mind of that grand revolution which freed his ideas from the leaven of routine, and from the influence exerted by those of the period in which he lived, until, by a gradual purification, he was led to adopt new forms, as richly melodious as profound, and which have ever since remained the types of the Beautiful in music. The fruit, which had been preceded by so many fair blossoms, at length fell, mellow and ripe, and overpowering in its fragrance.

Here begins the classical period of Mozart, the most important, and, at the same time, the last great and legitimate change in the manifestations of the musical art. To progress further we must, in addition to melody, harmony, declamation and rhythm, discover totally new elements, of the existence of which we have, at present, no idea.*

* What, then, did Beethoven and Mendelssohn?—ED.

SEBASTIAN BACH.—"When at Leipsic I entered a hairdresser's shop, for the purpose of being shaved. I was surprised to see in the inner parlour a portrait of the celebrated J. S. Bach, above which was placed a faded wreath of laurel. On my questioning the barber, he replied that his grandfather had had the honour of attending him (Bach) for the last seventeen years of his life in his professional capacity, who was an object of religious veneration in the family. He added, that the last wig worn by the great composer was formerly in the possession of his grandfather, who had bequeathed it to his father, who in his turn left it to him. His only regret was that he had no heir that he could leave it to; but, although he was poor, he was determined not to part with it during his life. I must admit I felt a great desire to possess myself of this relique. I expressed my profound respect for Bach and his works, and then ventured to propose to purchase it. My offers were at first firmly refused, and I advanced in my biddings from twenty, thirty, to forty thalers, without being able to induce him to sell. When I had advanced the price to sixty thalers, the barber's wife said quickly to him that, as they were circumstanced, it would be folly to refuse such a sum, and the relique would be placed in the possession of such an enthusiastic admirer of music as I appeared to be, and taken care of and respected as it ought. The husband, vanquished by the powerful rhetoric of his better half, could not reply, but, shedding tears, he fetched the wig whilst I counted out the money. I quickly left the shop, for, if I had remained an instant longer, I should have left with the poor barber both the wig and the sixty thalers."—(Edward Fétis.)

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

(Apropos of the Edinburgh Professorship.)

"Berlin, Dec. 17, 1842.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,—I hear that you have proclaimed yourself a candidate for the musical professorship at Edinburgh, and that a testimonial which I might send you could possibly be of use to you with the authorities at the university. Now, while I think of writing such a testimonial for you, I feel proud and ashamed at the same time—proud, because I think of all the honour you have done to your art, your country, and yourself, and because it is on such a brother artist that I am to give an opinion; and ashamed, because I have always followed your career, your compositions, your successes, with so true an interest, that I feel as if it was my own cause, and as if I was myself the candidate for such a place. But there is one point of view from which I might be excused to give still an opinion; while all good and true musicians are unanimous about the subject, perhaps the council of the university might like to know what we German people think of you, how we consider you; and then, I may tell them, that if the prejudice which formerly prevailed in this country against the musical talent of your country, has now subsided, it is chiefly owing to you, to your compositions, to your personal residence in Germany. Your overtures, your concertos, your vocal and instrumental compositions, are reckoned by our best and severest authorities amongst the first standard works of the present musical period. The public feel never tired in listening to, while the musicians feel never tired in performing, your compositions; and since they took root in the minds of the true amateurs, my countrymen became aware that music is the same in England as in Germany, as everywhere, and so by your successes here you destroyed that prejudice which nobody could ever have destroyed but a true genius. This is a service you have done to English as well as German musicians, and I am sure that your countrymen will not acknowledge it less readily than mine have done. Shall I still add that the science in your works is as great as their thoughts are elegant and fanciful—that we consider your performance on the pianoforte as masterly as your conducting of an orchestra—and that all this is the general judgment of the best musicians here, as well as my own personal sincere opinion? Let me only add that I wish you success from my whole heart, and that I shall be truly happy to hear that you have met with it.—Always your's, sincerely and truly,

ADAM LISZT.

(Apropos of Franz Liszt.)

[TRANSLATION.]

"Paris, 1824.

"SIR,—The expressions which you have frequently employed in speaking of my son, have been so flattering, that I cannot but be sensible of your kindness, and therefore take this opportunity of testifying my gratitude. I must say that I by no means anticipated the high degree of success with which he was honoured by the public of Paris, and, above all, was not prepared for the comparison, by no means advantageous, which they were pleased to draw between the rising talents of my son, and those of our great Mozart. I recognise in this amiable exaggeration that spirit of French politeness, the boast of which I have all my life been accustomed to hear, and my son will think himself most happy, if hereafter he shall have the good fortune to share some degree of celebrity with the masters of the German school, though he must remain at a very humble distance from him whom it glories in placing at its head.

"You must, however, allow me, sir, to make a few observations upon the following expression that occurred in one of your journals: 'The parents of young Lisst are poor, and he supports them by the product of his talents.'

"Fortune, it is true, has not loaded me with her favours, yet I have no reason to complain of her neglect. For the space of twenty-three years I have been in the service of Prince Esterhazy, where I filled the situation of steward of part of his sheep farms; the immense income of this prince, and the noble and generous manner in which he acts towards those who have the good fortune to belong to any of his establishments, have long since placed me in that aurea mediocritas, so happily described by the Latin poet.

"Having observed in my only son, from a very early age, a decided predilection for music, and having from my youth cultivated the art as an amateur, I myself, for the space of three years, superintended his first musical education, with that constancy and perseverance, which form one of the characteristic traits of our nation. I afterwards placed him for eighteen months under the instruction of Messrs. Salieri and Czerny, from the first of whom he received lessons in harmony and counterpoint; and from the second, instructions on the pianoforte; and to both of whom he is indebted for their kind care and attention. I am happy to be thus able publicly to render them the homage of my grateful acknowledgments.

"I came to Paris with the permission of the prince, and by the advice of my friends, in order to perfect my son's talents, by affording him an opportunity of hearing the numerous artists whom this capital contains, and of cultivating the French language, of which he has already some general idea; a language which justly lays claim to the title of being that of Europe. At the same time, I have not neglected to take advantage of the eagerness testified by the Parisians to hear his performance, in order to indemnify myself for the expenses necessarily attendant upon a long journey, and the removal of my whole family.

"Accept my best acknowledgments, and believe me, etc.

"ADAM LISZT."

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.—A new musical entertainment was given in the small room of St. Martin's Hall, on Wednesday evening, by Mr. George Buckland, the well-known singer, entitled "What shall my Songs be To-night?" The entertainment was announced by Mr. Edward Murray, who has engaged Mr. Buckland and Miss Annie Buckland for a series of performances. Mr. George Buckland is by no means to be despised either as a speaker or singer. He delivered, on Wednesday night, a well written lecture with clearness and good emphasis, and gave his songs with decided point. Miss Annie Buckland has an agreeable voice and sings pleasingly. The most amusing, and certainly not one of the least acceptable, performances of the evening, was a national song, sung, without previous announcement, by Mr. Edward Murray, and vociferously applauded.

METROPOLITAN EVENING CLASSES.—The lecture room of the above classes, at Crosby Hall, was crowed to overflowing to hear the lecture on "The Chamber Music of England, in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," which was delivered by Mr. Charles Steggall, Mus.Doc., Dr. Trevethan Spicer presiding upon the occasion, supported by the Rev. T Hugo, R. Whittington, W. Mitchell, C. Lacy, T. Clark, G. Fisk, and others. The lecture, the first of a series for Easter Term, was remarkably successful. The learned doctor proved himself worthy of his title, and his musical illustrations were efficiently executed by the choir.

CITY HARMONIC UNION.—The second concert of this society took place at Crosby Hall, on Tuesday se'nnight, when Acis and Galatea was given, with a miscellaneous act. Allowance must be made for an infant society strugeling into existence without capital, that needful element of all speculations, mercantile or musical. Some of the choruses went well, others were faulty, but we would earnestly recommend the society to engage a professional band, and confine their performances, for the present, to popular and well-known works. The vocalists, in the serenata, were Mrs. John Rae, Miss Rhemmeiogh, Messrs. Perren, M'Davitt, and Barnby. The miscellaneous act went off better. Mrs. A. Limpus was encored in "Robert, toi que j'aime." Mrs. Rae obtained a recall for "The bonnie wee Wife," and Miss Hincks was encored in "Evangeline." The hall was full.

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION.

THE Orchestral Union is an established fact, and one of importance to the art. The band, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Mellon, though one of the smallest, is one of the best in Europe. Every player is a master of his instrument, and adds something material to the general effect. It gives us pleasure to record the names of such an able and spirited body of executants. The list is as follows:—

Violins—Messrs. H. C. Cooper, Dando, Doyle, Watson, Cusins, Carrodus, Watkins, Newsham, Zerbini, and Love. Violas—Messrs. Hill and Webb. Violoncellos—Messrs. Hatton and W. F. Reed. Double Basses—Messrs. Howell and F. Pratten. Harp—Mr. Trust. Flutes—Messrs. R. S. Pratten and Rockstro. Oboes—Messrs. Nicholson and Horton. Clarionets—Messrs. Maycock and Egerton. Bassoons—Messrs Larkin and Waetzig. Horns—Messrs. C. Harper and Rea. Trumpets—Messrs. T. Harper and Stanton Jones. Trombone—Mr. W. Winterbottom. Drums—Mr. F. Horton. Conductor—Mr. Alfred Mellon.

The first concert of the second season took place on Saturday afternoon, before a crowded audience of amateurs and professors, who came for the sole purpose of hearing music of a first-rate character performed in a first-rate style—not to converse and lounge, but to listen and learn. The programme was "short and sweet," and occupied a little more than one hour and a half in performance.

| Overture (M.S.) (Mountain Sylph) - - | John Barnett. |
| Concerto, Violin, Mr. H. C. Cooper - | Mendelssohn. |
| Symphony in D minor, No. 2 - - | Spohr. |
| Caprice, Pianoforte, in E major - - | W. Sterndale Bennett. |
| Miss Arabella Goddard. | |
| Overture (Joko) - - - - - - | Lindpaintner. |

Mr. Barnett's overture was heard with great interest by those who remembered it in its original shape during the very successful run of the opera to which it is a prelude. It has been considerably altered and elaborated; but the themes and the form in general are much the same. A very effective and brilliant coda has been added. The overture was played with wonderful spirit, and loudly applauded. Mr. H. C. Cooper, who has made a special study of Mendelssohn's beautiful and difficult concerto, never played it with more vigour and unerring execution. It was a new triumph for the accomplished English violinist—who should now turn his attention to the violin concerto of Beethoven. The accompaniments to Mendelssohn were irreproachable. Spohr's perfect symphony—perfect in form, in sustained interest, in the contrast and balance of its various movements, and in the unceasing beauty of its ideas—was one of the richest treats that has for a very long time been provided for the amateurs of orchestral music. It was astonishing to hear the effect produced in this fine work—so elaborate and trying from beginning to end—by a band of thirty players. The scherzo was absolutely faultless. Here, if you please, was the "light and shade," so much talked about, yet so seldom obtained. Beethoven's beau idéal was an orchestra of sixty good players. Mr. Alfred Mellon has realized half of the mighty musician's dream. He must accomplish the other half, or he will have the same question put to him which Lord Grizzle addresses to the ghost of King Arthur—

"If no more, why so much?"

The Symphony was applauded with enthusiasm; and Spohr was as well understood and as much goûté as Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, last season. It is now the turn of Haydn—who, by right of chronological order, should have been first instead of last. There is a certain symphony in G, however, not very widely known, which Mr. Alfred Mellon will do well to look after. Who knows, when this is performed by the band of the Orchestral Union, whether the last may not turn out the first, and Haydn more than substantiate his right of precedence.

Of Miss Arabella Goddard's very artistic performance of the masterly Caprice of Mr. Sterndale Bennett (a "regular" caprice), we can find nothing to advance which would express the sentiments of the audience half so well as what is said by the Morning Post:—

"Another piece of executancy of the highest order was Miss Goddard's delivery of Sterndale Bennett's delightful Caprice. This celebrated artiste's playing is invariably correct, clear, distinctly articulated, excellently phrased, each musical sentence being so rounded off, each period of the measure so justly emphasized, that the sense of the composition is rendered intelligible to all. This is the first merit of this very young and extraordinarily gifted pianist. But still higher praise is due to her for the crowning grace which pure unaffected musical sentiment and deep reverence for the text of the great masters throw over her best performances. Miss Goddard played her countryman's composition better, much better (so far as our experience extends) than it had ever been previously executed in public, and was duly rewarded by enthusiastic applause."

The accompaniments to Mr. Bennett's Caprice were less "irreproachable" than those to Mendelssohn's concerto.

The dashing and characteristic overture of Herr Lindpaintner to his ballet of Joko, le Singe du Brésil (in spite of the absence of trombones and two of the horns—and in spite of the Allegro being taken too fast) was a spirited climax to this excellent concert—an auspicious inauguration of the second season of the Orchestral Union.

Mr. Alfred Mellon's first step must now be to add two good violins, one good viola, one good violoncello, and one good double bass to the orchestra. When that is effected, his next step must be ———— Attendons.

M. ALEXANDRE BILLET'S SOIRÉES.

THE third and last performance presented many interesting features. It commenced with Beethoven's sonata in F, Op. 54. This is so seldom played in public that it may be regarded as a novelty. The last movement, a sort of toccata, con moto perpetuo, in allegretto time, is one of the most difficult quick movements ever written by Beethoven for the pianoforte, and requires a perfect master of the clavier to do it justice. M. Billet executed the whole sonata (which is as short as it is quaint and vigorous) with accuracy and power, and in the last movement distinguished himself by his usual mechanical dexterity. The sonata (which is not a sonata) was followed by Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A flat, and Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in F minor (from the Six Preludes and Fugues, Op. 33). M. Billet showed his usual skill in interpreting the compositions of the ancient masters.

The Momento Capricioso, in B flat, Op. 12, of Weber—a very difficult toccata in double notes and chords—was brilliantly executed. This piece demands a great command of the staccato and a flexible wrist. The grand pianoforte sonata of Mozart, in F, Op. 12, for two performers, introduced Miss Amelia Taylor (M. Billet's cleverest pupil), who distinguished herself so much last year at M. Billet's concerts. Miss Taylor's playing shows great improvement, and she already bids fair to occupy a high position in her profession. The sonata was admirably executed, and received with loud applause. In the second parts the performances were of a less important character, but still all good of their kind. They consisted of Dr. Wylde's Une Rêverie, in F sharp minor; M. Charles Mayer's La Fontaine, in F sharp major; Mr. G. A. Macfarren's Spring Morning, Canzonetta, in C; Mr. Sterndale Bennett's L'Appassionata, in G minor; and Mr. Cipriani Potter's Pezzo di Bravura, in E. M. Mayer's La Fontaine, and Mr. Cipriani Potter's Pezzo di Bravura unanimously encored. The vocal music was entrusted to Misses U. Barclay and Stabbach, each of whom sang two songs. The former lady contributed Mendelssohn's "Oh! Rest in the Lord," and "The Rainy Day," by Mr. J. Hatton—a new song and a good one. Miss Stabbach introduced a ballad, by F. Ehrenstein, called "Angels are near," and a romanza, by W. G. Cusins, entitled "Oltre il mare," both of which she sang with decided talent. Herr Wilhelm Ganz accompanied the vocal music. M. Billet played on Woolley and Co.'s patent grand upright pianoforte.

AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE third concert for the season took place on Monday, in the Hanover Square Rooms. There were nearly seven hundred present, and upon such an assemblage of rank and fashion, and more especially of beauty, it did good to the eye of the connoisseur in such matters to dwell. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Henry Leslie, hon. secretary to the society, who, according to custom, selected the programme for the occasion. (At the first concert, this honourable office was fulfilled by Mr. Jekyll; at the second, by Lord Gerald Fitzgerald.) The programme of the third concert was as follows:—

PART I.—Symphony, No. 2 in D, Beethoven; Vocal Part-Songs, Kreutzer and Lachner; Overture No. 4, C. E. Stephens; Song, "O let Me sing to Thee," Henry Leslie; March, Tannhäuser, Wagner.

PART II.—Concertino, Pianoforte, Benedict; Duet, "Again rejoicing Nature sees," Miss Laura Barker; Minuet, S. W. Waley; Vocal Part-Songs, Kreutzer and Mendelssohn; Overture, Der Freischütz, Von Weber. Conductor, Mr. G. A. Osborne.

It was generally agreed that this concert was the most successful ever given by the Amateur Musical Society. It passed off with great éclat; the room was crowded, and the audience delighted. The music all went well (in the "Pickwickian sense"). The only possible objection that could be taken against the execution of the symphony was, with regard to the larghetto, which was played a little too fast. In other respects the performance was excellent. The first two symphonies of Beethoven, indeed, are entirely within the resources of the band, and are always well played by the gentlemen professors. The concert-overture of Mr. C. E. Stephens, which enjoys the romantic title of A Dream of Happiness, is a clever, agreeable, and musician-like composition. As far as mere notes and the precision of the ensemble were concerned, there was little to criticise; but, being a new work, the points, in which the band of amateurs is oftenest deficient, were more evident in this than in the symphony, and the "pianos" and "fortes" were occasionally confounded, and never sufficiently well contrasted. The overture, however, all circumstances considered, was more than fairly performed, and was warmly received by the audience. The march of Herr Richard Wagner, the Mahomed of modern music, though eccentric, has some curious and striking points. It laboured under a great disadvantage, however. The original score and parts not being at hand, a new orchestral arrangement was made for the occasion; and this fact may possibly have militated to its disadvantage. We cannot say that it was entirely understood. The admirable concertino of Mr. Benedict was performed by Mr. S. W. Waley, in a highly effective and artistic style. Too much praise can hardly be awarded to that gentleman for the ardour and perseverance he must have bestowed in studying it. The band, under the special direction of Mr. Benedict, accompanied Mr. Waley with good effect; and the applause at the conclusion was enthusiastic. Mr. Waley's minuet (introduced for the first time) is so great a step in advance of all his previous efforts, that we may reasonably anticipate works of still higher importance from his pen. Mr. Waley has many of the qualifications requisite to form a good composer. He expresses his ideas with fluency and ease, and has only to guard against the error of accepting too readily the first that may present themselves. We have heard two minuets from his pen; and should now be very pleased to listen to an entire symphony. The overture to Der Freischütz kept a large majority of the audience in their places until the end of the concert. It was played with a vigour and entrain worthy of unqualified commendation, and brought the concert to an effective close.

The vocal music was interesting. Mr. Henry Leslie's new song (composed to some graceful verses of Mr. J. Palgrave Simpson) is charming, though unpretending, and was exquisitely sung by Miss Dolby, for whom it was composed. It was unanimously encored, and was sung by the talented lady even better the second time than the first. Miss Laura Barker's pretty duet was extremely well given by Miss Dolby and her promising sister, Miss Amy Dolby. The vocal four-part songs were sung by a body of amateurs, under the name of the Deutscher Männer-Chor. These gentlemen have been trained by Herr Ernest Pauer, the pianist, upon whom their performances reflected the highest possible credit. From what was heard on Monday night, we may hope to possess in London, in the course of time, a choral force which will prove no contemptible rival to the celebrated Cologne choir. The materials are there, and nothing but experience is wanting. It was the first appearance of the Deutscher Männer-Chor, and their reception could not have been more favourable. The part songs they introduced were "Die Kapelle" (Conradin Kreutzer), "An den Sonnenschein" (Lachner), "Abendfeier" (C. Kreutzer), and "Jäger's Abschied" (Mendelssohn). These were all characteristic in their way, but that of Mendelssohn was worth the other three put together. The Männer-Chor was established in May, 1853, by thirty gentlemen, who appointed Herr Pauer director. At present the number is forty-two, besides eighteen "non-performing" members. They meet weekly, for the study and performance of German quartets and choruses.

Mr. Osborne was, as usual, the conductor of the evening, and accomplished his duties with his accustomed industry and talent.

MR. ALLCROFT'S CONCERTS AT THE LYCEUM.

Taking advantage of the Easter dramatic recess—as Passion week may be called—Mr. Allcroft opened the Lyceum Theatre on Monday evening, for a series of musical entertainments, to take place every night during the week, except Friday. The first part of each concert has been devoted to the works of a classical composer, while the second has been composed of the usual miscellaneous materials. Mendelssohn led the way on Monday, and the selection comprised the overture to Ruy Blas, the violin concerto, the Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from A Midsummer Night's Dream, the Andante and Salterello from the A major, or, as it is called, the "Italian" Symphony, with some vocal pieces which were sung by Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mr. Augustus Braham, etc. The instrumental performances were unexceptionable. The band was that of the London Orchestra, and the conductor, Mr. Frank Mori. The London Orchestra is composed of some of our most eminent performers, and though scarcely more than thirty in number, their playing exhibits the force and power of an infinitely larger body. The magnificent overture to Ruy Blas was executed with great fire and precision and loudly applauded. The selections from A Midsummer Night's Dream and the two movements from the Italian Symphony served, perhaps, even more than the overture, to exhibit the good qualities of the band. The crispness and lightness displayed in the Scherzo of the former, the vigour and precision of the Wedding March, and the "light and shade" in the movements from the symphony, were equally creditable to the members of the band and Mr. Frank Mori, who took all the times according to the strict indications of the composer. Herr Ernst played better, if possible, than he did at the second concert of the New Philharmonic, and Signor Cioffi gave one of the Lieder ohne Worte on the trombone. The audience were highly gratified with the Mendelssohnian music, and liberal in their applause. Miss Rebecca Isaacs sang the charming air, "The Flowers are singing," exceedingly well, and Mr. Augustus Braham was very happy in the fine song, "Then shall the Righteous," from Elijah. Mdlle. Milla and Miss Blanche Tudor sang the melodious and popular duet, called "Greeting." Mdlle. Milla has a mezzo-soprano voice, and Miss Blanche Tudor a soprano. The last-named is rather ambitious, and in the second part attempted the cavatina from Ernani, "Ernani involami," which was quite beyond her powers. Few even of the Italians can execute this difficult song, not to say well, but tolerably; yet all our English singers persist in essaying it, in spite of repeated failures.

Of the miscellaneous part of the concert, it is unnecessary to say much. Herr Ernst performed his Carnaval de Venise, with his usual immense execution and genuine humour, and was enthusiastically encored. Nearly all his variations were new. Miss Anne Oliva, aged ten, who made her first appearance in England, showed a precocious talent in a solo on the concertina. Pity that such evident talent should have been wasted on such an instrument. Miss Oliva comes from America, where she has been greatly praised. A feature of the second part was a solo on the clarinet, by Mr. Lazarus, which was played to perfection. Such execution and tone could hardly be surpassed. Miss Rebecca Isaacs and Mr. Augustus Braham were encored in the duet from Linda di Chamouni, "Da quel dì."

We forgot to mention that a Miss Nixon, evidently an amateur pianist, played a fantasia on the "Standard Bearer" in the first part—a rather inexplicable interpolation in the Mendelssohn part of a Mendelssohn concert. Miss Nixon was very nervous, and as it was, we believe, her first attempt in public, we shall say nothing more about it.

On Tuesday—a Beethoven night—the band performed two movements from the Eighth, and two from the Pastoral Symphony. Herr Ernst—who was engaged for the series—introduced a Serenade for the violin—which, though little known, is exceedingly beautiful—and played it to perfection. Wednesday was dedicated to Mozart, and Thursday to Weber.

The attendance, which was by no means numerous on Monday—owing, no doubt, to the several musical entertainments in the immediate neighbourhood—improved during the week. Such concerts are in the highest degree deserving of support; and we sincerely trust that Mr. Allcroft has been a gainer by the speculation.

DRURY LANE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Why the managers of theatres, who are interdicted from giving dramatic and operatic performances during Passion Week, should be allowed to present the public with miscellaneous musical entertainments and promenade concerts, is difficult to explain. Who is the prohibitor, and whence the law? Is the "Row Polka" less profane than Hamlet, and the "Low-back'd Car," of higher morality than the Mose in Egitto? In framing such a statute, the legislature has overleaped its intention, and missed the point of intended legislation. If it were meant to close the theatres during Passion Week, the law must be obscurely worded which sanctions, or at least does not prohibit, concerts of every denomination, from the "Classical" to the "Promenade." Drury Lane may be hung and decorated, refreshment and reading rooms may be provided, the pit may be covered in, orchestra, vocalists, and instrumental solo executants engaged, and the audience may perambulate the theatre, with a freedom denied them in the regular season; and yet the prohibition is stringent, that in the week preceding Easter no representations of any kind shall take place, which involve dialogue, stage costume, or the shifting of scenes—as if these were more at variance with religion than polkas or quadrilles. "Ten to one on it, with anybody that knows the statues," the law-maker never contemplated the possibility of the theatre being opened at all. Now, however, that the paradox has become so evident—the Promenade Concert this week at Drury Lane having thrown the whole thing into ridicule—the restriction may, probably, be extended to all kinds of performances, those of sacred music excepted; and this, no doubt, was the original spirit of the law.

Mr. E. T. Smith, if we are to credit the Drury Lane bills, can always command something extraordinary. We have, certainly, proofs of his enterprize and success in fishing up wonders of one kind or another. His first great hit this season at Drury Lane, was the man who walked on the ceiling, fly-wise; his next was

G. V. B., and his penultimate, the Chinese jugglers. Of his many miscellaneous and intervening wonders, we have no recollection.

The vocal and instrumental performers, on Monday night, consisted of Misses Poole, Ransford, Susannah Lowe, Featherstone, and Messrs. Elliot Galer, Ransford and Henri Drayton (vocalists); with the Messrs. R. Dean, Sidney, Davis and R. S. Pratten (instrumentalists).

The theatre was tolerably full. Mr. G. Haywood was the instrumental, and Mr. J. F. Duggan, the vocal conductor. Some of the most popular songs from Mr. Duggan's Léonie were sung by Miss Susannah Lowe and Mr. Elliot Galer. The rondo finale was nicely given by the lady, and the ballad, "Yes, 'tis a Spell," by the gentleman. Miss Featherstone was encored in "Saucy Kate;" Mr. Henri Drayton much applauded in a French romance by Adolphe Adam; and Misses Poole and Ransford, in some very popular ballads, won the hearts and hands of the promenaders. A flute solo by Mr. Pratten, was a masterly performance; and a duet for clarinet and cornet, by Messrs. Dean and Davis, gave great satisfaction.

On Wednesday there was another promenade concert. On Thursday morning the Fancy Fair came off with great success. The third and last "promenade" comes off to-night; and then Drury Lane Theatre will be consigned to Mr. Jarrett, and the Royal Opera.

FOREIGN.

PARIS.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Mdlle. Rosati has re-appeared at the Grand Opera, to the delight of the admirers of the Terpischorean art, who were getting tired of waiting for the new ballet, so long promised, in which Mdme. Cerito is to sustain the principal part. The said ballet will positively be given at the end of the month—at least, so promises the management. Credat Judæus Apellas. The Nonne Sanglante of M. Gounod is in active rehearsal.—"Concerts Spirituels," as they are fantastically termed, are the order of the day at the Italiens, and Rossini's Stabat Mater figures conspicuously in the bills.—At the Odéon, we have had three new pieces almost simultaneously. One, La Taverne, a three act comedy by M. Sardeau, was a failure; the other two, La Conquête de ma Femme, by M. Louis Leroy, and a one act comedy by M. Léopold Laluyé, succeeded.—The Théâtre Lyrique has just revived Le Panier Fleuri, by M. Ambroise Thomas, which was first produced at the Opéra Comique in 1839, with Mdme. Jenny Colon in the principal character: Mdlle. Petit-Brière now plays the part. M. Victor Adams' opera, La Reine d'un Jour, is in rehearsal. The career of Mâitre Wolfram has been suddenly stopt by the illness of Mdme. Meillet. Thank the fates, however, Mdme. Marie Cabel is in the possession of the best health, and of all the charms for which she is so renowned, and which continue to render La Promise as popular as ever.—At the Opéra Comique, Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord pursues its successful career with undiminished attraction, and Peter the Great is a far more popular personage with the Parisian public than the Czar Nicholas. Mdme. Larcena, formerly of the Théâtre Lyrique, and afterwards at the Variétés, has made her début at the Opéra Comique in La Dame Blanche and Les Mousquetaires. She has been well received, and, in addition to being a pleasing singer, is a pleasing actress. There is some talk of a new three-act opera by M. Victor Massé, the libretto by the indefatigable and inexhaustible M. Scribe. The Opéra Comique, too, gives a Concert Spirituel on Saturday, the 15th, for the benefit of the Association des Artistes Musiciens. Among other things, we shall have a part of Rossini's Stabat Mater, an interlude by the Société d'Harmonie Sax, and one of Mendelssohn's pianoforte concertos, by the accomplished Mdme. Wilhelmina Clauss. The orchestra will be conducted by M. Thilmant, and the chorus under the direction of MM. Cornette and Bataille. There will be 400 performers.—The Théâtre Français has just lost two valuable members—M. Brindeau and Mdme. Delphine Fix. In resigning his position as Sociétaire du Théâtre Francais, M. Brindeau has stipulated for the right of playing at any other theatre in Paris, if he chooses.—At the Gymnase, La Crise will shortly disappear from the bills to make way for a new piece by MM. Emile Augier and Jules Sandeau. According to report, the Spanish Dancers, who proved so attractive last summer will re-appear, while Mdlle. Luther, on the other hand, will disappear, having thrown up her engagement. Her secession will be a loss to the theatre.—La Vie en Rose, vaudeville, by MM. T. Barrière and H. de Kock, which for some time since has given occupation to the gentlemen of the long robe, has at length been produced at the Vaudeville, and proved a trump card for the management. The principal parts are sustained by MM. Félix, Fechter, and Mdme. Doche. There has been a curious correspondence between Mdme. Doche and Mdlle. Page, to whom the principal character in this piece was first allotted, in the public journals. The rival beauties are very severe upon each other, but Mdlle. Page has satisfactorily proved herself the youngest. The habitués of the Vaudeville, as well as the general public, have been much grieved by the death of the well-known Lepeintre Ainé, who committed suicide. He was buried on Saturday.—M. Victor Séjour's comédie-vaudeville, in three-acts, L'Argent du Diable, has been quite successful at the Variétés; and as much may be said of a trifle in one-act, by M. Raymond Deslandes, entitled, D'une Fenêtre à l'autre.—Sur la Terre et sur l'Onde is the title of a new five-act vaudeville at the Palais Royal, by MM. Varin and Biéville.—Great preparations are being made at the Porte-Saint-Martin, for the production of a Russian piece translated by M. Eugène Moreau. The name of the Russian author is Nicolas Gogal. The piece, which was, at first, announced under the title of Un Journaliste, will at present bear the much more attractive appellation of Les Mystères de la Russie, ou un Coin du Voile déchiré. The next novelties, after this pièce d'occasion, will be a drama, by M. Decourcelle, entitled Jean Rémy, and Schamyl (also àpropos), by M. Paul Meurice.—Le Pendu, by MM. Anicet Bourgeois and Michel Masson, has been very successful at the Ambigu-Comique.

M. Duprez has given a second representation at his Théâtre-Ecole. The chief attraction was an unpublished opéra-buffa, in which MM. Roger, Mocker, Mdlles. Duprez, Mira, and M. Duprez himself, all sang.—M. Hector Berlioz has gone to Germany at the special request of the Société des Concerts, of Hanover, for the purpose of directing the execution of his Faust, La Fuite en Egypte, and Roméo et Juliette.—M. Adolphe Adam has been created a member of the Order of Albrecht of Saxony, by His Majesty the King of Saxony.—M. Servais, the vocalist, has come to Paris expressly to give a concert in conjunction with M. Henri Herz. Mad. Gaveaux-Sabatier has also announced her intention of giving a concert.—By the way, the journal called Figaro, which formerly enjoyed so much celebrity, is to be revived under the editorship of MM. H. de Villemessant and B. Jouvin.

MARSEILLES.—Fidelio has been performed here, and proved a failure! De gustibus, etc.

VIENNA.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The Italian Opera season has commenced, and the opera selected for the opening night was Norma, the character of the priestess being sustained by Mdme. Medori. This lady, who has always been a great favourite with the Viennese, and only left them to succeed Mdme. Grisi at St. Petersburg, was greeted with loud and continuous applause on her appearance. Signor Bettini was Pollio, and, owing to the sudden indisposition of Mdme. Olivi, the part of Adalgisa was undertaken by Mdlle. Pozzi. Capellmeister Esser conducted. The next opera was Cenerentola, which has long been banished from our repertory. Mdme. Borghi sustained the part of Angelina, a dangerous one, in consequence of the still lively remembrance of Mdlle. Alboni. Mdme. Borghi, however, went through the ordeal triumphantly, and immediately established herself in the good graces of the dilettanti of Vienna. Her voice is fresh and, at the same time, well trained, and her dramatic powers considerable. Signor Pasi made his début as Don Ramiro. His voice is not powerful, but sweet, flexible, and suited to Rossini's music. Herr Eckert, who has been recently engaged as Capellmeister, gave proof of his entire competence to fulfil satisfactorily the duties of his arduous office. Altogether the Italian Opera season has begun well.

The fifth quartet soirée of the second series, given by Herren

Hellmesberger, Durat, Haussler, and Schlesinger, opened with a quartet by Herr Assmeyer—his first attempt in this class of writing, and not a successful one. Beethoven's pianoforte trio in D major, and Mendelssohn's magnificent quintet in A major, magnificently performed and rapturously applauded, completed the concert.—Herr Stockhausen's last concert took place in the rooms of the Musik-Verein on the 5th inst.—The Beethoven Festival, which was to come off in Seuffert's room, has fallen to the ground, in consequence of the continued illness of the Russian artist, Herr Schmidt.—Mdme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt's third concert is fixed for this evening, the 8th, in the grand Redoutensaal.

BERLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Since my last, I have been twice to hear Herr Dorn's new five-act opera Die Nibelungen, and am therefore better qualified to give an opinion. The author of the libretto, Herr E. Gerber, has not been happy in his subject. The public do not take the same interest in the cold, statue-like personages of the old German epic as for beings of a later period, in harmony with themselves. They admire without sympathy, and hence Herr Dorn has to contend with a great difficulty. His music is not very original, but it has character—without any leaven of French or Italian. Still, it is not likely to attain a lasting popularity. Mdlle. Johanna Wagner exerted herself to the utmost in the principal character, Brunhild, both as a singer and an actress, and was deservedly applauded. The other parts were well sustained by Mdme. Herrenburger, Herren Bost, Theodore Formes, Schäffer, and Krüger. The chorus was steady and excellent. The opera is put on the stage magnificently. The other operas lately have been Cherubini's Der Wasserträger and Fidelio, with Mdme. Köster as prima donna.

The third subscription concert of the Singakademie was rendered particularly interesting by the performance of Cherubini's grand mass in D minor, a work which had been very seldom executed in Berlin, and was new to most of the audience. The solo-singers and chorus were by no means entitled to praise. The general execution was very slovenly. The other pieces were a "Salvum fac Regem" and a "Te Deum," both by Herr Grell, and produced for the first time in Berlin.—At the fourth and last subscription concert of the Frauen-Verein, for the benefit of the Gustav-Adolph-Stiftung, M. Louis Lacombe, the pianist, played two pieces of his own composition, Bach's fugue in C sharp major, and Chopin's Etude in F minor. He was greatly applauded, and, being encored in the last piece, substituted Weber's Invitation à la Valse. The Dom-chor sang a Vaterunser by Taubert, a Lied by Mendelssohn (arranged for a chorus), etc., and Mdme. Tuczeck an air by Stradella. M. Vieuxtemps concluded his series of concerts as he began them—with the concerto dedicated to King Friedrich Wilhelm IV.—At the last trio-soirée of Herren Löschhorn and the Brothers Stahlknecht, a new trio by Herr Taubert, in E flat major was introduced.—Beethoven's oratorio, Christus am Oelberge, is to be executed in Kroll's establishment on Good Friday, by the members of the Gesang-Verein, assisted by Herr Carl Henning as organist, and Herr Kroll's orchestra.

BONN.—Robert Schumann is, at present, an inmate of the Private Lunatic Asylum of Endenich, near Bonn. We are happy to be enabled to state that, according to the opinion of his physicians, he may still recover. Mdme. Schumann has been expressly forbidden from attending on the patient, as her presence on the last occasion produced an irritating effect. She, therefore, remains in Düsseldorff.

GOTHA.—Santa-Chiara, the new opera of His Royal Highness the Duke of Coburg-Gotha has been brought out with success. In the opinion of the general public, the composer has made progress since his last opera. M. Liszt conducted the opera on the night of the first representation. The libretto is by the well known German dramatic authoress, Mdme. Charlotte Birch-Pfeiffer. The story is taken from a semi-historical legend, according to which the Princess Charlotte of Brunswick, wife of the Czarewitsch Alexei, son of Peter the Great, was, by means of a sleeping potion, thrown into a deathlike trance.

ROTTERDAM.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the Verein zur Beförderung der Tonkunst will be celebrated on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of July, under the direction of Herr Verhulst. The following is the programme, as at present arranged:—First day: Handel's Israel in Egypt; second day: The Seasons, by Haydn; and, the third day: Beethoven's Ninth Symphony (choral), followed by other smaller works, executed by the several vocalists and instrumentalists. Mdlle. Jenny Ney (from Dresden, soprano), Mad. Sophie Gurau-Schloss (Hamburgh, mezzo-soprano), Herr Steger (Vienna, tenor), Herr Pischek (Stuttgart, barytone-bass), and Herr Carl Formes (London, basso-profondo), have had engagements offered them for the solo-parts; but as Mad. Gurau-Schloss has retired from public life, it is doubtful whether she will accept.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The pianist, M. Mortier de Fontaine, who has permanently settled here, has given a series of so-called historical concerts to empty benches. Herr Henselt is about to undertake a tournée through all parts of the empire for the purpose of giving concerts.

REVEL.—In consequence of the war, the manager, Herr Fass, was suddenly commanded to close the theatre on the 10th of March. It was only by the most pressing entreaties that he obtained permission to postpone carrying out the order until the 1st of April (Russian style). The greater part of the company will proceed to Pernau, where they will give a limited number of performances.

LEIPSIC.—M. Hugo Ulrich's symphony in B minor has been performed at the Gewandhaus, under the direction of the composer. Herr Joachim is announced for the next concert, when his new overture to Hamlet will be given. Herr R. Dreyschock is to play a violin-concerto by Mr. Litolff at the same concert. Mdlle. Agnes Bury is engaged here for the winter season.

BRESLAU.—M. Vieuxtemps is giving concerts here.

COLOGNE.—The Mozart-Vereis have given Herr Marschner's opera, Hans Heiling, with pianoforte accompaniment.—The theatre will close on the 1st of May. The manager has gone to Coblentz with the opera company, for the purpose of giving three performances, to consist of Tannhäuser, Zampa, and Le Prophète.

DRESDEN.—Mdlle. Jenny Ney has received the title of Königlich. Sächs. Kammersängerin (Royal Saxon Chamber Singer.)

AUGSBURG.—Herr Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser has been played here several times, and favourably received.

DARMSTADT.—The last novelty at the theatre was Herr von Flotow's Indra, which pleases.

MANNHEIM.—The quartet soirées of Herren Becker, Hildebrand, Mayer and Kündiger, have been well attended. Auber's Marco Spada has been produced with great success, at the Opera.

PRAGUE.—Herr Marschner's opera, Der Templer und die Jüdin, has been revived. Two concerts have been given, one by Herr Goltermann, the violoncellist, and the other by Mdlle. Bertha Brausil, who is only twelve years old. Mendelssohn's St. Paul will be produced at Easter.

GRATZ.—Herr Staudigl is expected, and will sing at a grand festival, which is shortly to take place here.

PRESBURG.—Die Zauberflöte has been revived, to the great delight of all lovers of true music.

HAMBURGH.—Herr Wagner's Tannhäuser was given to a very full house, for Herr Lindemann's benefit.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Cherubini's Lodoiska, and Thay, an opera by His Royal Highness the Duke of Coburg-Gotha, are in rehearsal.

BERGAMO.—The following, about Rubini's funeral, is from the Gazetta di Bergamo:—"On the coffin, which was covered with black velvet, and enriched with gold embroidery, was placed the uniform of director and grand master of the Imperial Schools of Singing, to which dignity the Czar had appointed the deceased. On the uniform sparkled the Order of Saint Ernest of Saxony, the Grand Medal of Merit, in brilliants, of the Russian order of St. Andrew, presented to Rubini by the Emperor Nicholas, the Prussian Medal of Merit, and the medal of the city of Vienna.

A crown of massive gold, enriched with diamonds, the magnificent donation by which the aristocracy of St. Petersburg testified their admiration of the great artist, was also deposited on the coffin. On the portico of the church at Romano, where the funeral-service was performed, the following inscription met the eye of the spectator:—'The poor gently bless thy memory, because, honourably enriched, thou camest to their assistance with paternal solicitude and alleviated their sufferings.' ".

BIRTH.—On Wednesday, at her residence, near Fulham, Madame Grisi was safely delivered of a son.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 15TH, 1854.

THERE seems to be, at the present moment, a strong wish on the part of certain writers, who profess to instruct the public in musical affairs, to abuse and underrate the compositions of Dr. Spohr. This new prejudice, for it is nothing better, has been recently demonstrated to an outrageous extent. So much so, indeed, that we think it our duty to protest against it, and to warn our readers, lest they should be induced, by plausible arguments and well-turned sentences, to render injustice to a musician whose influence on the progress of art in this country has been immensely beneficial. Whatever may be thought and said of Dr. Spohr, he can never be fairly classed among ordinary composers. His claims to rank among the greatest and most conscientious masters are unquestionable; and the benefits he has conferred on the art, in almost every branch of it, are too many and too solid to be overlooked or sneered at. It would be well for some of those "guides" of public opinion, who have recently adopted a tone of invariable depreciation when alluding to Dr. Spohr and his works, to ponder well on the ultimate tendency of what they are doing. They are teaching their readers to undervalue that which is of the utmost consequence to the welfare of music. They are throwing cold water on those qualities of sincerity and high attainment which are so eminently useful in its pursuit, by holding up to obloquy, if not to derision, the honest efforts of a simple and true man. For more than half a century, Dr. Spohr has laboured zealously and with undeviating steadfastness of purpose to elevate the taste of the multitude for that art which, by universal consent, has been pronounced divine, and which, while ministering to the most innocent enjoyment, helps to purify and civilize the popular mind. An uncompromising worshipper at the shrine of music, like all those who have cultivated it most successfully, he regards his mission as a sacred one, never to be prostituted to mere worldly or selfish considerations. In this he resembles the kings of harmony—from John Sebastian Bach to Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy; and in this, if in nothing else, he has shown himself worthy of a place among them. While he has continually raised the dignity of his profession, Dr. Spohr has never once degraded it.

Not many years ago the bias was quite the other way. The musical mind of Germany, and of all the followers of the German school, was thoroughly imbued with Spohr. Their light was but a reflection of his light, their ideas were the natural offspring of his, their forms but imitations of his own. He had pointed out a high road to excellence in which the rest endeavoured to walk; he had invented a new style with whose attractions the others were intoxicated. From one well alone was drawn the German inspiration; and that well was Spohr's. Even the critics were as mad on one side, as now they are mad on the opposite. Mozart and Beethoven were on the point of being deposed, and Spohr was to reign in their stead. No composer was more idolised, emulated, and pillaged; the young musicians regarded him as a prophet; his method of harmony was lauded to the skies, and his knowledge of orchestral combinations pronounced unparallelled. That engouement, that blind devotion, which could only see one colour in musical painting, one model to copy, one great master to venerate, has passed away. The old love vanished, and a new one supplied its place. A more general and intimate acquaintance with the instrumental masterpieces of Beethoven and Mozart, the oratorios of Handel, and some of the best operas of Rossini and Weber, had much to do with weakening the all-powerful influence of Spohr. But still more was to be attributed to the original and dazzling genius of Mendelssohn, who more rapidly than any other composer of any known epoch assumed a dominant and almost undivided sway over the tastes and feelings, the heads and hearts, of musicians. This was the real new love, which banished the old, and usurped its place. As Mendelssohn rose, Spohr fell. In the estimation of the world of music, the young composer utterly eclipsed the elder.

This result was not extraordinary. That Mendelssohnw as a greater inventor, and even a greater master than Spohr, we are ready to admit. But matters have now come to such a pass, that the finest works of the latter—a noble and genuine musician for all that—are as often spoken of with ungrateful irreverence as with proper respect, and sometimes, too, by those who should either know better, or cease to write and talk about music and its professors.

We have alluded to this subject with regret; but it is the manifest duty of those who have the progress of music and the social consideration of its professors at heart, to do what lies in their power in order to arrest the march of error, and tear the veil from sophistry and falsehood. We cannot, indeed, remain idle and inattentive while the public is being notoriously misled in a matter of such serious importance. Dr. Spohr is an illustrious musician, a man of genius as well as of talent, and an honour to an art every branch of which he has adorned and enriched by his writings. In one department he is unrivalled. Perhaps no composer has produced so much and so well for the first of orchestral as it is the first of solo instruments. Dr. Spohr's compositions for the violin alone (we say nothing of his other works) form one of the most extensive and valuable bequests that have been made to musicians. To speak of such a man, as of one of the common sort of artists, or as of a dry pedant, or as of anything short of what he really deserves, is to derange the order of things, and to strike a blow at the very foundation of music.

Within the last fortnight two of the symphonies of Dr. Spohr —the Weihe der Töne and the D minor (No. 2),—have been expose to flippant animadversions, from those, on one side, who are nothing better than blind and bigoted past-worshippers, and on the other, from a very different class of critics, whose beau idéal is concentred in a certain modern school of composition which might be properly styled the Music-run-mad School. That a work so full of imagination and beauty as the Weihe der Töne should be spoken of contemptuously by the same Aristarchus who recommends the curtailment of the first movement of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major,* was not surprising—since the self-sufficiency which urged him to give Beethoven a lesson in plan and development might very easily have incited him to put down Dr. Spohr as a laborious trifler. But so long as we have the power, we shall do our best to direct the public aright in these matters; nor shall we permit shallow objections to pass muster for sound criticism, and a mere pompous display of words for just appreciation. If, at a time when music is making such vast strides in the popular affection, and becoming so generally practised and understood, the compositions of such a man as Dr. Spohr are to be arraigned, by self-constituted judges, as severely as though they were the crude efforts of a tyro, or the blunders of one who writes without a knowledge of his art or facility in its practice, we can only say that it has progressed to very little purpose.

Madame Hermine Rudersdorff, a prima donna from all the principal theatres in the North of Germany, of great and deserved esteem, has arrived in London, where she will pass the season. Besides the welcome she will command by her talent, this lady's appearance will be peculiarly interesting, as she will introduce some arias of Mozart's, which she has sung with eminent success, but which are quite unknown in England. Mdme. Rudersdorff is engaged at the Royal Opera, Drury Lane. Mdme. Köster, from the Berlin Opera, is also engaged.

Mdlle. Sofie Cruvelli.—Mdlle. Sofie Cruvelli has but a few more representations to give at the Opera before she leaves Paris for London. She will appear in no other operas than the Huguenots and La Vestale. Madame Tedesco will arrive from Bourdeaux about the same time Mdlle. Cruvelli leaves, and again appear on the boards of the Academy. Mdlle. Cruvelli having been indisposed, the Vestale was not played during an entire week.

Signor Calzolari.—This excellent tenor has arrived in Paris from St. Petersburgh.

M. Schulhoff, the celebrated pianist, has arrived in Paris after an absence of some years, and last week gave, at Erard's Rooms, a soirée musicale.
